The AUTHOR to the READER.

THE long and still declining state of the Christian Commonwealth, with the utter ruin and subversion of the Empire of the East, and many other most glorious Kingdoms and Provinces of the Christians, never to be sufficiently lamented, might, with the due consideration thereof, worthily move even a right stony heart to rub: but therewith also to call to remembrance the dishonour done unto the blessed Name of our Saviour Christ Jesus, the desolation of his Church here militant upon Earth, the dreadful danger daily threatened unto the poor remainder thereof, the millions of Souls cast headlong into eternal Destruction, the infinit number of woful Christians (whose grievous groanings under the heavy yoke of Infidelity no tongue is able to express) with the carelessness of the Great for the redress thereof, might give just cause unto any good Christian to sit down, and with the heavy Prophet to say, as he did of Jerusalem, O how hath the Lord darkened the Daughter of Sion in his wrath! and cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel, and remembered not his footstool in the day of his wrath! All which miseries (with many others so great as greater there can none be) the Prince of darkness and Author of all mischief hath by the persecuting Princes of all Ages, and ancient Hereticks his Ministers, labored from time to time to bring upon the Church of God, to the obscuring of his blessed Name, and utter subversion of his most sacred Word; but yet by none, no not by them all together so much prevailed, as by the false Prophet Mahomet, born in an unhappy hour, to the great destruction of Mankind: whose most gross and blasphemous Doctrine first sanctified by himself in Arabia; and so by him obtruded upon the World, and afterwards by the Sarafin Caliphes (his seduced Successors) with greater Forces maintained, was by them, together with their Empire, dispersed over a great part of the face of the Earth, to the unspeakable ruin and destruction of the Christian Religion and State: especially in Asia and Africk, with some good part of Europe also. But the unity of this great Mahometan Monarchy being once dissolved, and it divided into many Kingdoms, and so after the manner of worldly things drawing unto the fatal period of it self, in process of time became of far less force than before, and so less dreadful unto the Christian Princes of the West, by whom these Sarafins were again expelled out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spain, which they yet held within the remembrance of our Fathers, until that by their Victorious Forces, they were thence at length happily removed also, after that they had possessed the same above the space of 700 Years. In this declination of the Sarafins, the first Champions of the Mahometan Superstition (who though they had left much, yet held they many Kingdoms both in Asia and Africk, taken for the most part from the Christians) arise the Turks, an obscure and base People, before scarce known unto the World, yet fierce and courageous, who by their Valour first aspired unto the Kingdom of Persia, with divers other large Provinces: from whence they were about 170 Years after again expelled by the Tartars, and enforced to retire themselves into the lesser Asia: where taking the benefit of the discord of the Christian Princes of the East, and the carelessness of the Christians in general, they in some good measure repaired their former losses again, and maintained the state of a Kingdom at Iconium in Cilicia (now of them called Caramania) holding in their subjection the greatest part of that fruitful Country, still seeking to gain from the Christians what they had before left unto the Tartars. But this Kingdom of the Turks declining also, by the dismembring of the same, there stepped up among the Turks in Bythinia, one Osman or Othoman, of the Oguzian Tribe or Family, a Man of great spirit and valour, who by little and little growing up amongst the rest of his Countrymen, and other the effeminate Christians on that side of Asia, at last, like another Romulus, took upon him the Name of a Sultan or King, and is right worthily accounted the first Founder of the mighty Empire of the Turks; which continued, by many descents, directly in the Line of himself, even unto Achmat, who now reigneth, is from a small beginning become the greatest terror of the World, and holding in subjection many great and mighty Kingdoms in Asia, Europe, and Africk, is grown to that height of pride, as that it threatneth destruction unto the rest of the Kingdoms of the Earth; labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it self. In the greatness whereof is swallowed up both the Name and Empire of the Sarafins, the glorious Empire of the Greeks, the renowned Kingdoms of Macedonia, Peloponnesus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Servia, Bosnia, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Egypt, Judea, Tunes, Algiers, Media, Mesopotamia, with a great part of Hungary, as also of the Persian Kingdom, and all those Churches and Places so much spoken of in holy Scripture (the Romans only excepted) and in brief, so much of Christendom as far exceedeth that which is thereof at this day left. So that at this present if you consider the beginning, progress, and perpetual felicity of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this World nothing more admirable and strange; if the greatness and lustre thereof, nothing more magnificent and glorious; if the Power and Strength thereof, nothing more Dreadful or Dangerous: Which wondering at nothing but at the Beauty of it self, and drunk with the pleasant Wine of perpetual felicity, holdeth all the rest of the World in Scorn, thundering out nothing still but Blood and War, with a full persuasion in time to Rule over all, prefixing unto it self no other limits than the uttermost bounds of the Earth, from the rising of the Sun unto the going down of the same. The causes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the most part are shut up in the Counsels of the Great, as that for me to seek after them, were great Folly: Yet amongst the rest, some others there be, so pregnant and manifest, as that the blind World taketh thereof, as it were a general Knowledge, and may therefore without Offence of the Wiser sort (as I hope) even in these our nice Days be lightly touched. Whereof the first and greatest, is the Just and Secret Judgement of the Almighty, who in Justice delivereth into the Hands of these mercileless Miscreants, Nation after Nation, and Kingdom unto Kingdom, as unto the most terrible Executioners of his dreadful Wrath, to be punished for their Sins: Others in the mean while, no less Sinful than they; in his Mercy enjoying the benefit of a longer time, calling them unto Repentance. Then, the uncertainty of Worldly things, which is subject to perpetual Change, cannot long stay in one State; but as the Sea is with the Wind, so are they in like sort tossed up and down with the continual continual Surges and Waves of alteration and change; so that being once grown to their height, they there lay not long, but fall again as fast as ever they rise, and so in time come to nothing: As we see the greatest Monarchies that ever yet were upon Earth have done, their course being run; over whom Time now Triumpheth, as no doubt at length it shall over this so great a Monarchy also, when it shall not then live by Fame, as the others now do. Next to these Causes from above, (without Offence be it said) is the small care the Christian Princes, especially those that dwell further off, have had of the common State of the Christian Commonwealth, whereof even the very Greatest are to account themselves but as the principal Members of one and the same Body; and have, or ought to have, as sharp a feeling one of another's Harms, as hath the head of the Wounds due unto the feet, or rather as if it were done unto themselves: Instead of which Christian Compassion and Unity, they have ever, and even yet at this time, are so divided amongst themselves, with endless Quarrels, partly for Questions of Religion, (never by the Sword to be determined) partly for Matters touching their own proper State and Sovereignty, and with such distrust and implacable Hatred, that they never could as yet (although it hath been long wished) join their common Forces against the common Enemy: But turning their Weapons one upon another, (the more to be lamented) have from time to time Weakened themselves, and Opened a way for him to Devour them one after another: Whereas with their combined Forces (the greedy Enemies greiveth Terror) they might long since not only have repressed his Fury, and abated his Pride; but with small Danger and much Glory, (God favouring their so Honourable Attempts) have again Recovered from him most of those famous Christian Kingdoms, which he by Force, against all Right holdeth at this Day, in most miserable Subjection and Thralldom: Many Millions of the poor Oppressed Christians, in the mean time out of the Furnace of Tribulation, in the Anguish of their Souls crying in vain unto their Christian Brethren for relief. By Civil discord the Noble Country of Græcia Perished, when as the Father rising against the Son, and the Son against the Father, and Brother against Brother, they to the mutual Destruction of themselves called the Turk, who like a greedy Lyon lurking in his Den, lay in wait for them all. So Perished the Kingdoms of Bulgaria, Servia, Bosnia and Epirus, with the famous Island of the Rhodes and Cyprus, betray'd as it were by the Christian Princes, their Neighbours, by whom they might have easily been relieved. So the most Flourishing and Strong Kingdom of Hungary, (in the Relicks whereof, the Fortune of the Turkish Empire hath longer stuck, than in the Conquest of any other Kingdom; by it attempted whatsoever) divided in it self by the Ambition of Princes, and Civil discord, the Weaker still calling unto his Aid, the mighty Power of the Turk, is long since for the most part become to him a Prey; the poor remainders thereof, being at this Day hardly Defended by the Forces of the Christian Emperor, and of the Princes his Confederates; seldom times meeting together with such Cheerfulness or Expedition, as the Necessity of so great a Matter requireth. Unto which so great a Cause of the common decay, may be added the evil Choice of our Souldiers employed in these Wars, who taken up hand over head, out of the promiscuous common People, are for the most part Untrained men, serving rather for shew, and the filling up of Number, than for Use; and in no respect to be compared with the Turks Janizaries, and other his most expert Souldiers, continually even from their Youth Exercised in feats of Arms. Not to speak in the mean time of the want of the Ancient Marital Discipline, the wholefome preservative of most Pious Armies, which breedeth in the Proud Enemy a Contempt of the Christian Forces, with a full persuasion of himself, that he is not by such Disordered and Weak means to be withstood. But to come near unto the Causes of the Turks greatness, and more proper unto themselves, as not depending of the imprudent Carelessness, Weakness, Discord, and Imperfections of others: First, in them is to be Noted an ardent and infinite Desire of Sovereignty, wherewith they have long since promised unto themselves the Monarchy of the whole World, a quick motive to their so hangy Designs: Then, such a rare Unity and Agreement amongst them, as well in the manner of their Religion, (if it be so to be called) as in matters concerning their State; (especially in all their Enterprises, to be taken in hand for the augmenting their Empire) as that thereof they call themselves Ummi, that is to say, Men of one Mind, or at Peace amongst themselves; so as it is not to be marvelled, if thereby they grow Strong themselves, and Dreadful to others: Joy unto this their Courage, conceived by the wonderful Success of their perpetual Fortune, their unbleed Vigilancy in taking the advantage of every Occasion, for the enlarging of their Monarchy; their Frugality and Temperateness in their Diet, and other manner of Living, their careful observing of their Ancient Military Discipline, their Cheerful and almost Incredible Obedience unto their Princes and Sultans; such, as in that point no Nation in the World was to be worthily compared unto them. All great Causes why their Empire hath so mightily encreased, and so long continued. Wherunto may be added the too strongest Sinews of every well Governed Commonwealth; Reward propounded to the Good, and Punishment threatened unto the Offender; where the prize is for Virtue and Honour set up, and the way laid open for every common Person, he he never so meanly Born, to aspire unto the greatest Honours and Preferments both of the Court and of the Field, yea even unto the nearest Affinity of the Great Sultan himself; if his Valour or other Worth shall so Deserve: When as on the contrary part, the Dishonour or cowardice is no expell from the same Sovereign Power, nothing but Disgrace, Death, and Torture. And yet these great ends, so contented by such Commendable and Lawful means, still to extend or establish their far spreading Empire, if that point once come in question, they stick not in their Divisive Policy to break and infringe the Laws both of Nations and Nature. Their Leagues, grounded upon the Law of Nations, be they with never so Strong Capitulations concluded, or Solemnity of Oath confirmed, have with them no longer Force than standeth with their own Profit, serving indeed but as Snares to intangle other Princes in, until they have singled out him whom they purpose to Devour; the rest fast bound by their Leagues, still looking on, as if their own turn should never come; yet with no more assistance of their Safety by their Leagues, than had the other whom they see Perish before their faces. As for the kind Law of Nature, what can be thereunto more contrary, than for the Father most unnaturally to embrace his Hands in the Blood of his own Children? And the Brother to become the Bloody Executioner of his own Brother? A common matter among the Othoman Emperors. All which most Execrable and Inhumane Murders, they cover with the pretended safety of their State, as thereby freed from the fear of all aspiring Competitors, (the greatest torment of the Mighty) and by the Preservation of the Integrity of their Empire, which they thereby keep whole and entire unto themselves, and so deliver it as it were by Hand from one to another, in no part dismembered or impaired. By these and such like means is this Barbarous Empire (of almost nothing) grown to that height of Majesty and Power, as that it hath in Contempt all the rest; being it self not Inferiour in Greatness and Strength, unto the greatest Monarchies that ever yet were upon the face of the Earth, the Roman Empire only excepted. Which how far it shall yet further spread, none knoweth, but he that holdeth in his Hand all the Kingdoms of the Earth, and with his Word boundeth the raging of the Sea, so that it cannot further pass. Moved with the Greatness and Glory, of this so Mighty and Dreadful Empire, grown for the most part out of the Ruin of the Christian Commonwealth, with the utter Subversion of many great and Flourishing Kingdoms, and Woful fall of many more, Right Pious and Mighty Princes, not without Grief to be remembered; I long since (as many others have) entered into the heavy Consideration thereof, purposing so to have contented my self with a light View of that which might well be for ever of all good Christians Lamented, but hardly or never Remedied; until that afterward: led with a more earnest Desire to know the Strange and Fatal Mutations by this Barbarous Nation in former time brought upon a great part of the World, as also so much as I might, to see so great a Terror of the present time, and on what Terms it standeth with the rest, I had with long Search and much Labour, mixt with some Pleasure and mine own reasonable Contentment, passed through the whole Melancholy Course of their Tragical History: Yet without purpose ever to have commended the same or any part thereof, unto the Remembrance of Posterity, as deeming it an Argument of too high a reach, and fitter for some more happy Wit, better furnished with such helps both of Nature and Art, as are of necessity requisite for the Undertaking of so great a Charge, than was my self, of many Thousands the Meane. Being not unmindful also of that which the Poet (keeping decorum) saith in like case, though far less matter, of himself:

Cum canerem Reges & prælia, Cithibus aurem
Vellit, & admonuit: Pastorem Titere pingues
Pascere oportet oves, deductum ducere carnem.

When I did Sing of Mighty Kings, or else of bloody War,
Apollo pluckt me by the Ear, and said I went too far:
Beside: a Shepherd Titurus, his fadings for to feed,
And for to fit his Rural Song unto his slender Reed.

Besides that, so many Difficulties even at the first presented themselves unto my View, as to overcome the same, if I should take the Labour in hand, seemed to me almost impossible: For beside the Sea and World of matter I was to pass through, (requiring both great Labour and Time) full of the most rare Example, both of the better and worse Fortune, in Men of all sorts and conditions, yielding more Pleasure unto the Reader, than Facility to the Writer; I saw not any (among so many as had taken this Argument in hand) whom I might as a sure Guide or Load-star, long follow in the Course of this so great a History: Many Right Worthy, and Learned Men (whose Memory my Soul honoureth) contenting themselves, to have with their Learned Pens enrolled in the Records of never dying Fame; some, one great Expedition or Action, some another, as in their times they fell out; yea, the Turkish Histories and Chronicles themselves (from whom the greatest light, for the continuation of the History, was in reason to have been expected) being in the Declaration of their own Affairs, (according to their Barbarous manner) so sparing and short, as that they may of right be accounted rather short rude Notes, than just Histories, rather pointing Things out, than declaring the same, and that with such Obscurity, by changing the ancient and usual Names, as well of whole Kingdoms, Countries, and Provinces, as of Cities, Towns, Rivers, Mountains and other Places; yea and oftentimes Men themselves into other Strange and Barbarous Names of their own devising; in such sort as might well stay an intensive Reader, and deprive him of the Pleasure, together with the Profit he might otherwise expect by the Reading thereof; whereunto to give Order, Perspicuity and Light, would require no small Travail and Pain: Not to speak in the mean time of the diversity of Reports in the Course of the whole History, such as is oftentimes most hard, if not altogether impossible to Reconcile. Notwithstanding all which Difficulties, with many others more proper unto my self, having with long Labour and diligent Search, passed through the Course of the whole History, and so in some reasonable sort satisfied my self therein, I thought it not amiss, as well for the Worthiness of the matter, as for the Zeal I bear to the Christian Commonwealth, and for the satisfying also of some others my good Friends very desirous of the same, to make proof if out of the dispersed Works of many Right Worthy Men, I could set down one orderly and continue History of this so Mighty an Empire, with the Great and Fatal mutation, or rather Subversion of many Right Strong and Flourishing Kingdoms and States, (the proper Work of mighty Empires, still encreasing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud Monarchy hath already daunted a great part of the World, being so many and so strange, as that more or more wonderful were not ever to be seen in any of the greatest Monarchies of antient Time or Memory; and so together, and as it were under one View, and at one Shew; to lay open unto the Christian Reader, what I was glad to seek for out of the confused Labours of many: A Work so Long and Labourious, as might well have deterred a Right Regulate and Constant Mind from the undertaking thereof, being as yet to my Knowledge not undergone or performed by any: Wherein, among such Variety, or more truly to say, contrariety of Writers, I did content my self, as a blind man led by his Guide, happily of no better sight than himself, to tread the steps of that or that the Learned and Faithful Works of many, according to my simple Judgment, to make Choice of that was most probable, still supplying with the perfection of the better, what I found wanting or defective in the Weaker, and in the propounding unto my self no other Mark to aim at, than the very Truth of the History; as that which is it Writing of self of Power to give Life unto the Dead Letter, and to cover the Faults escaped in the homely Penning, or in compiling compiling thereof. Which the better to perform, I Collected so much of the History as possibly I could, out of the Writings of such as were themselves present, and as it were Eye-witnesses of the greatest part of that they Write, and so as of all others best able, most like also to have left unto us the very Truth. Such is the greatest part of so much of the History of the Greek Empire, as I have (for the better Understanding, of the rising of the Turks in this History set down) gathered out of the Doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all Writing such Things as they themselves saw, or were for most part in their time, and near unto them done. Such are the Wonderful and almost Incredible Wars between old Anurath the Second, and his Foster-Child the Fortunate Prince of Epirus, of the Turks commonly called Scanderberg, and by that wayward Tyrant at his Death, together with his Kingdom, delivered, as it were, by Inheritance, unto his Son, the Great and Cruel Sultan Mahomet, all Written by Marinus Barletius, himself an Epirot, and in all those troublesome Times then living in Scodra, a City of the Venetians joying upon Epirus. Such is the Woful Captivity of the Imperial City of Constantinople, with the miserable Death of the Greek Emperor Constantinus Palologus, and the Fatal Ruine of the Greek Empire, Written by Leonardus Chienfis, Archbishop of Mytilene, being himself then present, and there taken Prisoner. Such is the Lamentable History of the Rhodes, taken for most out of J. Fontanus his Three Books de bello Rhodio, a Learned Man then present, and in great Credit with Villiers the great Master, at such time as that famous Island, after it had by him and the other Worthy Knights of the Order, been most wonderfully of long Defended, was to the great rath of Christendom taken by the Great Sultan Solymán. Such is the most Tragical History of Bajazet, Solymán's youngest Son, Collected out of the notable Epistles of Augerius Busbequius, Legations Turcicae, he himself then lying Ambassador for the Empiror Ferdinand at Constantinople, and present in Solymán's Camp, at such time as he himself in Person, went over with his Army into Asia, to Countenance his eldest Son Selymus, who Succeeded him in the Empire, against his Valiant younger Brother Bajazet, and beside well acquainted with the Great Bajazet, Achmet, Rustan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the History following. Such is also the History of the taking of the ancient City of Tripolis in Barbary, from the Knights of Malta, by Sinan the proud Bassa, Written by Nicholas Nicholy, Lord of Arfeuille, present at the same time with the Lord of Aramont, then Ambassador for the French King unto Solymán. So might I say also of the miserable spoil of the Fruitful and Pleasant Islands of the Mediterranean, made by Luitz Bassa, Solymán his Brother in Law, and Great Admiral, with the submitting of the Island of Naxos, to the Turks Obedience, Written by John Crispe, at that time Duke of the same Island. And so likewise of diverse other parts of the History, too long to rehearse. But forasmuch as every Great and Famous Action, had not the Fortune to have in it a Caesar, such as both could and would commend unto Posterity, by Writing that, whereof they might truly say, They were themselves a great part, many Right Excellent Generals contenting themselves with the Honor of the Field, and their Glory there Won, leaving the Honourable Fame thereof to be by others reported, for lack of such most certain Authors, or rather (as I before said) Eye-witnesses, I gathered so much as I could of what remained, out of the Works of such as being themselves Men of Great Place, and well acquainted with the Great and Worthy Personages of their time, might from their Mouths, as from certain Oracles, Report the undoubted Truth of many most Famous Exploits done both by themselves and others: As might Pau. Jovius from the mouth of Muleassif King of Tunes, from Vastius the Great General, from Auria the Prince of Memphis, Charles the Emperor his Admiral, and such others: Or, else out of the Writings of such as were themselves great Travellers into the Turks Dominions, and withal, diligent observers of their Affairs and State, as were the Physicians Pantaleon, Minadoic, and Leunclavius, (of all others a most curious Searcher of their Antiquities and Histories) unto which great Clerks, and some others of that Learned Profession, we may Worthily attribute the greatest Light and Certainty of that is Reported, of a great part of the Turkish Affairs. But these in the Course, of so long a History failing also (as by conferring that which is hereafter Written, together with their Histories, is easily to be perceived) to perfect that I had taken in Hand, I took my refuge unto the Writings of such other Learned and Credible Authors, as of whose Integrity and Faithfulness, the World hath not to my Knowledge at any time yet doubted: That, for these few late Years, I was glad out of the German and Italian Writers in their own Language, in part to borrow the Knowledge of these late Affairs: As also from the credible and certain Report, of some such Honourable minded Gentlemen of our own Country, as have either for their Honors sake served in these late Wars in Hungary, or upon some other Occasions, spent some good times in Travelling into the Turks Dominions; but especially unto the Imperial City of Constantinople, the chief Seat of the Turkish Empire, and Place of the Great Turks abode: Amongst whom, I cannot but deservedly remember my kind Friend and Cousin Mr. Rog. Howe, unto whose discreet and curious Observations, during the time of his late abode at Constantinople, I justly account my self for many things beholden. In which Course of my Proceedings, if the Reader find not himself so fully satisfied, as he could desire, I would be glad, by him my self, to be better informed; as being no less desirous to learn the Truth, of that I know not, than willing to impart to others, that little which I know.

So Wishing thee all Happiness, I bid thee farewell.

The General HISTORY OF THE TURKS,

Before the Rising of the

Othoman Family,

With all the Noble EXPEDITIONS of the Christian Princes against them.

THE glorious Empire of the Turks, the present Terror of the World, hath amongst other things nothing in it more wonderful or strange, than the poor beginning of it self, so small and obscure, as that it is not well known unto ourselves, or agreed upon even among the best Writers of their Histories, from whence this barbarous Nation, that now so triumpheth over the best part of the World, first crept out or took their beginning. Some (after the manner of most Nations) derive them from the Trojans, but thereunto by the affinity of the words Turci and Turci, supposing (but with what probably I know not) the word Turci or Turks to have been made of the corruption of the word Turci, the common name of the Trojans: as also for that the Turks have of long time inhabited the lesser A S I A, wherein in the ancient and most famous City of TROY sometime stood. No great reason in my deeming; yet give the Authors thereof leave therewith to please themselves, as well as some others, which dwelling much further off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probability at all; and that with such earnestness, as if they could not elsewhere have found any so honorable Ancestors. Other some report them to have first come out of PERSIA, and of Iwot not what City there to have taken their name: neither want there some which affirm them to have taken their beginning out of ARABIA, yea, and some out of SYRIA, with many other far fetched devices concerning the beginning and name of this people; all serving to no better purpose, than to shew the uncertainty thereof. Among others, Philip of MORNAY the noble and learned Frenchman, in his worthy Work concerning the crossness of the Christian Religion, seemeth (and that with such good reason) to derive the Turks, together with the Tartars, from the Jews, namely from the Ten Tribes, which were by Salmanafer King of ASSIRIA in the time of Ozi King of ISRAEL, carried away into Captivity, and by him confined into MEDIA, and the other unpeopled Countries of the North: whose going thither is not unaptly described by Eldras, where among the great hords of the Tartars, in the farthest part of the World Northward, even at this day are found some, that still retain the names of Dan, Zabulon and Naphthali, a certain argument of their descent: whereunto also the word Tartar or Tatar, signifying in the Syrian-Tongue, remnants or leavings; and the word Turk, a word of disgrace, signifying in Hebrew, banished men, seemeth might well to agree. Besides that, in the Northern Countries of RUSSIA, SARMATIA, and LYTUANIA, are found greater store of the Jewish Nation, than elsewhere, and so nearer unto the Tartarians fill the more: whereunto Jo. Laurenceus the most curious Searcher out of the Turks Antiquities and Monuments, addeth as a farther Conjecture of the descent of those barbarous Northern people from the Jews, that in his travel through LIVONIA into LYTHUANIA in the Country near unto the Metropolitain City of RIGA, he found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in Language from the other Country-people of the Curons and Estons, no less barbarous than themselves; who had always in their mouths as a perpetual lamentation, which they with doleful moans daily repeated abroad in the fields, Fera, Fera, Mafco Lon: whereby they were thought to lament over JERUSALEM and DAMASCO, as forgetful of all other things in their ancient Country, after so many worlds of years, and in a desolate place so far distant thence. And Munster in his Description of LIVONIA, repeating the like words, reports, That this rude people being demanded What they meant by these words so often and so lamentably by them without cause uttered: answered, That they knew no more, than that they had been so of long taught by their Ancestors But to leave these Opinions concerning their beginning, so divers and uncertain, and to follow greater probabilities: as concerning the place from whence they came, it is upon better ground thought by divers others, and those of the best Historians. That this barbarous Nation which hath of late brought such fatal mutations upon so great a part, not of Christendom only, but even of the whole World, took their first beginning out of the bare and cold Country of SCYTHIA: induced thereunto both by the Authority of the greatest Cosmographers, as by most apparent reasons. Pomponius Mela the Describer of the World, reckoning up the people near unto the great River TANAIIS (the boulder of EUROPE from ASIA Eastward) amongst others maketh mention of the Turks, in these words, Geloni utriusq. Hyemum habitant, Justa Thyrsageta Turcae, quibus Hyemum occupant, aluntur, canendo. Tum continus rupibus late operta & desertis regio ad Arymphos usque permittitur.

The Geloni inhabit a City of Wood, and fore by the Thyrgives and Turks possess the vast Forests, and live by hunting. Then, a rough and desert Country, with continual Rocks, is facetiously extended even as far as unto the Arymphians. Pliny also in like manner reckoning up the Nations about the Fens of MÆOTIS, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, faith, Deinde, Euzaeas, Cotiae, Cicimiani, Messeniani, Cofcoboci, Choatra, Zige, Dandari, Tullagete, Turca, usque ad silitudines salustio convallibus artemis, ultra quae Arymphi qui Arphici perierunt montes: Next unto them live the Euzaeas, Cotae, Cicimiani, Messeniani, Cofcoboci, Choatra, Zige, Dandari, the Thullagets and Turks, unto the deserts rough with woody Valleys: beyond whom are the Arymphians, which border upon the Riphian mountains. And Ptolemy in the Description of SARMATIA ASIATICA, maketh mention of the Turki, whom many learned men suppose to have been the same Nation with the Turks. Unto which ancient Testimonies of reverend Antiquity, add the manners and conditions of the Turks, their ancient attire, their gestures, their weapons, and manner of riding and fight, their language and dialect, so well agreeing with the Scythians; and a man shall find matter enough sufficient to persuade him in reason, that the Turks have undoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythies; whom they in many things resemble, and with whom of all other Nations they best agree.

Now it hath been no less doubted also, among the Writers of the Turks Histories, at what time, and for what causes the Turks (to the trouble of the World) left their natural Seats in the cold Country of SCYTHIA, to seek themselves in other more pleasant and temperate Countries more Southerly, than it had been of their Original beginning. Blondus and Platina report them, enforced with a general want, to have forsaken their native Country, and followed their better Fortune, in the year of our Lord, 755, with whom also Seguinus agreeeth in the cause of their departure, but not in the time or place, when or whereby they departed: for they (as he saith) issued out of their dwelling places in the year of Grace, 844, by the Straits of the Mountain CAUCASUS: whereas the other with greater probability suppose them to have come forth by the Caspian Straits: which the Turks also (as Sabellicus affirm of themselves, their Ancestors (as they say) being by their Neighbors driven out of the Caspian Mountains. Some others there be that report them to have forsaken their native Country, neither enforced thereunto by necessity, or the power of others; but for their valor sent for the Sultan of PERSIA, to aid him in his Wars: unadvisedly supposing that to have been the cause of their flight, which indeed happened long time after, as in the process of this History shall appear. But whatsoever the assured causes of want, or of the enemies power, might induce them unto, a greater power no doubt it was that stirred them up, even the hand of the Almighty, who being the Author of all Kingdoms upon Earth, as well those which he hath appointed as Scourges wherewith to punish the World, as others more blessed, will have his work perfectly full of Divine Majesty, to appear in the stirring of them up from right small beginnings, in the increasing and establishing of their greatness and power, to the astonishment of the World; and in the ruin and destruction of them again, the course of their appointed time once run. As for the difference of the time of their coming forth, before remembered, it may reasonably be referred to the divers emotions of that people, who being not under the command of any one, but of their divers Governors, as the manner of that people was, are not to be thought to have come forth all at once, either for one cause; but at divers times, some sooner, some later, and that for divers causes. This people thus stirred up, and by the Caspian Ports passing thorough the Georgian Country, then called IBERIA, near unto the Caspian Sea, first settled upon a part of the greater ARMENIA, and that with so strong hand, that it is by their society yet holden at this day, and of them called TURCOMANIA; of all other the most true Progeny of the ancient Turks. In which great Country they of long under their divers Leaders, in the manner of their living most resembling their Ancestors, roamed up and down with their Families and herds of Cattel, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades, their Country men, without any certain places of abode, yet at great Unity among themselves, as is not having much to lole, or wherefore to strive.

The first Kingdom of the Turks erected in Persia by Tangrolipix, Chieftain of the Selzucian Family: with the success thereof.

His wandering and unregarded people, but now the terror of the world, thus first seated in ARMENIA, long time there lived in that wide Country, after their rude and wonted manner, (from which the Turcoman Nation their Posterity in that place, even at this day, as we said, much differeth not) and not only notably defended the Country, thus by them at the first possessed, but still increasing farther and farther, and gaining by other mens hands, became at length dreadful unto their Neighbour, and of some time also farther off; whereunto the effeminate cowardliness of those delicate people of ASIA, with whom they had to do, gave no less furtherance than their own valor; being nevertheless an hardly rough people, though not much skilful or trained up in the feats of War.

The Fame of these Turks, together with their fortune, thus daily increasing, and the mighty Empire of the Saracens as it declined, which under their Chieftains, the Successors of the false Prophet Mahomet, having in less than the space of two hundred years overpread not only the greatest part of ASIA and AFRICK, even unto GADES and the Pillars of Hercules; but also passing over that strait, had overwhelmed almost all SPAIN; and not there staying, but passing the Pyrene, had pierced even into the heart of France, and diverse other parts of Christendom, as namely ITALY, SICILY, the famous Island of the RHODES, with many others of the MEDITERRANEAN: now divided in it self, and rent into many Kingdoms, turned their victorious arms from the Christians, upon one another, to the mutual destruction of themselves and their Empire. Amongst other the Sarafin Sultans, which forgetting their Obedience to their great Caliph, took upon them the Sovereignty of Government (which admitteth no partner) was one Mahomet Sultan of PERSIA, a right great Prince, who hardly beset on the one side with the Indians, and on the other with the Caliph of BABYLON his mortal Enemy, prayed Aid of the Turks his Neighbours, who were now come even to the side of ARAXIS, the bounds of his Empire: unto which his request the Turks easily granted, in hope thereby to find a way for them afterwards to enter into PERSIA, and so sent him 3000 hardy men under the leading of one Togru Macule, the Son of Mikail a valiant Captain, and chief of the Selzucian Tribe or Family; whom the Greeks commonly call Tangrolipix, and some others, Selduck, or Sadeck, names (as I suppose) corrupted of the great Family whereof he was descended. By the aid of this Tangrolipix (for now we will call him, as by the name most used) Mahomet the Persian Sultan overcame Pajafiri the Caliph of BABYLON, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of his Turkish Archers. This war thus happily ended, the Turks desiring to return home, requested of the Sultan leave to depart, and with a safe convoy to be conducted unto the river ARAXIS, and there to have the passage of that swift river opened unto them, which was by the Persians strongly kept by two Castles built upon each end of the bridge, whereby the River was to be passed. But Mahomet loath to forgo such necessary men, by whom he had obtained to great a Victory, and purposing to employ them further in his Service against the Indians, would by no means hearken unto their request; but seeming therewith to be discontented, commanded them to speak no more thereof, threatening them violence if they should more presume to talk of their departure. The Turks therefore doubtful of their estate, and fearing further danger, secretly withdrew themselves unto the desert of CARAVONITIS: and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field against so many millions of the Saracens, lived the many months, by continual Incursions and Raids which they made out of the desert Forest into the Countries adjoining: wherewith Mahomet greatly indignant, sent out an Army of twenty thousand men under the Conduct of ten of his best Captains, against them: who for want of water and other necessities, desiring to enter the Forest, encamped themselves on the side of the Forest, there to confute what course to take. But Tangrolipix, who with his Turks lay a great way off in the covert of the Woods and Mountains, understanding of the coming of his Enemies, and of the manner of their lying, thought it best upon the sudden to light to set upon the Saracens and Persians: if so happily he might overthrow them by policy, whom he was not able to encounter in plain battel. Upon which resolution having travelled two days long march in the desert, the third day at night he suddenly set upon his Enemies, lying negligently in their Trenches, and by his unexpected coming brought such a fear upon them, that they without longer stay betook themselves to flight, every man dusting for himself, without regard of others. This Victory he happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) thoroughly furnished with Armor, Horfes, and abundance of all things needful for the Wars, kept the Woods and Forests no longer as a Thief or Out-law, but showed himself in the open field, where daily repaired unto him numbers of Rogues and Vagabonds seeking after spoil; with many other desperate Villains, who for fear of punishment were glad of such a Refuge: so that in a short space his Army was grown to be fifty thousand strong; and so much the stronger, for that they had nothing to trust unto more than the valour of themselves. Whilst Tangrolipix thus increased, Mahomet enraged with the overthrow of his Army, in his fury caused all those ten Captains which had the leading thereof, to have their eyes plucked out; threatening also to attire all the Souldiers that fled out of the battel, in Womens apparel, and so disgraced to carry them about as Cowards; and withal raised a great Army to the suppressing of the Turks. All things being now in readiness, he set forward; when by the way the Souldiers whom he had to threatened to disgrace, suddenly fell to the Enemy: with which coming Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and strengthened, resolved to give the Sultan battel. And so boldly coming on, met with him at ISPAHAN a City of PERSIA, where was fought betwixt them a most terrible battel, with wonderful slaughter on both sides. In the heat of which battel, Mahomet unadvisedly riding to and fro to encourage his Souldiers, killing with his horse, brake his Neck: upon which much more both the Armies coming to agreement, by common consent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his stead, and so made him King of PERSIA, and of all the other large Dominions unto that Kingdom belonging.

Armenia, now called Turcomania, the first seat of the Turks, their first coming out of Scythia.

Togru, afterwards called Tangrolipix, first to aid the Persian Sultan.

This was the first Kingdom of the Turks, begun by the good Fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 years after their coming out of SCYTHIA, in the year also of our Lord, 1030. Constantinus Monomachus then reigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the Reign of Romanus Argirus, Constantine his Predecessor, Tangrolipix by rare Fortune thus of a mean Captain became King of PERSIA; forthwith commanded the Garrison which kept the bridge over the River ARAXIS, to be removed, and so free passage to be given unto the Turks his Country-men, at their pleasure to come over: who in great numbers repaired into PERSIA, where they were by the new Sultan well provided for, and by little and little promoted unto the greatest Dignities of that Kingdom; the Persians and Saracens, the ancient Inhabitants thereof, being by these new come Guests now kept under, and as it were trodden under foot. Together with this Kingdom, the Turks received the Mahometan Superstition, the which they before not much abhorred, as men using Circumcision: So that hard it is to say whether Nation lost more; the Persians and Saracens by the loss of so great a Kingdom; or the Turks, by embracing so great a Vanity.

Tangrolipix with his Turks thus possessed of the Kingdom of PERSIA, beheld not himself there, with long content, but made War upon his Neighbour Princes, especially against Pajafiri the Caliph such Honours were bestowed upon him, not of the Emperors meet; Bounty, but as the due Rewards of his worthy Deeds. Notwithstanding after the death of the Emperor, sick of his Fathers disface, and swelling with the weight of Ambition, fought by secret means to have aspired into the Empire: whereof the Emperress having intelligence, caused him to be apprehended and brought in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was found guilty of the foul Trespass, and so coming to the great Sear again, to receive the heavy Sentence of death. In which woful plight, uttering as a man out of hope, and now itany forlorn, he called all the beholders with a forwofull compassion, to beseech that he was a man of exceeding strength, so was he of incomparable feature and beauty, adorned with many rare qualities and virtues unanswerable thereunto: wherewith the Emperress moved with the rett, or pierced with a secret good liking, is hard to say, reversed the Sentence of Condemnation ready to have been executed upon him, and gave him Pardon. And shortly after he came to the Court, first for him as he was going into the City, to his native Country, and made him General of all her Forces, with a full resollution in her self to marry him, and to make him Emperor, if he might by any means get the Writing from never matting and him so compelled. For the compassing wherof, he entered into a device full of feminine policy, with one of her Eunuchs, whom he purposed to use as her pander for the circumventing of the Patriarch. This crafty Eunuch instructed by his Mistress, caused the Patriarch Tammar Xiphilinus, a man both, for his age and integrity of life much honoured; told him in great secrecy, that the Emperress had in her self a great good liking to a young Gentleman, a Nephew of his called Barda (then a Gallant of the Court) as that she could be content to take him to her Husband, and to make him Emperor; if he might by his Holiness be perswaded that she might with safe confidence do it, and by him to be discharged of the rash Oath she had unadvisedly taken, never to marry again, wherof he had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwise a Contemner of worldly honours, yet moved with so great a Preferrment of his Nephew, promised the Eunuch to do therein whatsoever the Emperress had desired, which he accordingly performing, caused the sending for the Senators one by one; till whole good of the matter chiefly rested, he with much gravity propounded unto them the dangerous estate of the Commonwealth; with the Troubles daily increasing, and the continual fear of foreign Enemies, not to be remedied by the weak hand of a Woman, or the authority of a young Child, but requiring (as he said) the valiant courage of a great worthy Man. After that, he began to find great fault with the rash Oath which the Emperress had taken a little before the death of her Husband, never to marry; and uttely condemning that as contrary to the Word of God, and unjustly exacted of her, he caused to satiate the jealous humour of the Emperress her late Husband, that for any good of the Commonwealth, he in fine perswaded them, that the unlawful Oath might be revoked, and the Emperress set at liberty: at her pleasure, by their good liking to make choice of such a man for her Husband, as might better undertake to manage affairs of the Empire, more at her own pleasure, than to tender a Lady and three young Children. The great part of the Senate thus persuaded by the Patriarch, and the rest with Gifts and Promises overcame by the Emperors, the Patriarch delivered up to her the Writing the so much defired, and discharged her of her Oath; whereupon the forthwith calling unto her whom she caused to be proclaimed Emperor. Now though Eudokia after the manner of a Woman, to have had her Husband (whom the even from the bottom of di pair had exalted to the highest Type of Honour) in all things Loyal and Placant: whereunto he was bound by his Oath, yet she was far otherwise minded (being a man of a proud nature, and haughty spirit) became weary of such Obsequence, and began by little and little to take away day more and more upon him. And for that the Imperial Provinces in the East, were in some part lost, and the rest in no small danger; he and she did not think fit to leave the Government, and to new himself an Emperor indeed, nor as the Servant of the Emperress, left the Court, and passed over into ASIA, although it were without a small Army and evil appointed: for why, it was no case matter for him to furnish out his Army with all things necessary, which by the means of his Father's great Wealth, and Power, the great danger and dishonour of the Empire were utterly neglected. Nevertheless the Turkish Sultan, who at the same time with a great Power invaded the Provinces of the Empire, hearing of his coming, and that he was a man of greater valour than his self, thought he might grapple with him; retired himself, and drew off his Army, first sending one party thence into the South part of ASIA, and the other into the North part, which spoiled all the Country before them: as they went, and suddenly surprising the City of NEOCESARIA, sacked it, and so laded themselves with Spoil, and returned again. But the Emperress understanding thereof, sent forth a messenger grievously therewith, drawing out certain bands and companies of the best and most ready Soldiers in his Army, and with them coasting along the Country to get betwixt the Turks and home, refused therein such expectation, that he was upon the point of returning back, and so suddenly charging them, brought such confusion among them, that they berook themselves to their heels, leaving behind them for haift, their Baggage and Carriages, with all the Prisoners and Booty they had before taken at NEOCESARIA, and in their late Expedition: yet was there no greatness of Victory, because the Turkish Army, being now wearied with long travel, were not able far to follow the chase. From thence taking his way unto SIRIA, he sent part of his Army to MELITENA, and carried himself from ALEPPO, a great booty both of men and treasure. At which time also the City of HIE-RODOLPHUS, a strong walled Town, lying but shortly after built a strong Castle. But while he there stayed, news was brought unto him, that the other part of his Army which he had sent away, was overthrowen by the Turks; for the relief of whom, he rose with all haift and marched towards them: but being in number far inferior to them, he was forced to retire, as he lay encamped; insoford much so, that it was thought almost impossible for him to have escaped. At which time also the Governor of ALEPPO traitorously revolted from him, and joyined his Forces with the Enemy, making good his offering, but affluently to have been taken him. But while he thus was doing nothing but of a most glorious Victory, and was in mind dividing the Spoil, the Emperress without finding themselves not able long to hold out fall to composition, and yielded the City. But shortly after, the Soldiers left there in Garrison for the keeping thereof, going out to seek for forage, were by the Turks suddenly oppressed with a great number of their Forces, who, perceiving that the Emperor understanding, sent thither some of his Bryennius to relieve the City; who encountering with the Turks, and finding himself too weak, sent unto the Emperor for aid: who not knowing the strength of the Enemies, blamed him of cowardise, yet sent unto him Nicomedes Bagladius with this Army; who joyning his Forces with the Bryennius, and giving the Turks battle, came to flight. But following to fast upon them by their Trenches, and Bryennius making no great halt after, he had his horse slain under him, and so on foot heavily laden with armor, and not able to shift for himself, was there taken and carried to the Sultan; who, perceiving his condition, and oftentimes questioning with him concerning the Emperor, and shewing him his own Power, examined him also of the Empire.

Tangrologis was now dead, and the Sultan now in the field against the Emperor, was Assau his Son, a man of great wisdom and discretion, who considering the doubtful event of battle, sent Embassadors unto the Emperor to inform him of peace. But he (perswaded by some of his Nobles) refused to receive them. The Sultan for peace, proceeded but by means of a small party, and so the Emperor, by a small army, and distrust he had in his own Power, or else to gain time until some greater strength came, he sent a small regard of the Embassadors or their Messengers, but proudly willed them to tell their Masters That if he were desirous of Peace, he should send him word by some great Prelate, or Ambassador, if he came, he would receive him. The Sultan, when he saw this, he lay encamped, for him to lose ground, without other answer, commanded them away. Now had the Emperor (as is before said) sent away part of his Army by Rufinus against Chitana, whom he sent now for in half again: but he hearing of the approach of the Sultan, by the post of Amos, Marchmont, one of his Captains was reformed for his rashness, and sent him to the Roman Frontiers, leaving the Emperor destitute of his help. At which time also a Company of the Scythians which served in the Emperor's Camp, revolted unto the Turks; but without some resolution, that the rest of their Fellowes might follow, he sent them away, and he himself, nevertheless, the Emperor presuming of his strength as he had, or carried headlong with his own Fortune, resolved to give the Turks battle, and therefore putting his men in Order, set upon them. Who somewhat troubled with the Emperor's sudden a resolution, as being yet in former doubt, and not being prepared themselves in order of battle, received the Enemies' assault, still giving a little ground, as men not greatly desirous either to fight or to fly. This fight continuing long, and the day now declining, the Emperor doubting left the Sultan should find part of his Army to assault his Camp (from which he was now drawn somewhat far, and he had left the rest of his Army in the field) he retired to be founded, and so began orderly to retire himself with them that were about him, which others afar off in the battle beholding, and supposing him to have fled, began themselves to fly, aiming. Of which so shameful flight and rout, the great Andronicus, King of Tolen, Duke, the late Emperor's Brother, and his other Nobles, great Cesar, the Wife of his Son, scarcely avoided, at the Honour of Digenes was the cause for he commanding a great part of the Army

Army: by whom Diogenes, with his Friends and Followers, were overthrown and discomfited. Diogenes himself flying to the City of A D A N A, was there hardly besieged by Andronicus, and in the end glad to yield himself, upon condition, that he should resign the Empire, and so for ever after to lead a private life. For whose safety, certain of the chief of the Clergy sent of purpose from Michael the Emperor, gave their Faith: Diogenes all armed in black, yielded himself to Andronicus; by whom he was brought to C O T A I, then the Metropolitane City of P H R I G I A, there to expect what further Order should be taken from him from the Court: during which time he fell sick, being (as many supposed) secretly poisoned. But whilst he there lay languishing, a heavier doom came from the young Emperor, That he should have his Eyes put out: which was forthwith in most cruel manner done; the Clergy-men that had before for his safety gaged their Faith, crying out in vain against so horrible a cruelty. Thus deprived of his sight, he was conveyed into the Island of P R O T A, where his Eyes for lack of looking up, purrified and Worms breeding in them, with such an odious smell as that no man could abide to come nigh him, he in short time after died, when he had reigned three years, eight months. All which misery was thought to have happened unto him through the malice of Cesar, without the knowledge of the young Emperor.

Asan hearing of the miserable end of the late Emperor Diogenes, was therewith much grieved, and the more, for that the League which he had to his good content so lately made with him, was thereby come to nought: wherefore in revenge thereof, he was great Power invaded the Imperial Province; not for spoil only, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the same. Against whom, Michael the Emperor sent Isaac Comnenus his Lieutenant, with a great Army: who meeting with the Turks, and joining battle, was by them overthrown with all his Army, and taken Prisoner; and glad afterwards for a great sum of money to redeem himself. After which overthrow, the Emperor sent his Uncle Cesar with another Army against them, who was by Rufinus, that had before revolted from the Emperor, overthrown at the River S A N G A R I U S, and taken Prisoner; whom he for all that, shortly after set at liberty again, and joining with him against the Turks, were both together by them discomfited and taken Prisoners, but afterwards redeemed; Cesar by the Emperor, and Rufinus by his Wife. This Rufinus was a notable Traytor, who joining with the Turks, did what he would in the Provinces of the Empire in the offer ASIA: for the repressing of whom, the Emperor sent Alexius Comnenus, a young man, but very politic and courageous; who secretly practising with the Turks that were great with Rufinus, had him at last by them for a sum of money betrayed into their Power: who forthwith sent him to C O N S T A N T I N O P L E to the Emperor, by whom he was imprisoned, but afterwards set at liberty and employed against Ishmus and his Brother, then up in Rebellion against the Emperor.

But to come nearer to the Turkish Affairs. Culul-Mufes, who with his Cousin Melch and others, were for the recovery of their Cousin sent into A R A B I A, as is before declared, now in the beginning of the Reign of Asan, returned: and as the envious Competitors of his Kingdom, having raised a great Power of their Friends and Partakers, were now ready to have tried the matter with him by plain battle. Against whom also, the Sultan on the other side had brought into the field his whole Forces, and was now likewise ready to have encountered them near unto the City of E R E S. But whilst the Turks thus divided, flood ready to destroy themselves, the Caliph of B A B Y L O N (from whom though the Turks had taken all Temporal Sovereignty, yet in matters of Religion still held him in great reverence and esteem, as his great Bishop, and the Successor of their great Prophet) considering that nothing could be more dangerous to his Sect and Religion, than that civil dissension, the late confusion and utter ruin of the Sarafin Empire, and Authority of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in these new States, now the chief stay of the Mahometan Superstition: setting aside all Pontifical Formality, whereby he was bound not to go out of his own house, came with all speed, even as the Armies were now ready to join battle, and thrusting himself into the midst betwixt them, and with the reverence of his Person, what with his eloquent persuasion, wrought so much, and prevailed to lay down both Parties, that they were content to lay down their Weapons, and to stand to his Order and Judgment: which was, That Asan the Sultan should still enjoy his Kingdom and Territories, whole and entire unto himself, as he did: and that Culul-Mufes and his Sons, should be him, and to inherit the Kingdoms of the Constantinopolitan Empire, should there of subdue for such as they could unto themselves, and to be thereof accounted the only Lords and Governors: which Order as it was unto the Turks, and for the maintenance of the Mahometan Superstition, very wholesome and commodious, so was it unto the Christians, for the weal and Religion most dangerous and hurtful, as in process of time by proof it appeared. For by this mean, in short time after, Culul-Mufes with his Cousins and Sons subdued all M E D I A, with a great part of A R M E N I A, C A P A D O C I A, P O N T U S, and B Y T H I N I A, and so a great part of the lesser A S I A. By the aid of this Culul-Mufes, and the favour of the Soldiers, Nicephorus Botaniates aspiring unto the Empire of C O N S T A N T I N O P L E, displaced his Matter, the Emperor, Michael Ducas, after he had reigned six years and fix months, and in the habit of a Monk thrust him into an Abbey; which Urtur by the just Judgment of God, was at length required even with the same measure, and in like manner served by Comnenus; who thrusting him out, succeeded himself in the Empire. Much it was that this Culul-Mufes, with his Sons and Kinsmen did for the enlarging of the Turkish Empire, by the help of the great Persian Sultan, whose Forces, together with their own, in divers Countries conquered by these worthy Leaders his high Kinsmen, and doing great matters, gave occasion for themselves to be accounted Sultans, though indeed they were none, neither their names such as are by some ancient Writers, and others of later time also reported; but unto the Turks themselves by those names, either for Sultans, unknown. Out of these great Commanders, all born of the Selucian Family, hath Atinmus, and others following his report, derived their Dogri, Aspaltemus, Melch, and Belch, whom they suppose to have orderly succeeded Ezad, otherwise called Tangulix the first Founder, and to have done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turks themselves, and the relation of the Greeks, it appears plainly,

Asan, (more truly called As-han, that is to say, the White King) to have been the Son of Tangulix, and to have succeeded him in the Empire: and that by him the Emperor Diogenes was taken, and not by Aspaltemus as they vainly imagine. As for Aspaltemus, whom the Turks by that name know not any thing of his doings, it seemeth to have been a name corrupted of Aspam Salarius, the Brother of Tangulix and Aburmus, and not his Sons Son as they would have it. In like manner Melch also, who hath been forged of Melch the Son of Habram, Tangulix his Brother, and not of Aspaltemus, as some without any good ground report. Whom they finding to have been all great Men in the Selucian Family, with some others also, have both corrupted their names, and given them an imaginary Sovereignty and succession in the Turks first Empire, such as befitte that the Turks themselves acknowledge not, is easily to be refuted out of the Histories of the Greeks, who had with them fill much to do. Wherefore leaving those supposed Princes of the Turks, with their imaginary names, and doings, unto the Authors thereof following more carefully, to return again to the course of our History. Asan the Sultan at the same time that he had by the mediation of the Caliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his Cousin Culul-Mufes; to increase the Honour of his Nation and his own, with his high Kinsmen Aburmus and Melch, two of his most faithful and Government of D A M A S C O and A L E P P O, with that part of S Y R I A which joyneth unto them, of purpose that way to increase upon the Egyptian Caliph, who then had under his Jurisdiction, all, as far as L A O D I C E A, and S Y R I A, yet not with so large Privilege as had Culul-Mufes, unto whom and his Posterity he had yielded the absolute Honour of a Sultan or King, over such Countries and Provinces as they should win from the Christians: but unto these others his Kinsmen, he gave the Government of the aforesaid Cities of D A M A S C O and A L E P P O, in the Frontiers of his Dominion in S Y R I A conditionally that they should still remain his Vassals, and hold of him as of their Sovereign, whatsoever they had, who nevertheless in short time mightily prevailed upon the Egyptian, still incensing the Turkish Territory with the loss of the Sarafins, whose name together with their Empire, was now by the Turks almost quite driven out of A S I A.

But these proud Branches of the Turkish Empire, thus over-spreading the lesser A S I A, with the greatest part of S Y R I A, were in short time after by the Mercy of God, and the valour of the most Christian and most Religious Princes of the West, cut shorter, and brought again into some better Order. The full discourse whereof, worthy eternal Memory, by others inrolled in the ancient Records of Fame, I purpose not at large to follow, but in brief to touch, for the orderly continuation of the present History, halting to the doings of this are to make a longer stay, as more pertinent unto the dangerous estate of the present time.

It is furnished that whilst Culul-Mufes and his Sons, supposed to have orderly succeeded Ezad, thus mightily prevailed against the Christians in the lesser A S I A on the one side, and Melch with his Cousin against the Egyptian Caliph in S Y R I A on the other side: that one Peter a French Hermit, moved with a devout zeal, according to the manner of that time, went to visit the Sepulchre of our Saviour, with the other holy Places at J E R U S A L E M; who coming into S Y R I A, then for the most part noted by the Turks and Sarafins, diligently observed by the way as he travelled, the Manners and Fashions of these barbarous Nations, their Government, their Cities, their Power and Strength, but above all, the grievous Miseries of the poor oppressed Christians, that there lived in most miserable thralldom among them, without hope of release: all which he in the habit of a poor Pilgrim, at liberty free in view, in the midst of these Miscreants, being without a little low hard-favoured Fellow, and therefore in these more to be contemned than feared: yet under such simple and homely Feature lay unregarded a most subtle sharp and piercing wit, fraught with discretion and sound judgment, fill applying to some use what he saw in his long and painful travel most curiously observed. He cometh to J E R U S A L E M, and performing his devoutness there, saw the grievous misery of the poor devout Christians, to great and heavy, as that greater or more intolerable could none be, wheresoever not a little grieved, he entered into a deep discourse thereof with Simon the Patriarch and Abbot of the Monastery of the Christians (there before built by certain Italian Merchants) and with the Master of the Hospitallars, by whom he was fully informed thereof, as of whatsoever else he required. After much grave Conference, it was at length agreed upon amongst them, that the Patriarch and the grand Master, should in their own, and the names of the other oppressed Christians, write their Letters unto the Pope and the other Christian Princes, concerning their Miseries; and to crave their Aid for the Recovery of those holy places out of the hands of those cruel Infidels; of which Letters the devout Hermit promised himself to be the trusty Carrier, and of their Petitions the most careful Solicitor. Whereupon the Patriarch and grand Master, in the name of the poor oppressed Christians wrote their Letters unto this effect:

We the Citizens of the holy City, and Countrymen of Christ Jesus, daily suffer those things which Simon the King suffered but once, in the last day of his mortality. We are daily buffeted, scourged, and pierced: every day some of us are branded, beheaded, or crucified. We would fly from City to City, unto the remotest parts of the Earth, and remove out of the middle of that Land where our Saviour wrought our Redemption, to lead a poor exile and vagrant life: were it not impious to leave the Land (sacred with the Birth, Death, Resurrection, and Ascension of our Saviour) without Inhabitant, and Priests: and that there should still lack such as would endure Death and Martyrdoms (as such as would inflict the same) and that there should not be such which would as willingly die for Christ, as we do. So long as there were any that would fight against them. These things truly we most miserably suffer: yet was there a time when as our Ancestors feared no such thing, either to themselves or their Posterity. And now perhaps the Turkish Kingdoms of the West live likewise without the least suspicion of fear: but let them be moved by our example and Testimony. The strength of the Turks is daily increased, and ours diminished: The continual gaining of new Kingdoms greiveth them courage: They have already devoured the whole World, in hope. The Forces of the Turks are stronger and stronger than the Forces of the Sarafins, their Policies deeper than the Attempts of the desperate, their Endeavours greater, and their Successors more numerous.

fortunater. They have the Sarafins attempted both Rome and Rome; they have besieged Constantinople, and have wasted not only the sea coasts of Italy, but even the heart of the Land also. Then why should the kingdoms of the West presume themselves to stand in safety out of the peril, when as the chief fortresses of the world have been so endangered? What may the rest of Christendom promise unto it self, seeing that Jerusalem (the seat and spectacle of the Christian Religion) hath been besieged, taken, sacked, rased and triumphed upon? Seeing that of the Christian profession remain but the poor and weak reliques, in comparison of the ancient whole body's? This Land, which is daily besprinkled with our blood, yea the blood it self crieth out for revenge: And we your most humble suplicants, prosecute at your feet, call upon the help, aid, mercy, faith, and religion, of you most blessed Father, of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates Christians our in name and profession only, but in heart, faith, and spirit.

Before the tempest thunder, before the lightning fall upon you, avert from you and your children the storm hanging over your heads: defend us your poor suplicants, deliver your religion from most wicked and accursed slavery. You shall in so doing deserve immortal fame, and God shall reward you so great a salary in this world with terrestrial Kingdoms, and in the world to come with eternal bliss, whose sacred inheritance you shall have defended from the rage of hell.

With these Letters, and plenty of other fecter instructions, the devout Hermit returning into Italy, and coming to Rome, delivered his Letters unto Urban the second of that name, then Pope, with a full discourse of the miseries of the Christians under the Turkish Thralldom, which he had seen at Jerusalem and other places as he travelled; requesting his holy care the redress thereof: with whom he so prevailed, that shortly after, he calling a Council at Clermont in France, among other things, propounded the misery of the poor oppressed Christians at Jerusalem, as an especial matter to be considered of. And having caused the aforesaid Letters to be read unto him and the other Christian Princes, to be openly read in the Council, wherunto three hundred and ten Bishops were then out of divers parts of Christendom assembled, with the Embassadors of all Countries, much moved the whole Assembly to compassion: at which time also the Hermit (whose flowing Eloquence fully counteracted what wanted in his feature,) standing up in the midst of the Council, delivered his message in the name of the afflicted Christians, with their heavy groanings and tears: which as they could not be in Letters expressed, so were they not hardly by the religious Hermit (as by him who having but lately seen both the misery of the men, and desolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the grief thereof) so lively represented, as that it moved the whole Assembly with the like sympathy of heaviness and grief.

Which the Pope perceiving, took thereupon occasion to utter into a large discourse concerning that matter, with many effectual reasons perswading the Fathers and Princes there present, of the necessity of so religious a War to be taken in hand, for the deliverance of their oppressed Brethren out of the Thralldom of the Infidels; and now as well with their present Decrees, as afterwards as they should come into their Countries, by all means to further the same. Which notable persuasion, with the heavy complaint of the Hermit, and the equity of the cause, so much moved the whole Council, and the rest there present, that they all as men inspired with one Spirit, declared their consent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult. God will it, God will it: it which words so often uttered by way of applause, were in the great and most sacred expedition following, much stirred of the devout Christians, as the fortunate signal of their cheerful forwardness, even in their most dangerous enterprises. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be believed (but that the ancient Histories bear witness of the like) how far in one day fourscore thousand Infidels decreed war was by flying Fame dispelled.

The Council dissolved, and the reverend Fathers returning every man home into his own Country, it pleased God by their effectual persuasions to work with the rest of the Christian Princes, and people in general, that in all Countries and Provinces in Christendom, were shortly to be seen men of all sorts in great number, with red Crosses on their breasts (the cognifiance of that sacred expedition) ready of themselves to spend both life and goods for the defence of the Christian Religion, and recovery of the Holy Land. The number of whom is of divers diversely reported; but of most supposed to have been three hundred thousand fighting men: Of whom the chief Commanders were, Godfrey Duke of Lorraine, with his two Brethren, Eustace and Baldwin, all of the honourable House of Buillon; Hugh firmated the Great, brother to Philip then the French King; Raymond and Robert Earls of Flanders; Robert Duke of Normandy, William the Conquerors Son; Stephen de Valois Earl of Chartres; Ademar Bishop of Podie, the Popes Legate; and Peter the Hermit, not to be numbered amongst the least, as chief Author of this most famous expedition: unto whom many other honourable Princes joined themselves, as partakers of their travels, though not with like charge.

The first that set forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Sansavein a noble Gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom followed Peter the Hermit, with forty thousand more; who both travelling through Germany, Hungary and Bulgaria, were glad offensives, especially in the further part of Hungary and Bulgaria, to open themselves a way with the sword; and so with much labour, and no less loss, came at length to Constantinople: where they were not greatly welcome unto the Emperor Alexius Comnenus; who guilty unto himself of the unlawful means whereby he had extorted the Empire from Nicephorus his predecessor, had that expedition of the Christians into the East, in distrust, as purposed against himself, until that fully resolved to the contrary, by the Hermit and others; and that a far greater power was coming after, for the invasion of the Turks, and recovery of the Holy Land; he was content to relieve them now weary of their long travel; and after ward to make room for them that were to come, shipped them over the strait of Bosphorus into Asia; who marching forward into Bithynia, encamped their Army in the Country not far from the City of Nice. In the mean time Godfrey with his Brethren, and divers other Princes that had joynted themselves unto him, with the Germans and Lorraines, and the greatest part of the Army, followed after the same way that the Hermit had taken before him. At which time also Hugh the French Kings Brother, which the Legate, the two Roberts (the one Duke of Normandy, and the other Earl of Flanders) and the rest of the French

Commanders,

Commanders, passing over the Mountains into Italy, came to Rome, with a wonderful great Army: where taking their leave of the Pope, because they would be less troublesome unto the Cities and Countries wherby they were to pass, they divided their great Army into three parts; wherof the one part went to Brundisium, and the other to Bary, and the third to Hydruntum, unto whom also Bohemund one of the great Princes of Apulia, joynted with twelve thousand good soldiers that followed him. From these three Ports the Christian Army departing, and crossing the Adriatick, arrived in safety at Diracchium, and night thereabout upon the coast of Dalmatia: from whence they travelled by land through Macedonia, to Constantinople; where they met with Duke Godfrey and the rest of the Army: whom also at the first, Alexius the Emperor is reported to have but coldly entertained, as jealous of his own estate; until that better perswaded of their demeanors and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich Presents sent unto him by these strange Princes, he joynted with them in league; wherein it was agreed, That the Emperor during the time of this expedition should furnish them with new supplies of men, armour, victuals, and whatsoever else they might want: in regard wherof, the Princes on the other side, promised to restore unto the Empire, what Provinces, what Countries, or Cities they should happily gain out of the hands of the Turks and Sarafins, the City of Jerusalem only excepted: which agreement was afterward on the suspicious Emperor's part but feebly performed. Nevertheless this league so made, he granted the passages, and transported them over the strait into Asia: only Bohemund, for an old grudge betwixt the Emperor Alexius and his Father, would not come to Constantinople, but marching with his Army through the upper Myfia and Thracia, came sooner than any man thought, unto the straight of Hellepontus, and so passed.

Now had Gualter, and the Hermit Peter, with their Army, lien two months in the Country about Nice, expecting the coming of the rest of the Christian Princes: for why, they thought it not good before their coming to attempt any thing against the Enemy, whom they knew to lie not far off very strong. But the common Soldiers weary of so long lying, and nought doing, and pinchd with some wants; and withal disliking of Gualter their chief Commander, and the Hermit Peter, (of whose integrity and holiness they had a greater opinion, than of his prowess and direction) rose up in mutiny, and displacing Gualter, made choice of one Raymond a valiant German Captain, for their General: by whose conduct they took Exergum, a Town of purpose forsaken of the Turks. For they long before understanding what a tempest of war was growing upon them, and that Europe, fought by all means to cut off their that were already come over, as the forerunners of a greater Army following; and therefore had left them this Town, as a bait to train them out of their Trenches. And after that the Christians were thus possessed of the Town, having laid certain strong ambushes, they drew out certain herds of Cattle the more to allure them: all which certain companies of the Christians brought in without any loss, the Turks left winking thereat. With which booty the Christians encouraged, went out three thousand of them to take in a little Town not far off; who were met by the Turks cut off and slain every Mother Son as they were about to have divided the Spoil.

Which overthrow reported into the Town, discouraged even the chief Commanders of the Army, so that they resolved no more to try the fortune of the field, before the coming of their friends. Nevertheless the common Soldiers condemning them of cowardice, chose them a new General, one Godfrey Buill, whom they now requested not, but enforced to go out to revenge the death of their fellows. Which their rashness not long after turned to their own destruction: for ten thousand of them going out of Exergum, to forage the Country, were by the Turks intrapped, and almost all slain, except some few, which by speedy flight escaped. The Turks prosecuting their victory, laid hard siege to them in the Town also, until they had partly with famine, and partly with the sword consumed the most part of them. The Hermit with the poor remainder of his Army took his refuge to Cintie, a Town not far off, before abandoned by the Turks; where with much ado he defended himself until the coming of Duke Godfrey and the rest of the Princes.

Cintie Musli the Sultan was now dead, having left unto his Son Sultan Selwyn many large Countries and Provinces, altogether gained from the Christians in Asia, whom he held in great subjection and thralldom. This warlike Prince having discomfited and almost brought to nought the Hermit's forces, was no less desirous for the withholding of the great Army following; which now being come into Bithynia, and lying before Nicomedia, removing thence, laid siege to the City of Nice, called in ancient times Antigonis, of Antigonis, the Son of Philip that built it; and afterwards Nicea, of Nicea the Wife of King Lyfymachus. In this City dwelt many devout Greeks, Christians; but in such thralldom unto the Turks, that they could do no day anything for the delivery of themselves. This siege endured longer than the Christian Princes had at the first supposed: who although they to the uttermost of their power forced the City on three sides, yet it was still notably defended, new supplies still coming from the Turks by the Lake of Alcanus joyning upon the other side of the City. But after that the Christians, possessed of the Lake, began on that side also to lay hardly unto the City, the Turks discouraged, and seeing themselves bett round with their enemies, yielded up the City the fifth of July, in the year 1097, after it had been fifty days besieged. But whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege, the Turks assailed that quarter of the Camp where the Legat lay; by whom they were notably repulsed, and with great loss enforced to retire unto the Mountains. In this City, amongst the rest of the Turks, was taken Selwyn wife, with two of her Children, whom the Princes sent prisoners to Constantinople. This City so won, was according to the agreement before made, restored unto Alexius the Emperor, whose Fleet had in that siege done good service, by taking the Lake from the Turks.

The City of Nice thus won, the Christian Princes removing thence with their Army, and marching through the Country, came the fourth day after unto a River which watered many rich pastures: where as they were about to have incamped, for the commodiousness of the place, and refreshing of the Army, suddenly news was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now busie in casting up his trenches, That the Turks with a great Army were ready even at hand to charge him. For Selwyn having raised a great power of his own, and aided by the Sultan of Persia his kinsman, was now come with an Army of 60000 strong to give the Christians battle: of whose army and conduct, left the fortifying of his Trenches, and putting his Soldiers in array, set forward to meet him; sending word to the rest of the Princes that lay a far off, to be ready as occasion should require, to relieve him. These two Armies conducted by their most valiant Champions, meeting together, joyous at most fierce and terrible battle, where in short space the Turks lay slain upon heaps; in such fort that they served the Christians instead of Bulwarks. But whilst Bohemund thus prevailed in the battle, certain of the Turks horsemen wheeling about, brake into Bohemund's Camp (not as then altogether fortified, and but disorderly manned) where among the Women, and other weak persons there left, they raised a great tumult and outcry, to the great appalling of them that were fighting in the battle: which Bohemund perceiving, withdrew himself with certain companies into the Camp, from whence he with great slaughter repulsed the Enemy. But returning again into the battle, he found there a great election: for his Soldiers whom before he had left as it were in possession of a most glorious victory, were now so hardly laid on by the Turks, as that they were ready to have turned their backs and fled. Nevertheless by his coming in, the battle was notably restored, and but returning again to the full, when the Enemy perceiving how much the assailing of the Camp had troubled the Christians in battle, sent out certain Troops of Horsemen again to assault the same; and had not failed undoubtedly to have taken it, being as afore said not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French Kings Brother come in person, to make relief, who coming in with 30000 Horsemen, after he had relieved the Camp, entering directly into the battle, was notably encountered by a Squadron of fresh Soldiers of the Turks, by them of purpose reserved for such event. There began a battle more terrible than the first, with most doubtful victory: But at the length the Turks weary of the long and cruel fight, and seeing most of their fellows slain, began by little and little to give ground, and to retired into the Mountains, which were not far off. In this lattel, which continued a great part of the day, were slain of the Turks 40000, and of the Christians about the same next morning Bohemund, with the French Kings Brother, came again into the field, in such order as if they should presently have given or received battle; where after they had stayed a great while, and saw no Enemy to appear, they fell to the honest burial of their dead; which were easily known by the Turks, by the red crosses upon their garments, the cognizance of their sacred warfare. Solyman flying with the remainder of his Army, notably discomfited his loss, giving it out that he had got the victory: yet by the way as he went he burnt up the Country Villages, and destroyed or carried away whatsoever he thought might stand the Christians in any stead, if they should further follow after him, leaving nothing for them but the bare ground.

After this victory, Bohemund and the Christian Princes, without resistance marching through the hot and dry Countries of the lesser Asia, came to Antiochia a City of Syria, which they took with small labour: and to marching unto Iconium the principal City of Cilicia, near unto the Mountain Taurus, were there also of the Citizens courteously received, where they stayed certain days for the refreshing of the Army. From thence they set forward toward Heraclea, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be assembled.

But they together with the garrison Soldiers, upon the approach of the victorious Army, did the Christians forsook the City, and the Citizens being Christians (as they were yet generally in all the Provinces of the lesser Asia, but in great subjection to the Turks) and now rid of their cruel masters the Turkish garrisons, came forth, and meeting the Princes, gladly yielded themselves with their City unto them, as unto their deliverers. Here the Christian Princes fully instructed of the great fear and desperation of the Turks, who now in no place durst abide their coming; for the more speedily taking in of those Countries but lately oppressed by the Turks, divided their Army into two parts, leaving the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full subduing thereof, (who in short time took the Cities of Tarsetus, Edessa, and Mamissa, with all the rest of the Country, the Turks not daring any where to abide their coming;) the other part of the Army in the mean time entering into the lesser Armenia, took the fame from the Turks, which the Princes gave to one Palmarus an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great service. From whence they took their way into Capadocia, which they also subdued, driving out the Turks in every place, and took the Cities of Caesarea and Socor, where they stayed a few days for the refreshing of the Army: with like success they passed through the rest of the Provinces of the lesser Asia, of late possessed by the Turks, still chasing them out before them, and setting at liberty the poor oppressed Christians of those Countries. Whereof Solyman (craving aid of Axan the Persian Sultan his cousin) grievously complained by his Letters to Axan, directed in this manner: The famous City of Nice with the Country of Romania, which was by your aid and power have gotten from the kingdom of the Greeks, and of your bounty possessed, the Christians of the kingdom of France have again taken from us. Thus was the late erected Kingdom of the Turks in the lesser Asia, by these valiant Christian Champions again brought low, and they glad to retire themselves further off into the Mountains and more Eastern Countries, until this heat was overpast; and that they, taking the benefit of the troubled state of the Greek Empire (afterwards rent in sunder by ambition and civil discord, the ruin of the greatest Monarchs) recovered not only their former state, but became also dreadful unto the Greek Emperors themselves; upon whom they daily gained in one corner or other, still maintaining the honour of their estate until the rising of the Ottoman Family, as in the process of this History shall, God willing, be declared.

These victorious Princes (then, and to the worlds end famous) not contented, to their immortal praise, to have thus driven the Turks out of the lesser Asia, and recovered so many Countries; bound themselves, as well the Princes as the common Soldiers, by solemn oath, never to return again into their Countries, until they had accomplished that sacred War with the conquest of the Holy City. So mounting together the high mountain Taurus, and defending thence as into another world, they came to the City Mareffa, which they took without resistance, the Turks there in garrison being by night before for fear fled; where the Christians for the refreshing of themselves certain days staid. In the mean time Robert Earl of Flanders with a thousand men at arms, was sent out to give summons unto a City called Artafia, about fifteen miles distant from Antioch: when as the Citizens beholding the Ensigns of the Christians, suddenly suddenly took up Arms against the Turks there in Garrison, which had of long holden them in Subjection, and prevailing upon them, flow them every Mothers Son: whose heads they presented unto the Earl, and received him into their City. The Turks to revenge the death of their Friends, and to recover again the City before the coming of the rest of the Army, sent out about 10000 men out of Antioch; for this there was assembled a great Power of them to have hindered the further proceedings of the Christians: and being come near to Artafia, they sent before certain fragling Companies, of purpose to draw the new come Christians out of the City, lying in the mean time in ambush with the rest, of purpose to innap them. With these fragling Companies the Flemings falling out, lustily encountered, and easily put them to flight, the Turks indeed flying of purpose to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in ambush. After whom the Flemings eagerly following, were before they were aware enclosed round with their Enemies, and there had undoubtedly perished, had not the Citizens (being Christians) presently sallied out and right worthily relieved them.

Shortly after, the Christian Princes marching forward with their Army, were encountered by the Turk at the River Orontes, who there thought to have laid their further passage: with whom Robert Duke of Normandy, who had the Leading of the Vantguard, had a hard conflict, until that the Turks, discouraged with the fight of the Army still coming on, forsook the bridge, and betook themselves to flight. So the Christians passing the River, came and encamped with their Army before the famous City of Antioch, that one and twentieth day of October, in the year 1097, the Governor whereof under the Persian Sultan was one Cassianus, (of some also honoured with the name of a King) who at the coming of the Christians, had with him in the City even thousand Horsemen, and twenty thousand Foot of the Turks, with great store of Victuals, and all manner of other Provisions necessary for the defence thereof. This City, called in ancient time Epiphane, or Epphane, and of the Hebrews, Bethlatha, sometime the Seat of the Syrian Kings, and afterwards the Metropolitane City of Syria, having under it an hundred and thirty Bishops, (famous for many things, and amongst others, for that it was the Seat of the blessed Apostle St. Peter, and first place wherein the Professors of the Christian Religion took the name of Christians) is situate upon the River Orontes, about twelve miles from the Sea, and was then strongly fortified both by Nature and Art, being compassed about with a double Wall; the uttermost whereof was of hard stone, and the other of brick, with 460 Towers in the same, and an impregnable Castle at the East end thereof, whereto was joining a deep Lake, coming out of the great River, which entered the South side of the City. Round about this strong City (one of the most assured Refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Christian Princes encamped, except on that side which being defended with the high broken Mountains, is not there to be besieged. Upon whom the Turks out of the City, during the time of the siege made many a fierce and desperate fall, being still by the Christians most valiantly repulsed: especially at the bridge which the Christians had made of Boats for their commodious passage too and fro over the River. In this fort was the siege continued until the beginning of February, with many a bloody skirmish. At which time such abundance of Rain fell, as that hardly could a man find any place to lie dry in; and the scarcity of Victuals grew so great in the Camp, that many (horrible it is to say) to assuage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their slain Enemies. In these extremities many died of hunger and cold; yea their horses also perished for want of meat, so that in the whole Camp were scarcely left two thousand horses fit for use, the rest being either all dead, or brought so low, as that they were altogether unserviceable. These miseries daily increasing, divers men of great account, whom no terror of the Enemy could have dismayed; began secretly to withdraw themselves out of the Camp, with purpose to have flown home; among whom were Peter the Hermit, Author of this War, and Tancred the Nephew of Bohemund, who taken by this way, and brought back with the rest as Fugitives, were sharply reprehended by Hugh the French Kings Brother, as Cowards, and Traytors to their Brethren and fellow Soldiers, and to induce to take a new Oath for their Fidelity and Perseverance. Bohemund in the mean time going to Artafia a Town not far off, by good Fortune cut off a great part of the Turks there in Garrison; who after their usual manner falling out to have cut off the Forragers of the Christians, were now themselves caught tary: whereby the Country for a time was more open for the distressed Christians Soldiers to seek abroad for relief. But this liberty so lately gained lasted not long, when news was brought unto the Camp, that the Turks in great number, out of the Provinces about Aleppo and Damascus, were coming unto the relief of their besieged Friends in Antioch. Whereupon the Christians trusting to their own strength, and the strength of the place wherein they were encamped, lay still, and at their coming to encountered them, that they slew 2000 of them, and put the rest to flight. In which conflict the Christians got great store of Provision and Victuals which the Turks had thought to have put into the City. The heads of the slain Turks the Christians set upon stakes before the City, to the more terror of the Defendants. This overthrow of the Turks, wherein Cassianus had lost his eldest son, with others of his best Captains, so daunted the besieged, that they requested a Truce for a time of the Christian Princes, which granted, they of the City came oftentimes into the Camp, and they of the Camp likewise into the City; Cassianus still expecting relief from the Persian Sultan. Whilst the Christian Princes were thus busy in Asia, the Venetians with a great Fleet of two hundred Gallies scouring the Seas, under the conduct of Henry Imperator the Bishop, and of Vitalis the Dukes son, meeting with the Gallies of Pisa at the Rhodes, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherein the Venetians having the upper hand, took eighteen of their Gallies, and in them five thousand Soldiers, whom they feign to be marked with the red cross, the cognizance of the sacred War, they presently set at liberty, together with the Gallies, detaining only thirty of the better sort as Hostages. After that, the Venetians sailing into Ionis, took the City of Smyrna, and spoiled all along the coasts of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, before far abandoned by the Turks.

The Truce before taken between the Turks and the Christians at the siege of Antioch, being in short time after broken by the death of one Vello a Frenchman, slain by the Turks; the War was again begun, and the City more hardly laid unto unto than before. At which time the Governor, who in the time of this long siege, which had continued nine months, had lost most part of his best Souldiers, was glad for the defence of so great a City, to use the Service of divers Christians, then dwelling in the City. Among whom was one Pyrrhus, a Citizen of great Reputation, unto whom he had committed the guarding of a Tower, called the two Towers, afterwards St. George's Tower. This Pyrrhus had secret Intelligence with Behemund Prince of Tarentum, with whom he agreed to give him there entrance into the City, upon condition, that he should of the other Christian Princes procure the Government of the City to himself; and that he with the rest of the Christian Citizens in the City might be at his hands well used: which thing being easily obtained, all things agreed upon, Behemund with his Souldiers were by night by Pyrrhus let into the City, who made way for the rest of the Army to enter. The City thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the Castle, the rest were put to the Sword, Man, Woman, and Child; and among them also many of the Christians, the furious Souldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but small store of Victuals. Callianus the late Governor flying out of the City, gave himself up to the Christians, driving through the Mountains, fell into the hands of the Christian Armenians, who lately thrust out of Jerusalem, were fled thither for Refuge, by whom he was there slain. In the City were slain about ten thousand persons. Thus was the famous City of Antioch, which the Turks had long before by Famine taken from the Christians, again recovered the third day of June, in the year of our Lord God, 1098. The poor oppressed Christians in Jerusalem hearing of this so notable a Victory, gave free Thanks unto God therefore, and began to lift up their heads in hope that their Delivery was now at hand. Of this Victory, the Princes of the Army by speedy Messengers and Letters certified their Friends in all Countries, so that in short time, the same thereof had filled a great part of the World. Among others, Behemund Prince of Tarentum, unto whom this was delivered, sent the joyful News thereof unto Roger, his Brother Prince of Apulia; whose Letters as the most certain Witnesses of the History before reported, I thought it not amiss here to set down.

I suppose you to have understood by the Letters of your Son Tunc, both of the great loss of our men, and the battles which we have of late with our great Glory fought. But concerning the Truce, and the proceeding of the whole Affair, I had rather you should be certified by my Letters, than the Letters of others. King Callianus had required a time of Truce: during which, our Souldiers had from Recurve into the City without danger, until that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, slain by the Enemy, the Truce was broken. But whilst it yet seemed an hard matter to win the City, one Pyrrhus a Citizen of Antioch, of great Authority and much devoted unto me, had Conference with me concerning the yielding up of the City, yet upon condition, That the Government thereof should be committed to me, in whom he had reposed an especial Trust. I conferred of the whole matter with the Princes and great Commanders of the Army, and easily obtained that the Government of the City was by their general consent allotted unto me. So our Army entering by a Gate opened by Pyrrhus, took the City. Within the few day after, the Town Arcutum was by us assaulted, but not without some loss and danger to our Person, by reason of a wound I there received. I assure you much of the valor of your Son Tancered, of whom I and the whole Army make such account and reckoning, as is to be made of a most valiant and valiant General. Farewell. From Antioch.

Whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege of Antioch, Corbanus (the Persian Sultan his Lieutenant) with a great Army besieged Edessa, with purpose after the taking thereof, to have retaken the City of Antioch. But this being notably defended by Baldwin left there of purpose with a strong Garrison for the defence thereof; the Turk fearing in the mean time to lose Antioch, the safest Refuge of the Turks in all those parts, rose with his Army, and set forward against the Christians: where by the way, it was his fortune to meet with Sandulcius, Callianus his Son, but lately fled from Antioch, by whom he understood of the loss of the City, and by what means the same was most like again to be recovered: upon which hope, Corbanus with his mighty Army kept on his way, with a full resolution to set all upon the fortune of a battle. Whose coming much troubled the Christians: for that although they were possessed of the City, yet was the Castle still holden by the Turks. Nevertheless leaving the Earl of Tobias in the City, with a competent Power for the keeping in of them in the City, they took the field with the whole strength of the Army, and in order of battle expected the coming of their Enemies; who courageously coming on, as men before resolved to fight, joined with them a most terrible and bloody battle. Neither were they in the City in the mean time idle, for that the Turks in the Castle having received in unto them certain Supplies from Corbanus, sallied out upon them that were left for the safeguard of the City, and had with them a cruel conflict. Thus both within the City and without, was to be seen a most dreadful sight of resolute men, with great slaughter on both sides: yet after long fight and much effusion of blood, the fortune of the Christians prevailing, the Turks began to give ground, and afterwards besook themselves to plain flight, whom the Christians hardly pursuing, made of them a wonderful slaughter. In this battle were slain of the Turks above an hundred thousand, and of the Christians about four thousand two hundred. There was also taken a great Prey; for besides Horses and other Beasts for burden, were taken also five thousand Camels with their lading. The next day, being the 25th of June, the Castle was by the Turks now despairing of relief yielded up unto the Christians.

Antioch thus taken, Hugh the French Kings Brother, affirmed the Great, was sent from the rest of the Princes to Constantinople, to have delivered the City unto Alexius the Emperor according to the agreement before made. But he, guilty in confidence of his own foul dealing with them, unto whom he had sent no relief at all during the long and hard siege of Antioch; neither performed any thing of that he had further promised, and therefore knowing himself hated of them; had in distrust to grant an offer of the Princes, to evil deferred, and therefore refused to accept thereof. Whereupon Behemund by the general consent of the whole Army was chosen Prince, or (as some call him) King of Antioch.

After this long siege and want of Victuals, ensued a great Plague in the Army of the Christians, the Autumn following, whereof is reported fifty thousand men have died, and amongst them many of great Account. But the mortality ceasing, the Christians in November following, following, by force took Rugia and Albaria, two Cities about two days journey from Antioch; where difficult attaining hereto, Behemund and Raimund who of all others only envied at his Preference unto the Principality of Antioch: Behemund for the common cause sake, gave way unto his Adversary, and retired with his Souldiers back again to Antioch: after whom followed the Duke Godefroy, and the Earl of Flanders with their Regiments. The rest of the Princes withdrew some at Rugia, some at Albaria, from whence Raimund made sundry light Expeditions further into the Enemies Country: but the Spring approaching, the Christian Princes with all their Power took the field again. Behemund with them remained with him, departing from Antioch, besieged Tortosa. Raimund in the mean time with the rest, besieging the City of Tripoli; who became much more insolent than before, by reason of some fortunate Raids he had made upon the Enemies the last Winter, ceased not still to malign Behemund and his proceedings: matter enough to have divided the whole Power of the Christians, and to have turned their weapons upon themselves; which Behemund well considering, rose with his Army; and because he would not with his presence trouble the proceeding of the religious War, retired himself to Antioch. After whose departure, Godefroy and the Earl of Flanders took Gabala, a City about twelve miles from Ladicea, and from thence returned again to the siege of Tortosa, whether Raimund came also with his Army, having before driven the Governor of Tripoli to such compulsion as pleased himself, and to furnish him with things as he wanted. Thus was Tortosa hardly on the sides besieged by the Christians, but so notably defended by the Turks, that after three months hard siege, the Christians were glad to depart thence; and marching along the Sea-side, spoiled the Country about Sidon. But so far as that City was not easily to be won, they left it, and encamped before Ybemaia, which they also passed by; the Governor thereof sending them out Victuals, with such other things as they wanted; and upon Summons given, promising to yield the City after they had once won the City of Jerusalem. From thence they came to Cesarea in Galilee, where they solemnly kept the Feast of Whitsunday; and so to Rama, which they found for fear forsaken of the Infidels. Marching from Rama, and drawing near to Jerusalem, they in the Vanguard of the Army, upon the first deyrifying of the Holy City, gave for joy divers great Shouts and Outcries, which with the like applauses of the whole Army was joyfully and redoubled, as if there were they would have rent the very Mountains, and pierced the highest Heavens. There might a man have seen the devout passions of these worthy and zealous Christians, uttered in brief divers manners: some with their Eyes and Hands cast up towards Heaven, called aloud upon the name and help of Christ Jesus; some, prostrate upon their faces, kissed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the World sometime walked; others joyfully saluted those holy places which they had heard so much of, and then first beheld: in brief, every man in some sort expressed the joy he had conceived of the fight of the Holy City, as the end of their long travel.

This most ancient and famous City, so much renowned in holy Writ, is situate in an hilly Country; not walled with any River or fresh Springs, nor other famous Cities for moat or parbe; neither yet was it well feared for Wood or Future ground: but what wanted in these, and such other benefits of Nature, was by the extraordinary blessings of the most High so supplied, as that the Jews there dwelling, so long as they kept the Ordinances of the Lord, were as well as the people in the World fully afforded of most happy and fortunate. Yet in those to blessed times, was this City for the sin of the people oftentimes delivered into the Enemies hand, and the glory thereof defaced; as well appeareth by the whole course of the History of Scripture, as also by the ancient and approved Histories, as well of the Jews themselves, as others. Nevertheless it rose again (though not in like glory as before in the time of King David, Salomon, and the other next succeeding Kings) and so was still re-peopled by the Jews, until that at last according to the foretelling of our Saviour Christ, it was with a great, and of all others most lamentable destruction, utterly razed and destroyed by the Romans, under the leading of Vespasian the Emperor, and his noble Son Titus, forty years after our Saviour his precious Death and Passion. Since which time, it was never until this day again repaired, or yet well inhabited by the Jews; but lying buried in the ruins of it self, all the Reign of Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan, until the time of the great Emperor Julius Adrianus, it was again by him re-edified about the year 136, and after the name of him called Adria, who together with the name changed also in some part of the ancient history of the City. For whereas before it was situated upon the steep rising of an hill, in such sort that towards the East and the South it overlooked the whole ground, having only the Temple and the Castle called Antonia, in the highest part of the City; Adrian translated the whole City unto the very top of the hill, so that the place where our blessed Saviour suffered his most bitter Passion, with the Sepulchre wherein he was also laid, and from whence he in Glory rose again, before without the City, were then inclosed within the Walls thereof, as they are at this day to be seen. Yet for all that, the Emperor being dead, in process of time this new built City recovered again the ancient name of Jerusalem, whereby it hath ever since, and is at this day yet known. This City so re-edified, the Emperor gave unto the Jews, whom he afterwards thrust out again for Robert-Rebellion, and gave it to the Christians to inhabit; over whom, Mark, first Bishop of the Gentiles there, had the charge. But so far as the Roman Emperors were at that time altogether Idolaters and Persecutors of the poor Christians, the Church also at Jerusalem, with others, endured sundry and many grievous Persecutions under the Emperors Antoninus, Commodus, Severus, Maximinus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Diocletianus, and Maxentius, until that at length Constantine the Great, converted unto the Faith of Christ about the year of Grace 320, suppressing the Pagan Idolatry, gave general Peace to the afflicted Church: whereby the Christian Church at Jerusalem, for the space of three hundred years after, flourished happily under the Greek Emperors, until the time of the Emperor Phocas; who having most cruelly slain the good Emperor Maurice with his Children, and so possessed himself of the Empire, gave occasion thereby unto Chrysos the Persian King, in revenge of the death of Maurice his Father in law, with all his Power to invade Syria: who as a tempest bearing down all before him, took also by force the City of Jerusalem, having that year, which was about the year Six hundred and ten, slain almost an hundred thousand Christians. But Phocas the Usurper being by them of his Guard most cruelly slain, and Heracles succeeding in his head, Chofroe was by him again driven out of Syria, and the Holy City again recovered, about the year 644. In these great Wars against the Persians, Heracles had used the help of the Arabians, called Semir, a warlike people of Arabia Deserta, altogether given to the Spoil: who, the Wars now ended, expecting to have received their pay, were contrary to their expectation, and without all reason rejected by them that should have paid them, with very foul and contumacious words: as, that there was not money enough to pay the Christian Soldiers of the Latines and the Greeks, much less those vile dogs (whom they so called, for that they had but a little before received the damnable Doctrine of the false Prophet Mahomet, the great Seducer of the World, who even in that time flourished.) Upon which discontentment by their return revolted from the Empire, and joynt themselves unto their great Prophet, and so afterwards unto the Caliphs his Successors, extending his Doctrine, together with his Sovereignty, to the utmost of their power: and that with so good success, that in short time they had overrun all Aegypt, Syria, the Land of Arabia, and taken the Holy City. With these (the Disciples of Mahomet and his Successors, the Sarafins, for so now they would be called) the Greek Emperors ensuing had for certain years divers conflicts, with diverse fortune, for the possession of Syria. But at length wearied out, and by them overcome, they left the Land of Arabia wholly to their Devotion. Hereby it came to pass, that the Sarafins for the space of 370 years following held these Countries, with many others in great Subjection, oppressing still the poor Christians in Jerusalem with most grievous Tributes and exactions: unto whom they yet left a third part of the City for them to dwell in, with the Temple of the Sepulchre of our Saviour, and Mount Sion: nor for any devotion, either unto them, or those places, but for that it yielded them a great profit by the recourse of devout Christians travelling thither: reserving in the mean time unto themselves, the other two parts of the City, with the Temple of Solomon, before redified by the Christians. Now whilst the Sarafins thus triumph in the East, and not in the East only, but over a great part of the West also; contenting themselves with such Tributes as they had imposed upon the subdued Nations and Countries; up start the Turks, a vagrant, fierce, and cruel people; who first breaking into Asia (as is before declared) and by rare fortune affixing unto the Kingdom of Persia, subdued the Countries of Mesopotamia, Syria, with the greatest part of the lesser Asia, and Judea, together with the Holy City: who both there and in all other places, held the poor oppressed Christians in such Subjection and Thraldom, as that the former government of the Sarafins seemed the affliction of this to have been but light and ease. Neither was there any end or relaxe of these so great miseries to have been expected, had not God in mercy by the weak means of a poor Hermit, stirred up these most worthy Princes of the West to take up Arms in their defence, who having with their victorious Armies recovered the afflicted Asia, with a great part of Syria, were now come unto this Holy City.

Jerusalem being by the Christians, who had before this time been in possession of it, recovered, the Christians with their good fortune of all things necessary for the holding out of a long Siege. The Christians with their

Army approaching the City, encamped before it on the North; for that toward the East, and the South, it was not well to be besieged, by reason of the broken Rocks and Mountains. Next unto the City lay Godfrey the Duke, with the Germans and Lorrains: near unto him lay the Earl of Flanders, and Robert the Norman: before the West gate lay Tancred and the Earl of Thoulouze: Bohemund and Baldwin were both absent; the one at Antioch, the other at Edessa. The Christians thus strongly encamped, the fifth day after gave unto the City a fierce assault, with such cheerfulness, as that it was easily supposed, it might have been even then won, had they not sufficiently furnished with scaling ladders: for want whereof, they were glad to give over the assault and retire. But within a few days after, having supplied that defect, and provided all things necessary, they came on again affix, and with all their power gave unto the City a most terrible assault, wherein was on both sides great valour, policy, and cunning, with much slaughter, until that at length the Christians weary of the long Fight, and in that hot Country, and most fervent time of the year, fainting for lack of Water, were glad again to forsake the assault, and to retire into their Trenches: only the Walls of Sion yielded them water, and that not sufficient for the whole Camp; the rest of the Wells which were but few, being before by the Enemy either filled up, or else poisoned.

Whilst the Christians thus lay at the Siege of Jerusalem, a Fleet of the Genowais arrived at Sidon, which time also the Fleet of the Egyptian Sultans lay at Affalon, to have brought relief to the besieged. Turks in Jerusalem, whereof the Genowais understanding, and knowing themselves too weak to encounter them at Sea, took all such things out of their Ships as they thought good, and so sinking them, marched by Land toward the Camp. There was amongst these Genowais divers Engineers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of Engines fit for the besieging of Cities; by whose device, a great moving Tower was framed of timber and thick plaques, covered over with raw Hides, to save the same from fire; out of which the Christians might in safety greatly annoy the Defendants. This Tower being by night brought close to the Wall, served the Christians instead of a most fire fortress in the assault the next day; where whilst they strive with warlike Valour and doubtful Victory on both sides, from morning until midday, by chance the wind favouring the Christians, carried the flame of the fire into the face of the Turks, wherewith they had thought to have burnt the Tower, with such violence, that the Christians taking the benefit thereof, and holpen by the Tower, gained the top of the Wall; which was first footed by the Duke Godfrey, and his Brother Engelw, with their followers: the Engines of the Duke there first set up, to the great encouraging of the Christians, who now pressing in on every side, like a violent River that had broken over the Banks, bare down all before them. All were slain that came to hand, Men, Women, and Children, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition: the Slaughter was great, the Engines of lamentable, all the Streets were filled with blood and the bodies of the dead, Death triumphing in every place. Yet in this confusion, a wonderful number of the better sort of the Turks, retiring to Solomon Temple, there to do their last Devotion, made there a great and terrible Fight, armed with despair of any thing; and the victorious Christians no less disdainful; after the winning winning of the City, to find there so great resistance. In this desperate conflict, fought with wonderful obstinacy of mind, many fell on both sides: but the Christians came on so fiercely, with desire of blood, that breaking into the Temple, the foremost of them were by the press of them that followed after, violently thrust upon the weapons of their Enemies, and so miserably slain. Neither did the Turks thus oppressed, give it out with invincible courage, nor at the gates of the Temple only, but even in the midst thereof, where was to be seen great heats, both of the Victors, and the vanquished; slain infamously together. All the Pavement of the Temple swam with blood, in such sort, that a man could not set his foot, but either upon some dead man, or over the shoes in blood: Yet for all that, the obstinate Enemy still held the Vaults and top of the Temple, when as the darkness of the night came so fast on, that the Christians were glad to make an end of the Slaughter, and to sound a Retreat. The next day (for Proclamation was made, for mercy to be shewed unto all Turks as should lay down their weapons) the Turks that yet held the upper part of the Temple, came down and yielded themselves. Thus was the City of Jerusalem with great bloodshed, but far greater honour, recovered by the worthy Christians, in the year 1099, after it had been in the hands of the Infidels above four hundred years.

The next day after, having buried the dead, and cleansed the City, they gave thanks to God with great Prayers and great rejoicing. The poor Christians before oppressed, now overcome with unexpected joy, welcomed their victorious Brethren with great joy and praise; and the Soldiers embracing one another, sparing to speak of themselves, freely commended each others valour. Eight days after, the Princes of the Army meeting together, began to consult about the choice of their King; among whom was no such difference, as might well shew which was to be preferred before the others. And although every one of them for prowess and desert, seemed worthy of so great an honour, yet by the general consent of all, it was given to Robert Duke of Normandy; who about the same time hearing of the death of the Conqueror his Father, and more in love with his Fathers new gotten Kingdom in England, in hope thereof, refused the Kingdom of Jerusalem, then offered unto him; which at his return he found possessed by William Rufus his younger Brother, and so in hope of a better, refusing the worse, upon the matter lost both.

After whose departure, Godfrey of Bullion Duke of Lorraine (whose Ensign was first displayed upon the Walls) was by the general consent both of the Princes and the Army, saluted King: He was a great Soldier, and indeed with many Heroic Virtues, brought up in the Court of the Emperor Henry the Fourth, and by him much employed. At the time of his inauguration he refused to be crowned with a Crown of Gold: saying, That it became not a Christian man there to wear a Crown of Gold, where Christ the Son of God had for the Salvation of mankind, sometime worn a Crown of Thorns. Of these the greatest part of these proceedings of the Christians, from the time of their departure from Antioch, until the winning of the Holy City, Godfrey by Letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth:

After long travel, having first taken certain Towns, we came to Jerusalem; which City is environed with high Hills, without Rivers or Fountains, excepting only that of Solomon, and that very little one. In it are many Cisterns, wherein water is kept, both in the City and the Country thereabout. On the East, the Arabians, the Moabites, and Ammonites. On the South, the Idumaeans, Egyptians and Philistines: Whoward along the Sea-coast, lie the Cities of Ptolemais, Tyrus, and Tripolis; and Northward, Tiberias, Caesarea, Philipp, with the Country Decapolis and Damafco. In the assault of the City, I first gained that part of the Wall that fell to my lot to assault, and commanded Baldwin to enter the City, who having slain certain Companies of the Enemies, broke open one of the Gates for the Christians to enter. Raymond had the City of David, with much rich Spoil yielded unto him. But when we came unto the Temple of Solomon, there we had a great conflict, with so great Slaughter of the Enemy, that our men stood in blood above the ankles: The night approaching, we could not take the upper part of the Temple, which the next day we yielded, the Turks pitifully crying out for mercy: and so the City of Jerusalem was by us taken, the fifteenth of July, in the year of our Redemption 1099, thirty nine days after the beginning of the Siege, four hundred and nine years since the hands of the Sarafins in time of Heracles the Emperor of the Persians, the Princes with one consent saluted me (against my Will) King of Jerusalem; who although I fear to take upon me so great a Kingdom, yet I will to my devot, that they shall easily know me for a Christian King, and well deserving of the Universal Faith's love love me as you do, and so farewell. From Jerusalem.

Whilst these things were in doing at Jerusalem, such a multitude of the Turks and Sarafins their all as one) were assembled at Affalon (a City about five and twenty miles from Jerusalem) to revenge the injuries they had before received, as had not before met together in all the time of this sacred War. Against whom, Godfrey (the late Duke, and now King) assembled the whole Forces of the Christians in those Countries, and leaving a strong Garrison in the new won City, set forward; and meeting with them, joynt a most dreadful and cruel battle; wherein (as most report) were slain of the Infidels an hundred thousand men, and the rest put to flight. The Spoil there taken, far exceeded all that the Christians had before taken in this long Expedition. Godfrey after so great a Victory, returning to Jerusalem, gave unto the Princes returned either to their Charge, as did Bohemund to Antioch, Baldwin to Edessa, Tancred into Galilee, whereof he was created Prince; or else having now performed the uttermost of their Vows, returned with honour into their own Countries. This was of all others the most honourable Expedition; that ever the Christians took in hand against the Infidels, and with the greatest resolution performed; for the most part, by such voluntary men, as moved with a devout Zeal to their immortal praise, spared neither nor living in defence of the Christian Faith and Religion; all Man worthy eternal Fame and Memory. Nor long after ensued a great Pestilence (the ready attendant of long war and want) whereof infinite numbers of People died, and and among the rest Godfrey, the first Christian King of Jerusalem, never to be sufficiently commended. Who with the general lamentation of all good Christians, was honourably buried in the Church of the Sepulchre of our Saviour, on the Mount Calvary, where our Saviour suffered his Passion; in which the Christian Kings succeeding him were also afterwards buried. He departed this life the eighteenth of July, the third year of our Lord, 1100, when he had yet scarce reigned a full year. Whose Tomb is yet at this day there to be seen, with an honourable Inscription thereupon.

After the death of Godfrey, the Christians made choice of Baldwin his Brother, Count of Edessa, who leaving his former Government, Baldwin furnished Burgundy, his near Kinsman, came to Jerusalem honourably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarch on Christmas-day with all Solemnity crowned King, in the year 1101. He aided by the Venetians and Genoways at Sea, and by Bohemund King of Antioch by Land, took from the Infidels the City of Cesarea, Stretton, standing upon the Sea-side, and overthrew certain Companies of the Egyptian Sultans at Rama. But understanding that the Christian Princes of the West were coming to his aid with a new Power, he glad thereof, went to meet them, and safely conducted them to Jerusalem along the Sea-coast, by the Cities of Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, and Ptolemais, all yet holden by the Enemy. At which time the Turks at Affalon having received great aid from the Arabians and Egyptians, invaded the Country about Rama, where betwixt them and the Christians was fought a most cruel battle, wherein the Christians received a most notable overthrow, many of their great Commanders being there slain; and among the rest, Stephen Earl of Chartres, (but lately returned home from the former Expedition, and now come back again) and Stephen Earl of Burgundy and Tholous: yea, the King himself hardly escaped the Enemies hands, and after many dangers came at length to Joppa, after it had been constantly before reported him to have been in that battle also slain. Who having there in haste repaired his Army, came again speedily upon his Enemies, fearing as then nothing left; and overthrew them with such a slaughter, as that they had small cause to rejoice of their former Victory. Neither were the rest of the Christian Princes in the other parts of Syria and Palestine, in the mean time idle, but fought by all means to enlarge their Territories.

Tancred Prince of Galilee having raised a great Power, took Asparus the Metropolitane City of Celestria, and after much toil won also the City of Laodicea. Baldwin also the Governor of Edessa, besieging the City of Carraus, had brought the besieged Turks to such extremity, that they were about to have yielded the City; when suddenly he was set upon by a great number of the Turks sent from the Persian Sultan for the relief of the besieged; and being there overthrown, was himself there taken, with Benedict the Bishop, and one Jocelin his Kinsman: who after five years Captivity, found means with the Turk that had taken them, to release themselves, to the great offence of the Persian Sultan, and of the Sultan Solyman.

King Baldwin after the late Victory, lived for a season at some good rest in Jerusalem, unmolested of his Enemies: but knowing his greatest safety among such War-like people, to consist in Arms, he upon this sudden raised the whole strength of his Kingdom, and laid siege to Ptolemais, otherwise called Aca, a City of Phoenicia, standing upon the rivage of the Sea; where he found such resistance, that he was glad to raise his siege and depart, having done nothing more than spoiled the pleasant places about the City. By the way in his return back again it fortuned him to meet with certain Companies of the Enemies Adventurers, by whom he was in a Skirmish mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the Wound was by his Surgeons healed up, yet was the cure thereof so great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithstanding the former repulse, the next year encouraged by the coming of the Genoa Fleet, laid hard siege again to Ptolemais both by Sea and Land, which after twenty days siege was by Composition yielded unto him.

Shortly after, the Governor of Alappa, with certain other of the Turks great Captains in those Quarters, having joined their Forces together, and so invaded the Country about Antioch, were by Tancred (whose Bohemund at his departure unto Italy had left Governor of that City) notably encountered and put to flight. At which time also the Chahilph of Egypt sending great Forces both by Sea and Land against the King of Jerusalem, was in both places discomfited, at Land by the Christians, and at Sea by Tempest.

Bohemund in the mean time, with a great Army of voluntary men and others (wherein he is reported to have had five thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot) returning towards the Holy Land, in revenge of many Injuries done by Alexius the Emperor, unto the Soldiers of this sacred War, contrary to his Faith and Promise to them before given; by the way landed his men in Epirus, and grievously spoiled the Country about Durracium, part of the Emperors Dominion. Neither made he an end of spoiling, until he had enforced the Emperor for redress of so great harms, to make peace with him, and again by solemn Oath to promise all security and kindness unto all such Christian Soldiers as should have occasion to travel too or fro through his Countries, during the time of this Religious War. After which agreement he put to Sea again, and so returned for Jerusalem; but whilst he layed at Antioch, he shortly after there died in the year 1108, leaving the Principality thereof unto his young Son Bohemund a Child, under the tuition of his Nephew Tancred.

Yet were the Cities of Berytus, Sidon, and Tyre, along the Sea-coast, in the Enemies possession; for the gaining whereof Baldwin the King raised a great Army, and so came and laid siege to Berytus, which after many sharp Assaults he at length won, the 23 day of April, in the year 1111, and put to Sword most part of them that he found therein. The same year also he, assisted by a Fleet sent unto him out of Norway, besieged the City of Sidon; where the Citizens (seeing themselves now beset both by Sea and Land) at length yielded unto him by composition the 19th day of December. After which Victory he dismissed the Fleet, and returned himself in Triumph to Jerusalem. Now of all the famous Cities along the Sea-coast of Phoenicia and Palestine, from Laodicea to Affalon, was only the City of Tyre that remained in the Enemies hands; which City Baldwin also hardly besieged; nevertheless it was so well defended by the Turks, that after he had all in vain lien before it by the space of four months, he was glad to rise with his Army as before.

It fortuned that within two years after, the Turks with a mighty Army sent from the Persian Sultan, Sultan, invaded the Country of Celestria, where spoiling all before them as they went, they came and incamped upon the Sea-coast near unto Tyberias. Against whom Baldwin gathered the whole strength of his Kingdom; with whom also Tancred (who now reigned in Antioch, the young Bohemund being dead) with the Count of Tripoli, and the rest of the Christian Princes, joined their Forces; who all together marching forward, came and incamped not far from the Enemy, being in number far more than they. Mendius, General of the Turks Army (for so I find him called) understanding of their approach, sent out certain Companies of his Men to skirmish with them; against whom the Christians also sent out others, who encountering them, easily put them to flight, being before commanded so to do, of purpose to draw the Christians into the danger of a great strength, lying in ambush to intrap them; which according to the Turks desire fell out. For the Christians fiercely pursuing the flying Enemy, fell into the ambush, and so before they were well aware, were beset on every side with their Enemies; unto the rescue of whom other Companies of Christians coming in, and others likewise from the Turks, both the great Armies were at length drawn into the field, where betwixt them was joynted a most fierce and terrible battle, with great slaughter on both sides; but at length the multitude of the Turks prevailing, the Christians were put to the worse, and so glad to fly; after whom the fierce Enemy hardly followed, not without great slaughter. In which flight the King himself hardly escaped, with Ardolph the Patriarch. Whilst Baldwin was thus buffed abroad, the Turks and Sarafins from Affalon came and besieged Jerusalem, being then but weakly manned; but hearing of the Kings coming, and that the Army of the Christians daily increased with new Supplies out of the West by Sea, they retired home again, having burnt certain store-houses full of Corn, and spoiled such things as were subject to their fury.

Long it were to recount all the hard Conflicts and Combats this King had with the Sarafins and Turks, which for brevity I pass over, contented to have briefly touched the greatest. In the last year of his Reign, having for certain years before lived in some reasonable Peace, he made an Expedition unto Egypt, where he with much difficulty won Pharamia, a strong City upon the Sea-coast, which he joynted unto his own Kingdom. After that, he went to the Mouth of the River Nilus, and with great admiration learned the nature of that strange River; and having therein taken abundance of Fish, returned into the City, and there with the same feasted himself with his Friends. But after dinner he began to feel the grief of old Wood, and growing thereof sicker and sicker, returned with his Army toward Jerusalem, where by the way near unto a City called Laris, he died (to the great grief of all the Christians) in the year 1118. His dead body being brought back unto Jerusalem, was there Royally buried, near unto his Brother Godfrey, after he had reigned eighteen years, whose Sepulchre is yet there also to be seen, fast by the Sepulchre of his Brother.

The late King thus dead and buried, the Christians with one consent made choice of his Cousin Baldwin, surnamed Burgundy, Governor of Edessa, who by the name of Baldwin the Second, was the second of April, in the year 1118, solemnly Crowned King of Jerusalem. He was of stature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely and gracious, having his Hair thin and yellow, his Beard mingled with some gray hairs hanging down to his breast; his colour fresh and lively for one of his years. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no less redoubted of his Enemies, than beloved of his Subjects, who had in him repined great hope both for the defence and enlarging of their new gained Kingdom. Against him the same Summer the Chahilph of Egypt, aided by the King of Damascus and the Turks, in revenge of the loss he had in the Expedition the year before received, raised a great Power to invade him both by Sea and Land. Against whom Baldwin also opposed himself with his whole strength, and so came and incamped within the sight of his Enemies. In which force, when both Armies had lien the one facing the other by the space of three months, they both rose; the Christians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valour of the Christians, and so retired without any notable thing doing.

This year died Alexius the Greek Emperor, who even from the beginning of this Sacred War secretly repined at the good success of the Christians in Syria; although his Empire were thereby greatly enlarged; after whom succeeded Calo James his Son, who all the time of his Reign reignd worthily defended his Territories in the latter Asia, against the invasion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greatest Princes of the Turks in the latter Asia, with the King of Damascus, and Debeis King of Arabia, joining their Forces together, with a great Army invading the Country about Antioch, came and incamped not far from Antioch, against whom Roger Prince of Antioch, not expecting the coming of Baldwin and the other Christian Princes his Confederates, but presuming of his own strength, went forth with greater courage than discretion, whereunto his Success was unfavorable; for in countering with them at too much odds, he was by them in a great battle overthrown, wherein himself was slain, with most part of his Army. Of which so great a slaughter, the place wherein this battle was fought was afterward called The field of blood. But whilst the Turks after so great a Victory, carelessly and at pleasure room up and down the Country, Baldwin setting upon them, overthrew them with a great slaughter, and so put them to flight. After this Victory gained by the Christians the fourteenth of August in the year 1120, King Baldwin in great Triumph entered into Antioch, and so joynted that Principality unto his own Kingdom.

The year following, the Turks with another Army invaded the same Country again; for repelling of whom, whilst Baldwin and the other Christian Princes were making their Preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great Commander suddenly died of an Apoplexy, upon whose death they retired without any further harm doing. Nevertheless the next Spring, the King of Damascus, aided by the Arabians, entered again with a great Power into the Country about Antioch, and there did some harm; for the Antiochians now destitute of their own Prince, and Baldwin not being able to hinder their Proceeding) being far off, and otherwise busied at Jerusalem, were much more subject unto the inroads of their Enemies (still at hand) than before when they had a Prince of their own fill present amongst them. But Baldwin advertised thereof, was making toward them with a mighty Army, no sooner than they had thought it could have been possible. Of whose approach the Turks understanding, retired again out of the Country: after whom the King thinking it not good to make further pursuit, turned a little out of the way and took Garaze, one of the strongest Castles of the Kings of Damafco, built but a year before, which because it was not without great charge and danger to be holden, he raised down to the ground.

Baldwin notwithstanding that he had many times thus honourably repulsed his Enemies, wisely considering how he was on the one side befet with the Turks, and on the other side with the Sarafins (which yet reigned in Egypt, the Kingdom of Jerusalem lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good thereby to crave aid of the Christian Princes of Europe, and to that purpose had sent his Embassadors unto divers of them, but especially unto the Venetians, whom of all others he thought fittest at his need to yield him relief by Sea. It fortuned in the mean time, that Balac the Persian Sultan with a great Army of the Turks invaded the Country about Antioch, whereof Baldwin understanding (although he certainly knew he should ere long receive Aid from the other Christian Princes his Friends, but especially from the Venetians, and might therefore with great reason have protracted the War until their coming, yet being therewith much moved, or else his destiny so requiring) raised forth Forces as he had of his own, and without longer staying for his Friends, with greater courage than good speed set forward; and so joining battle with the Enemy, was therein overthrown, with the greatest part of his Army, and himself taken Prisoner in the fight, with certain other of his best Commanders; who all together were carried away Captives unto Carras.

Upon the report of this overthrow, and taking of the King, the Chalioph of Egypt on the other side took occasion with all his Power to invade the Kingdom of Jerusalem; and having in himself purposed the utter ruine thereof, beside the great Army which he sent thither by Land (which lay incamped not far from Alcalon) he put to Sea an huge Fleet also of 700 Sail, for the distressing of the Sea-Towns, which he well knew were not otherwise to be won. This Fleet of the Sarafin Kings (for Egypt with the Kingdoms of Tunis and Morocco were yet in possession of the Sarafins) arriving at Toppa, there put ashore their Land Forces, and hardly besieged the Town both by Sea and Land. But whilst they thus lay in great hope to have won the Town, Dominicus Michael Duke of Venice, fitted up by Calawan then Bishop of Rome, was come to Cyprus with a Fleet of two hundred Sail, for the Relief of the Christians in Syria and the Holy Land; and hearing of the distress of Toppa, nothing dismayed with the number of the Enemies Fleet, halted thither, and came so suddenly upon them, that he had (as some report) overthrown them, before they could put themselves in order, or be in readiness to fight; or as some others say, after a great and doubtful fight, having sunk or taken a great number of them, and put the rest to flight, he obtained of them a most glorious Victory. With like good Fortune also were the Sarafins overthrown in a notable battle at Land, near unto Alcalon, by the Lord Emphase, unto whom the defence of the Kingdom was committed after the taking of the King, who not long after so great a Victory died.

Toppa relieved (as is aforesaid) the Duke of Venice travelled by Land to Jerusalem, where he was honourably received by Guarimond the Patriarch, and the Consecration before made betwixt King Baldwin and the Venetians, upon the same conditions solemnly again renewed.

The Sarafins thus notably discomfited both by Sea and Land, and the City of Jerusalem thereby a little encouraged, and joining their forces together with the Venetians, came, and the first of March laid Siege unto the ancient and strong City of Tyre: which they having befet both by Sea and Land, gave thereunto many a sharp assault; which the Turks as Men fighting for their Lives and Wives, right valiantly repulsed. In which for the Siege was continued longer than the Christians had at the first thought should have needed; yet at length after four Months siege, the Turks fore weakened with often assaults, and hardly pinched with want of Food, all their force being spent, yielded the City by composition. This was the City of Tyre, the most famous Port of Phoenicia yielded unto the Christians the nine and twentieth of June, in the year 1124. The third part of this City was given to the Venetians, according to the Composition made betwixt them and the Kings of Jerusalem. That of all such Cities as were by their help won from the Infidels in Syria, they should have a third part, with one freer, and free Traffike in all the rest of the Cities of the Kingdom of Jerusalem. Shortly after was King Baldwin set at liberty for the Ransome of an hundred thousand Ducats, after he had been eighteen months Prisoner among the Turks.

The Duke of Venice having now spent almost three years in this Sacred Expedition, and well confirmed the state of the Christians in Syria, returning home, by the way took the Islands of Claus, Rhodus, Samos, Mitylen, and Andrus, with the City of Adalon in Peloponnesus all places belonging unto the Greek Empire. Which he did in revenge of the Injuries done by the Emperor in the time of his absence, who envying at the success of the Christians in Syria, as had his Father Alexius before him, had in the absence of the Duke infested the Territories of the Venetians, for the which he was now justly required, with the loss of a good part of his own.

Baldwin also not unmindful of the Injuries unto him before done by the Turks, in requital thereof, invaded the Country about Damafco, and there in three notable battles overthrew the King, and spoiled the Country; wherein he took to great a Prey, that therewith he redeemed his Daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliverance left in Hothage with the Turks for the payment of his Ransome. He also overthrew the Sarafins at Alcalon, who aided by the Chalioph of Egypt, hadundry times invaded the Country about Jerusalem. And so having well repressed his Enemies, for a space lived in peace.

Not long after, Hugh Pagani first Master of the Templars (an Order of Knights first begun in the Reign of this Baldwin) before sent to crave Aid of the Christian Princes of the West, against the Turks and Sarafins, returned with a great number of zealous Christians, ready to lay down their Lives for defence of the Christian Faith and Religion: with whom Baldwin and the other Christian Princes of Syria joining their Forces, set forward and besieged Damafco, the Regal Seat of the Turks in those quarters. But whilst the strength of this City, with the valour of the Defendants, and contagiousness of the Air, that the Christians (the Heavens as it were then fighting against them) were glad to raise their Siege in vain again, and so to retire.

Whilst things thus passed in Syria, Fulk Count of Tours, Magnus Duke of Armenia, and almost of threecore years, having as he thought best disposed of his things at home, had for devotion sake taken upon him an expedition into the Holy Land. In the time of which his preparations, Embassadors came unto him from King Baldwin, offering him in Marriage Melinda (or as some call her, Margaret) his eldest Daughter, with the Succession of the Kingdom of Jerusalem in dowry, if he should survive the King; and in the mean time to content himself with the Cities of Tyre and Ptolemais: of which offer he accepted, and so held on his journey before intended. It fortuned about three years after, that the King fell dangerously sick, and feeling his death draw near, having laid aside all Regal Dignity, caused himself to be removed out of his own Palace, unto the Patriarchs house, which was nearer unto the Temple of the Sepulchre: and there calling unto him Fulk the Count, his Son-in-Law, with his Daughter and his Son Baldwin, then but two years old, in the presence of the Patriarch, and divers other Princes and great Commanders, commended unto them the Government and Defence of the Kingdom, appointing Fulk to succeed him. And taking unto himself the habit and Profession of a Monk (if he should have longer lived) presently after gave up the ghost the two and twentieth day of August, in the year 1131, whereof he reigned with much trouble thirteen years, and was solemnly buried in the Temple upon Mount Calvary, with the other two Kings Godfrey and Baldwin, his Predecessors.

The Kings Funeral ended, the Princes of the Kingdom with one accord made choice of Fulk the old Count, Earl of Anjou, for their King; who the 16 day of September, was with all solemnity by William the Patriarch crowned in Jerusalem. This man in the beginning of his Reignt besides his troubles abroad, was also vext with domesticall and intestine discord. Pontius Count of Triopolis, seeking by force of Arms to have rent the Dukedom of Antioch from the Kingdom: and Hugh Count of Toppa, for fear of due punishment for his Treason, joining himself with the Sarafins of Alcalon, and so with them infesting the Territories of Jerusalem, to the great hurt of the Christian State, and advantage of the Infidels. Which troublesome broyles were yet afterwards by the King, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriarch and other Princes (who seeing the danger thereof like to ensue, had interposed themselves) well again appeased. Vengeance yet nevertheless fell following both the aforesaid Traitors: Pontius being shortly after slain by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Besides these domesticall troubles, the Turks also invaded the Country about Antioch, where they were by the sudden coming of the King overthrown, with the loss of their Tents and exceeding great Riches. And that nothing might be wanting unto the disquicing of the State of that new erected Kingdom, not long after, John the Constantinopolitan Emperor, (together with the Empire, Inheritor also of his Fathers malice, against the proceeding of the Christians in Syria) with a puissant Army passing through the lesser Asia, and by the way taking by force Tarbus the Metropolitane City of Cilicia, with the whole Province thereunto belonging, came and besieged Antioch; which Fulk but a little before had, together with Confiance the Daughter and Heir of the late Duke of Triopolis, for that purpose sent out of France. But in this so dangerous state of that Christian Kingdom, the other zealous Christian Princes interposed themselves as Mediators betwixt the Emperor (pretending the fame to belong unto his Empire) and Raymond that was in possession thereof. And in fine brought it to this end, that Raymond for the present submitting himself unto the Emperor, should from thenceforth hold his Dukedom of him as of his Lord and Sovereign; upon which agreement the Emperor returned unto Jerusalem, where he wintered, and so afterwards unto Constantinople.

Much about the same time, Sanguin one of the Turks great Princes, invading the Country about Triopolis, besieged the Castle of Mont-Ferrand, unto the relief whereof Fulk coming with his Army, was by the Succession of the Count, and the safeguard of his life, glad to take the refuge of the Castle, the Count himself being in that barrel taken Prisoner. After which Victory, the Turks laid harder Siege unto the Castle than before; the besieged in the mean time being no less pinched within with Famine, than pinched without by the Enemy. In this the Kings hard distress, the other Princes having raised the whole power of the Kingdom, were coming to his relief; whereof the Turk understanding, offered of himself to give them all leave freely to depart, and to let the Count at liberty, so that they would deliver unto him the Castle; of which his offer they gladly accepting, yielded up the strong Hold, and so departed. The King by the way meeting with the Army, thanked his Friends for their forwardness, and so returned to Jerusalem.

About four years after, John the Constantinopolitan Emperor with a great Army came again into Syria, with purpose to have united the famous City of Antioch unto his Empire, and so to have made a way into the Kingdom of Jerusalem, wherewith he had now a good while longed. But coming thither in hope to have found the Cilicians and Syrians ready to have received him, he was deceived of his expectation, being shut out by the Latines, and not suffered to enter but upon his Oath, and that with some few of his followers; and so after due reverence done unto him, quietly to depart without any stir or innovation in the City. In revenge of which disgrace, at his departure he gave the Suburbs of the City as a prey to his greedy Soldiers, pretending the same to be done for want of Victuals; who made havock of whatsoever came to hand, not sparing the very Fruit Trees, but cutting them down to dress their meat withall. Having thus under colour of necessity reversed the disgrace received, he returned into Cilicia, and there wintered: where one day for his sport hunting of the wild Boar, and having wounded him with his Boar-Spear, the wild beast therewith enraged, and with all his force bearing forward upon the weapon, forced the Emperors hand backward upon the point of a poynted Arrow that was hanging in a quiver at his back, and so was therewith lightly wounded. Nevertheless as light as the wound was, such was the strength of the Poyson, that the grief thereof still increasing, and his hand and Arm more and more swelling, there was no remedie to be found; but that his Arm must be cut off, which dilapidate and uncertain cure he abhorring, in the extremity of his pain oftentimes pleasantly saying, That the Greek Empire was not to be governed with one hand, overcome with the strength of the Poyson, died. In whole place succeeded his youngest Son Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two Elder Sons being both dead, his sitting forth unto this so unhappy an expedition.

It fortuned about this time also, that the Kingdom

Kingdom of Jerusalem being now at peace, that Fulk the King, with the Queen his Wife, lying at the City of Ptolemais in the time of Autumn, it pleased the Queen for her disport to walk out of the City unto certain pleasant Fountains thereof by the side of the Country.

The Kings would needs also, with certain of his Courtiers; where by the way it chanced that certain Boys running along the field, put up an Hare that was fitting in a furrow; after which all the Courtiers on horseback galloped again, with notable outcry and hollowing. Amongst the rest, the King and Queen, who were following, forcing his horse to the uttermost of his power, in the midst of his course fell, together with his horse foundering under him; and in falling, chanced to fall his head under the horse, with whose weight, and the hardness of his saddle, he was so crushed, that his Brains came out both at his mouth and ears; and he lay thus for some time up for dead, and with great heaviness being carried back, he yet breathing lay speechless three days, and so died the thirteenth of November, in the year of Grace 1142. His dead body afterwards brought to Jerusalem, was there with great magnificence, and the general lamentation of all the Nobles, buried with the other Kings his Predecessors.

Now had the late King left behind him two Sons, Baldwin about the age of thirteen years, and Amlicr about the age of seven. Of the Elder of these two, the Christian Princes made choice, and he was crowned King of Baldwin the first. He came together with Amlicr's Mother. Partner with him in the Kingdom, upon Christmas day with him the solemnity crowned King of Jerusalem, in the year 1142. About which time, Sanguin the Turk, taking hold of the discord betwixt Rasme, the King of Armenia, and Alpharagius, the King of Bagdad, came and with a great power befieged Eyssa, the Count being at the same time absent; and did so much, that at length he took the City by undermining of it, where the bloody Turk executed his rage, and slew the Count, and all the Christians in the City. By the loss of this famous City, to large a Territory fell again into the hands of the Turks, as that three Archbishopsricks were thereby drawn from the Church of Antioch, which were Armenia, Armenia, and Armenia. The next year, the Turk waked after befieged Colagenar, another strong Town of the Christians: Was one night drinking liberally with his Friends, he was by one of them in his drunkenness flabbed, and so slain, and the City taken, in whose head Rasme his Son succeeded.

Baldwin, in the first year of his Reign, recovered from the Turks the Cattle of Sobal, a strong hold beyond Jordan, which he notably fortified, for the defence of that side of his Kingdom against the incursions of the Turks. But the next year undertaking an expedition against the King of Damasco, he was by Noradin the Turk, the Kings Son-in-Law, so hardly befer in his return, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his Army escaped his hands.

The Report of the loss of Edessa with the miseries there endured by the Christians, being bruited through all parts of Christendom, greatly moved the Christian Princes of the West. Whom Eugenius the Third, then Bishop of Rome, ceased not both by himself and by his Legates to stir up to take that sacred War in hand. And therein wrought so effectually, that almost in every Province of Christendom preparation was made for the relief of the distressed Christians in Syria. Of all others, Conrade the Third then Emperor of Germany, was most forward, who aided the German Princes and others, with an incredible number of Voluntary Men out of all parts of Christendom, had raised a most puissant Army, and therewith set forward on this glorious Expedition. Of this his devout purpose he had made manifest manner to the Greek Emperor, through whose Countries he was passing, craving that he might by his good Favour fo do, and for his Money to be relieved with Victuals, and other such things as he should have need of for himself or his people; promising in most ample manner to requite them, without any harm doing unto the Emperor or his Subjects. All which the Greek Emperor, commending his zeal, seemed in most large terms willingly to concede unto. Nevertheless he inwardly repined thereat, withholding no but succour to the Christians in this so honourable Expedition, but he would not trust himself, as by the sequel of his doings well might be seen. For Conrade with his populous Army, indeed a terror unto the Greeks, entering into the Frontiers of the Constantinopolitan Empire, found all things in their friendly (for why, Emanuel had been so far from giving command, that good force of Victuals and all other things should be ready) at all places to be fold as the Army was to pass; but they were not far come into the Country, but that in the tail of the Army fill followed certain strong Companies of the Greeks, to keep the Souldiers from stragling from their Ensigns, and to prevent the Army from being cut off, by cutting them short, as they took them at advantage. And fill the further that they travelled, the more it was to be seen in the countenances of the discontented Greeks, how unwelcome Guests they were. Yet still on they went through the Countreys of the Christian Friends, little differing from open Enemies, until they came to Adrianople; in departing from whence, such discord rose between them that were in the Rearward of the Army, and the Greeks that followed them, that it was like to have come to plain battel, had not the false broils, by the discretion of some of the Souldiers, been happily prevented. And so following on they came to Adrianople, and in following days after to the Plain called Cherobachi, through which the River Malar hath his course; which in Summer being almost dry, in Winter or any other great downfall of Water, rised suddenly overflowing, and so the Army was forced to march through it; that then it seemeth no more a River, but a flood, and swelling with the Wind, is not to be passed over but by great Boats. This River then suddenly rising by night, by reason of the great rain that then fell, in such abundance, as if the Flood-river of Libanus had been opened, so overflowed the places whereto they were come, that they could not abide thereat, the violence of the Water were carried away not only many Weapons, Saddels, Garments, and such other the Souldiers necessities, but even the Horses and Mules, with their burthens; yea, and great numbers of armed men, were so much lost, that it was almost memorable thing to behold. Many valiant Men there fell without Fight, and died, no men killing them to be tall, helped nor; neither did valour stand them in any stead; they perished like hay, and were carried away like chaff, with such furious and violent winds, that the way flew is, verily said. That the wrath of God beareth witness, that in such a suddain inundation had overwhelmed all, that happy was he who could make shift for himself, without regarding any another. This misfortune sore troubled the Emperor with his whole Army. Nevertheless, the Water being again fallen, and all put in to good order, as in such a confusion fusion was possible, he marched on to the Imperial City; which the suspicious and malicious Greek had before notably fortified and so strongly manned with armed Men glittering upon the Walls, in such fort as if it should have presently been assaulted.

Comrade approaching the City, was not suffered to enter, but perfwaded by the Greek Emperor forthwith to tranſport his Army over the Straiteſs, with promiſe to ſupple his wants with whatſoever he ſhould require; which was done with ſuch ſpeed, that he and his Army had been ſoon ſet on their march, but only to have them thinned; yet, in which ſervice the Greeks ſpared no labour, or kind of Vexell, that might ſerve to tranſport them. The Greek Emperor in the mean time, by men ſecretly appointed for that purpoſe, keeping account of the number that paſſed, until that they wearied with the multitude, ceaſed ſending any more, and then began to diſcover the treachery of the Greeks, and then began the covert malice of the Greek Emperor forthwith to appear. For, beſides, that they truſting upon his promiſes, had brought little or no Proviſions over with them, the Country People by his appointment brought nothing unto them to ſell, as before; and they of the Towns and Cities ſhut their gates againſt them as they marched, ſo that ſcarce being able to ſubſiſt, they began to ſtreame rare, for which they would ſtill receive their Money by Ropes caſt down from the Walls, and then deliver them what they pleaſed therefor, yea, and oftentimes nought at all. Among many other vile practices, not beſeeching Chriſtians, the miſchievous Greeks, to payſon the Soldiers, mingled Lime with the Meal which they ſold for their ſubſiſtence; and ſo that the hungry Soldiers greedily feeding, died. Where the Greek Emperor were privy thereto, or no, is not certainly known; but certain it is, that he cauſed counterfeit Money to be coined, of purpoſe to deceive them; and in brief, there was no kind of miſchief to be practiſed againſt them, which he himſelf might not, or ſeem not to be ready to deviſe. And ſo that the Greek Emperor ſatisfied by this fo unfortunate an expedition, might for ever be afraid to take the like in hand again. And that nothing might be wanting that malice could deviſe, he had ſecret intelligence with the Turks themſelves, concerning the ſtrength of the Army, plotting unto them the means how they might be able to ſurprize them, when they came to night that ſome part thereof was by Pamphlo, a Captain of the Turks, overthrowen near Babitis, and many ſlain. But attempting to have done the like unto that part of the Army that paſſed through Phrygia, they were themſelves overtaken in their own device, and were ſlain with a great ſlaughter. After which, the Turks made great ſtories to ſlay Chriſtians further paſſage, kept the River Meander, encamping upon the farther Bank of that winding River, with a moſt huge Army. There theſe worthy Chriſtians right well declared, that it was but their Patience, that the Grecian Leſions that had before ſo long followed them, ſhould not be able to do them any hurt, whoſe ſufferings, were not to them become a Proſperity. The Emperor coming unto the River ſide, there was neither Bridge nor Boat to paſs over, and finding the great Army of the Turks on the other ſide, ready to give him battle if he ſhould attempt the River, with their Archers ſtanding upon every Bank ſide; he retired a little out of the danger, and ſent ſome of his ſouldiers, who commanded his Souldiers to reſreſh themſelves and their Horſes that night, and to be ready againſt the next morning to joya battle with their Enemies they were so far come to seek for. Little rest served him that night; early in the morning before day he arose, and arming himself, led his whole Army in order of batle; as did also the Enemy on the other side of the River, with their Battalions orderly placed, and their Archers upon the Bank side, ready to give the first Charge on the Christians, if they should adventure to come over. Both Armies thus standing in readiness, the order in fight of the other, and nothing but the winding River betwixt them, the Emperor before resolved to fight, with cheerful Countenance and Speech encouraged his Men as followeth.

That this expedition was of us taken in hand, for Christ his sake, and for the glory of God, and not of flesh or man; you know right well, fellow Soldiers. For, for the cause of Christ having contemned a pleasant life at home, we have voluntarily separated from our dear and dearest Friends, and from our dear Country, and foreign Countries; we are exposed unto dangers, and unto hunger, and unto cold, with cold, we languish with heat: we are exposed unto our bed, the heaven our covering: and although we are noble, famous, renowned, rich, ruling over Nations; yet swear we always our garments as necessary bonds, and are with them and our armour loaded, as was the weighty garments of Christ. Poor, parchured with thirst, chained, and beaten with the rods of Soldiers. But these Barbarians (divided from us by this River) to be the Enemies of the cross of Christ, whom we of long have desired to encounter withal, in whose land (as David saith) we have vowed to wash our selves: Who is there that knoweth not that he is altogether bloody and will not with open eyes, let me open mine eyes, if we may ascend straight way unto Heaven, (For neither is God so strict, that he knoweth not the cause of this our journey, or will not in recompence give unto us the immortal Cities, and shady dwellings of Paradise, which heaving forsaken our own dwellings, have chose rather for his sake than for their lives) if we call to remembrance what things they have done, and what things they do, for us, against our Friends and Countrymen, if we remember what grievous tortures they inflict upon them, or if we be any thing touched with the compassion of their innocent blood, unworthily still stand now courageously, and fight valiantly, and let us now say, or terror damn us. Let these Barbarians, who by their hands, and by their tongues, and by their craft and infruiter dash excel their false Prophet and Seducers, authors of their vaine impiety; so much are we superiours unto them in all things. Seeing therefore we are an holy Camp, and an army gathered by the power of God, let us not cowardly lose our selves, or let our dear Christ be shamefully to adventure our lives, for Christ's sake, let us bravely to adventure our lives. For Christ's sake, let us not lose our right; it is that we for him should die also? Unto this so honourable Expedition let us also give an honorable end; Let us fight in Christs name, with a most assured hope of an easy Victory. For none of them (I shall) shall be able to abide our force, but they shall give us the victory, by their flight. But if we shall die (which God forbid, that we should be an honorable place of our burial, where/ever we shall for Christ fall. Let the Persian Archer for Christ his sake, strike me, I will die in assured hope, and with that Arrow, as with a Chariot, I will come my day, I will be so me deaver than if I should be slain in a bold and valiant manner, and I will say unto thee, I will be so me deaver than if I should be slain in a bold. Now at length let us take revenge upon them, with whose impure Feet our Kinsmen and Christian Brethren trodden down, are gone into that common Sanctuary, in which Christ our Saviour, Equal and Affiance to his Father, is become a Companion of the Dead. We are they mighty men, we have braved down our Swords, which stand about the lively and shining

After this too great a Victory, the Chriftians without reluctance came to Iscunium, the chief Seat of the Turkish Kings in the lesser Afia, where they hardly besieged. Nevertheless, such was the strength of the City, being strongly fortified both by Nature and Art, together with the valour of the Defendants, that lying there long, they little prevailed, pressed in the mean time with greater extremities and wants in the Camp, than were the besieged in the City; whereupon they resolved to fetch a Mortality, people daily without number dying in the Camp; and the Emperor was glad to raise his siege, and to return into his Country. The chief cause as well of this great Mortality, as of the overthrow of so noble an Action, most men ascribe unto the malice of the Greeks; who not without the privy of their Emperor (as it was commonly bruited) mingled Lime with the Meal which they brought to sell

The honorable Expedition of Lewis the French King, by the malice of the Greeks, and envy of other Christian Princes of Syria frustrated and brought to naught.

About the same time also (or as some write, even at the same time together with the Emperor) Lewis the French King, the Eighth of that name, took upon him the Expedition for the relief of the Greeks in the East; and who, being forward with all the Chivalry of France, and accompanied with divers other great Princes, with a right puissant Army came to Constantinople, where he was by Emanuel the Emperor honourably received, with all the outward shews of feigned courtesy and civility. But when he came to the Straits, and landed in Asia, he found nothing answerable to that the dissembling Greek had before most largely promised. And to distress him the more, was by false Guides before conducted to a place, which he found to be the most desolate and barren Countries, where he saw the way a wonderful number of his Soldiers perished of hunger and thirst; many of them also fell off in the straits and difficult passages, and were devoured by the very beasts which he met. He was thus distressed, till the malicious Emperor for that purpose. Yet after many dangers passed, and his Army fore wasted, he came

Now had the state of the Christians in Syria, for certain years after the afore said Expeditions, refted in good peace; when Noradin the Turk (moved with some injuries done by the Christians unto the Turks and Arabians, who by the leave of King Baldwin dwelt in the Forest of Jerusalem) did send a befieged Tamada, a City of the Christians thither, and desired the Christians in the City, now brought unto great extremity, made a most deperate Sally, and hap with the Turks a sharp and cruel fight; but oppressed with the multitude, and enforced to retire, they were so hardly purified, that the Turks together with them entered the City, and put to Sword all the Christians that were therein. And the greater part of the Citizens (by good fortune) had in good time before retired themselves into the Castle, which was of great strength, and there stood upon their guard. Of whose distress, with the taking of the City, Baldwin hearing, raised a great Army, and so fet forward to relieve them. But when he was within view of the City, and of his own strength, after he had taken the spoil of what he could, fet fire on the City, and so departed. The Citizens thus delivered, repaired again the Walls of the City, the Kings Power still defending them. Noradin with his Power all the while lying close in the Woods not far from the City, waited for a better good opportunity to take the Christians, and so forthwith shortly after fell out according to his own desire; for the King doubting no such matter, but supposing him to have been quite gone, having at his return sent away all his Footmen, followed after himself, accompanied only with his Horsemen, they all not very strong; but as he was passing by a River, Noradin was suddenly fet upon by Noradin and the Turks, and after a sharp Conflict overthrowen the King himself with some few hardly escaped to Sapher, a Town there by; most part of his Nobility being there either slain or taken Prisoners; amongst the rest, Bertrand, of Blanchepois, Master of the Templars, and some others of great Name, fell at that time into the Enemies hands, and so were carried away Prisoners.

After this Victory, Noradin strengthened with new Supplies from Damasco, came again and be-

Many a day did Jehulaim, with the Turks had this young King afterwards, during the fortunate time of his Reign; wherein that troublesome Kingdom happily flourished amidst the Micro-rents; all which to recount, were long and tedious; among other things, it is worth the remembrance that Moradin the Turk, then King of Damafca, besieging the Castle, then belonging to the Kingdom of Tersulaim, was at a fit battle by Baldwin overthrownd and put to flight, with the loss of the greatest part of his Army. King Baldwin was before married Emmale, daughter to the Emperors Neece; and now the same Emperor by his second Marriage, had his Embassadors, requested that Trifles might again in marriage one of the Kings Nine Kingwomen. Unto whom the King, after mature deliberation having concerning the matter, offered the eldest, an honourable Lady, the Sister of the Countess, who the Emperor refused; and afterward by the consent of the Countess, made choice of Mary the Daughter of Raimund, Prince of Antioch lately dead. Which the Count of Tripolis taking in civil part, in revenge thereof, by certain Men of War whom he put to Sea, gave the distressed Frontiers of the Emperors Kingdoms, the Count of Tripolis a sore smart. In consequence of this Marriage was solemnizing, the King made his abode at Antioch, at which time he fortified the Castle of Pontifer upon the River Orante, against the Incurfions of the Enemies. But lying there, he was poysoned by his wonted manner, to prevent fickleness, the Countess of Wine took Physick of Barac a Jew, the Count of Tripolis being Christian. After the taking whereof, he fell presently into the Bloody-Flux, and afterward into a Consumption; whereby it was verily fuppofed, that he was poysoned by the Jew; and the rather, because the Countess of Wine the same Medicine that was left, being given to a Dame, who died in short time died. The King thus languishing in pain, to change the Air, removed first to Tripolis, and afterward to Berytus, where he departed this troublesome life, to live with his Sacred Christ, his bliss for ever. His dead Body was afterwards with great Pomp and Pomp, conveyed to Tersulaim, and there solemnly interred by the body of his Father. He departed the 12th of February, in the year of Grace, 1163, when he had reigned 21 years. He was a man so gracious, that not only his Friends, but even his Enemies themselves (as it is reported) lamented his death. Infomuch that Antioch the Emperor mefo, his Intimate Enemy, being invited by some of his Captains to invade his Kingdom at such time as his Funerals were in solemnizing, refused to do so, answering, That compaffion and regard was to be had of the just sorrow of the Citizens, who were mourning for the loss of such a King, the like was hardly again to be found in the World.

But leaving the Kingdom of Jerusalem, with the greater part of Servia, thus victoriously gained from the Infidels; let us for the orderly continuation of our History, again return to see the proceedings of the Turks at the same time in the lesser Asia also; wherein they yet held the State of a Kingdom, though not so great as before the coming of the Princes of the West into those Countries. After the death of Sultan Solyman (with whom Duke Godfrey and the other Christian Princes had much to do as they passed into Syria) as is aforesaid, one Mahomet succeeded him; against whom Adrianus, Sultan of Iconium, at that time the two Infidels (professing both one Superstition) became Friends, and joining their Forces, overthrew the Emperor with his whole Army, as he lay at the siege of Iconium, at which time he himself with much ado escaped by flight. Mahomet afterwards having got into his hands the whole Kingdom of the Turks, at the time of his death divided the same among his three Sons; unto Circassian his eldest Son he gave Iconium his chief City, with the Towns and Provinces subject thereunto: unto Jaguphan his other Son (or rather as some will have it, his Son in law) he allotted the Kingdom of the fruitful Country of Cappadocia, and the Plains adjoining; but unto Dadane his other Son (or Son in law) he gave the great Cities of Cæsarea and Sebastia, with the large Countries thereabouts, all sometime a part of the Greek Empire, but then the portions of the Turks. Long it was not after this division of the Kingdom, but that these Brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetful of the bonds both of Love and Nature, fell at discord among themselves; the Sultan seeking the destruction of Jaguphan, and he likewise of him, and that not by secret means, but even by open force of Arms. Emmanuel the Greek Emperor in the mean time whilst the destruction of them both, heartily rejoicing thereat, and by his Embassadors secretly animating the one against the other, yet in open shew more favouring of the part of Jaguphan than of the Sultan, by whose Aid he obtained against him many notable and bloody Victories; inso much that the Sultan weary of the Quarrel, was glad not only by his Embassadors to seek the Emperors favour, but even in person himself to go and meet him, as he came with his Army out of Syria, and so to accompany him unto Constantinople, where he was together with the Emperor most honourably received, with all the signs of Joy and Triumph that could possibly be devised. The Emperor no less rejoicing to be sued unto by so great a Prince, than did the Sultan at his so honourable entertainment.

Among other quaint devices of many, for the solemnizing of so great a Triumph, there was an active Turk who had openly given it out, That against an appointed time he would from the top of an high Tower in the Tilt-yard fly by the space of a furlong; the report whereof had filled the City with a wonderful expectation of so strange a feat. The time prefixed came, and the people without number assembled, the Turk according to his promise, upon the top of an high Tower shewed himself, girt in a long and large white Garment, gathered into many pleats and foldings, made of purpose for the gathering of the Wind; wherewith the foolish man had vainly perfwaded himself to have hovered in the Air, as do Birds upon their Wings, or to have guided himself as are Ships with their Sails. Standing thus hovering a great while, as ready to take his flight; the beholders still laughing, and crying out, Fly, Fly, fly, how long shall we expect thy flight? The Emperor in the mean time still disdaining him from so desperate an Attempt; and the Sultan betwixt fear and hope hanging in doubtful suspense what might happen to his Countryman. The Turk, after he had a great while hovered with his Arms abroad, (the latter to have gathered this wind, as Birds do with their Wings) and long deluded the expectation of the Beholders, at length finding the Wind fit, as he thought, for his purpose, committed himself with his vain hope unto the Air; but in stead of mounting aloft, this foolish Isaurus came tumbling down with great violence, that he brake his Neck, his Arms, his Legs, with almost all the bones of his Body. This foolish flight of the Turk gave such occasion of sport and laughter unto the vulgar people (always ready to scoff and jest at such ridiculous matters) that the Turks attending upon the Sultan could not walk in the streets undisturbed; the Artificers in their frolic shaking their Arms, with their Tools in their Hands, as did the Turk, and still crying out, Fly Turk, fly; whereof the Emperor hearing, although he could not chafe but thereat smile himself, as not ignorant of the scoffs and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in favour of the Sultan, who was not a little grieved therewith, he commanded such their Infidelity to be restrained.

The Solemnity of the Triumph overpassed (which by an ominous Earthquake at the same time happening was somewhat obscured) the Emperor to shew his Wealth, and to gratify the Princes, gave unto him many rich and Royal Presents, with such a Mass of Treasure, as that he much wondered thereat. In requital whereof, and in token of his Thankfulness, he again honoured the Emperor with the name of his Father, and terming himself by the name of his Son, promised to restore unto him the City of Sebastia, with the Territory thereunto belonging, then part of Dadane his Inheritance. Nevertheless all this was nothing else but meer dissimulation, as afterward by proof appeared; for returning home, he thrust Dadane indeed out of Sebastia, which he spoiled; with the Country thereabout; but forgetful of his promise, kept it wholly to himself; and by force took also from him the City of Cæsarea, with the Country of Amasia, by him before but lately possessed. In like manner he bent his Forces also upon Jaguphan his other Brother, who in the very preparation of those Wars died; by whose untimely death the City of Ancyra, with all his Dominions in Cappadocia, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now possessed of all his Fathers Kingdom, and swelling with Pride, forgetting all former courtesies, invaded the Emperors Territories, and took from him the City of Laudicea in Pergia, where he did great harm, as also in the Country thereabouts, killing the people as he went, or else carrying them away with him Captives. For the repeating of which Outrages, the Emperor with a strong Army passed over into Asia, and there in the Frontiers of his Territories fortified Dorileum against the Incursions of the Turk. In performance whereof, he, to the example and stirring up of others, carried the first Basket of stones himself upon his shoulders; and used such further diligence, that in short time the City was compassed about with strong Walls and deep Ditches, maugre the Turks, who ceased not with continual Alarms and Skirmishes to have hindered the Work. With like care, and for like purpose he also fortified Sebasteum, another strong Hold; and leaving in either place a strong Garrison, returned again to Constantinople. Nevertheless the Turks ceased not with continual Inroads to do what harms they might upon the Frontiers of the Empire, although not altogether with so good Success as before, being many times cut off by the Garrisons of the late fortified Towns; which he still increasing, caused the Emperor to expostulate with the Sultan, as with an unthankful man, and forgetful of so great kindness before done unto him, as the establishment of him in his Kingdom came unto; who with no less vehemency upbraided him again with Inconstancy and breach of Promise, as well for fortifying the aforesaid Places, contrary to the League betwixt them, as for that having promised much more, he had thereof performed nothing. Thus unkindly still growing upon every trifles (as it commonly falleth out among men of great Spirit, and jealous of their own Honours) it was daily expected, when the matter should fall out into open and bloody War; both of their being men of great valour; and apt to revenge the least Injury to them offered. Yet was it the Sultans manner, warily to manage his Wars by his pollicie and expert Captains; whereas the Emperor being of an hotter nature, and a courageous above measure, commonly in all his great Expeditions adventured his own Person, without respect what danger might there issue unto himself or his State. Long it was not but that the Emperor, fully resolved to be revenged of so many wrongs done unto him and his Subjects by the Turks, raised the whole Power of his Empire, both in Europe and Asia, in such sort as if he had thereof purposed, not only to have raised to the ground Iconium the Regal Seat of the Turkish Sultan, but even utterly to have destroyed the whole Nation of the Turks. Thus with a most puissant and populous Army, well appointed of all things necessary, he passed over into Asia, and so in good Order marching through Phrygia, Laudicea, Cleonia, (called in ancient time Pallia) St. Archangel, Lampæ, Calenae, (where the head of the great and famous River Maander riseth, wherewith the River Marisus falleth) and from thence to Chonia, he with ease and ease won a wide Road, passed by Myriophallon, an old ruinous Castle, ominous by the name thereof, as by the event in short time after it proved. And albeit that he marched very circumspectly, still intrenching his Army in every place where he lodged; yet could he make but small speed, by reason of the multitude of his Carriages, and of the late people that followed the same. The Turks in the mean while often times shewing themselves in Troops, and in places of advantage skirmishing sometime with one part of the Army, and sometime with another, but never daring to adventure the fortune of a full battel; yet by such means were the Victuals unadvisedly drinking, fell into many grievous Difficulties, especially the Flux, and the Cholera, in great number. The Sultan in the mean time, although he had in readiness a right puissant Army of his own, and had procured great Aid from the Persian Sultan his Kinsman and chief Supporter; yet fearing the doubtful event of War, and loath to adventure his whole Estate upon the fortune of a battel, fought by his Embassadors sent for that purpose, to come to some peace with the Emperor, and that upon such honourable Conditions, as by the wiser fore were thought not to be at any hand refused; which large offers, the Sultan as desirous of Peace, made unto him not once, but again and again; which the Emperor nevertheless (rejoicing great confidence in his own Power, and prick forward by the Gallants of the Court, better acquainted with the brave Triumphs of Peace, than the hard Wars of the Turks) readily refused, and so dismissing the Embassadors, scornfully would them to tell their Master, That he would give him answer unto his Requests under the Walls of Iconium. Which caused the Sultan, now out of all hope of any Reconciliation to be made betwixt the Emperor and him, with all his Power to take the Straits of Zulricea, whereby the Army of the Christians, departing from Myriophallon, must of necessity pass. The entrance into these Straits was by a long Valley, on either side inclosed with high Mountains, which towards the North rising and falling according as the Hills gave leave, opened into divers large Valleys, which by little and little growing again straiter and straiter, with high and craggy Rocks hanging over on either side, and almost touching one another, gave unto the painful Traveller a most hard and difficult passage.

Into this so dangerous a Valley the Emperor, not fearing the Enemies force, desperately entered with his Army, having neither provided for the clearing of the Passages, or safety of his Carriages, in no other order than as if he had marched through the Plain and Champaign Country, although it were before told him (that which he shortly after, but too late saw) that the Enemy had from long possessed both the Straits and Mountains, to hinder his farther passage. The Vanguard of his Army was conducted by Tolin and Andronicus the Sons of Angelus Constantine, accompanied with Macrodemus Constantine and Lapardus Andronicus; in the right Wing was Baldwin the Emperors Brother in law; and in the left the Maurozomes Theodorus; after them followed the Drudges and Scallions, with an infinite number of Carters and other base people, attending upon the Carriages, with the Baggage of the whole Army; next unto these came the Emperor with the main Battel, consisting of the most part of right valiant and worthy Soldiers; the Rearward was shut up by Andronicus Constantianus, with a number of most resolute men. They were not far entered into these Straits, but that the Turks from the Mountains and broken Cliffs showed themselves on every side, delivering their deadly throw from the upper ground, upon the Christians below, as thick as hail; nevertheless the Sons of Angelus, with Macrodemus and Lapardus, and the Vanguard, casting themselves into a three-square battel in form of a wedge, with their Targets in manner of a Penthouse cast clost together over their heads, and their Archers on every side lustily following their foes among the thickest of their Enemies, by plain force drove them out of the Straits they had before possessed, and caused them to retire farther off into the Mountains, and so having made themselves way, with little or no loss passed those dangerous Straits; until that at length having reached the top of the Hill very commodious for their purpose, as the safe Road, they there stayed, and presently encamped themselves. And haply with like good fortune might the rest of the Army have passed also, had they in like order, and with like courage presently followed after; but failing to do so, and troubled with the multitude of their Carriages, which could not possibly make any way through those strait and rough passages, (the whole troubled themselves one with another, as also the whole Army) they were from the upper ground miserably overwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkish Archers, whose Arrows fell as thick upon them from the Mountains, as if it had been a perpetual Tempest or shower of Hail, to the great disordering and difmayning of the whole Army; which the Turks quickly perceiving, and therewith encouraged, in great numbers came down from the Mountains, where they had before hovered over the heads of the Christians, and forcibly entering the plain ground, and coming to baldwin blows, first overthrew the right Wing; where Baldwin himself seeking to restore his disordered Companies, and to stay the fury of the Enemy (now raging in the blood of the Christians) with a Troop of valiant Horsemen breaking into the thicket of them, as became a worthy Captain, was there compassed in with the multitude of his Enemies, and slain, together with all his Followers, and the greatest part of the whole Wing by him commanded. With this Victory the Turks were so encouraged, that coming down with all their Power, they stopped all the ways whereby the Christians were to pass, who as men couped up in those dangerous straits, were not able either to defend themselves, or to hold one another; but inclosed as Deer in a toyl, and one rubbing another, were the cause both of the destruction of themselves and others. For by reason of the straitsness of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, neither they that were behind in the rearward, come forward to relieve the one the other, as need required; the Carriages also which were many, and in the middle of the Army, serving them to no other purpose, than to be hurt by themselves. There were the Beasts that served for burden, together with the Soldiers, overwhelmed with the Turks shot, the Vallies lay full of dead Bodies, the Rivers ran mingled with the blood of Men and Beasts, in such terrible manner as is not by word to be expressed. For the Christians not able either to go forward or retire, were there in those straits slain like sheep; if any courage or spark of valour were by any shewed against the Enemy, fighting at so great advantage, it was but lost, serving to little or no purpose. And to increase their miseries, the Turks in form shewed upon the point of a Lance the head of Andronicus Batusca, the Emperors Nephew, who coming with an Army out of Paphlagonia, and Heraclea Pontica, against the Turks of Amasia, was now by the way by them overthrown and slain. The report whereof, confirmed by the sight of his head, and the consideration of the desperate danger to which the whole Army presently stood, to troubled the Emperor, that he was at his wits end; and with dry tears (if it may be so said) diffembling his inward grief, as one out of comfort, took doubtful which way to turn himself. For the Turks having suffered the Vantage to pass, with all their Power charged the Emperors main battal, as his chief strength, nothing doubting, but that having once overthrown it, they should easily and at pleasure overthrow the rest. Oftentimes had the Emperor attempted to have driven the Enemy out of those straits, and so to have opened a way for his Army to be all in safety, but the Power of the Turks still increasing, and they at great advantage notably maintaining the passages before them taken. Nevertheless seeing no less danger in staying still, than in going forward, he with a few of his best Souldiers, armed with despair, and resolved to die, (unto which kind of men nothing is terrible) set forward directly upon his Enemies, willing the rest with like resolution every man to make for himself the best shift he could. And so with many wounds and bloody blows both given and received, he by plain force and might of Hand brake through the thicket of his Enemies, and so escaped out of those straits as out of a trap; but yet not without many wounds received in his Person, and himself so wearied that he was not able to lift up his Helmet, being beaten close to his head, and in his Target were found sticking thirty of the Turks Arrows, or thereabouts, the manifest tokens of his danger. The other Legions seeking to follow the Emperor, (for other way they had none) were on every side hardly assailed by the Turks, and infinite numbers of them slain, beside many others that perished in those straits, overtorn and trodden to death by their own Fellows. Yea such as had the fortune to escape out of one of these perilous straits, were forthwith slain in the next; for this dangerous a passage through the Mountains, was divided (as is aforesaid) into seven Vallies, which giving fair and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew fill straiter and straiter, all which straits the Turks had before strongly possessed. At which time also, the more to increase the terror of the day, the light hand raised with the feet of the Men and Horses, was with the violence of a most tempestuous Wind which then blew, carried so forcibly and thick that both the Armies grappling together, as if it had been in the darkness of the night, killed whomsoever they met withal, without respect of Friend or Foe; by which error many were even of their own Friends slain. In every place great heaps of Turks lying together, the Christians, and with them great number of Horses and other Beasts for carriage; so that those Vallies where this bloody Conflict was, seemed to be nothing else but a large burying-place of the Turks and Christians with their Horses; but the greater number was of the Christians that perished, and they not altogether of the common sort, but even of the bravest Captains, and the Emperors nearest Kinsmen. The violence of the Wind ceasing, and the day clearing up, there was of all others to be seen (a most woful Spectacle) men yet alive, some wounded, some whole, covered some to the middle, some to the neck, with dead Carcasses, in such sort as that they were not able with any struggling to get out; who with their hands cast up towards Heaven, with rueful Voices cried out for help to such as passed by; but all in vain, for every man possessed with the common fear, and by their danger measuring their own, assisted by their without compassion, as more careful of their own safety, leaving them yet living, as men to be numbed among the dead.

The Emperor himself as a man now almost spent, being got out of the danger, found a while to breathe himself under the shadow of a wild Pear Tree, without any Page or Man to attend him, whom a poor Common Souldier espied, and moved with compassion, came unto him, and offering him the best Service he could, helped him up with his Helmet, and buckled up his Armour, which before hung dangling here and there about him: when in the mean while a Turk coming in upon him, had taken his Horse by the bridle, in hope to have led him away Prisoner; whom for all that, the Emperor as weary as he was, with the truncheon of his broken Lance, which he had yet in his hand, thruck down to the ground, and

and so cleared himself of him. Presently after came also another sort of the stragling Turks, ready also to have rested upon him, and to have taken him Prisoner; of whom he flew out with the aforesaid horsemen's Staff, and with his Sword thruck off the head of another of them, and so kept them off, until that by the coming in of ten of his own Souldiers he was relieved. Departing thence with purpose to have joynted himself unto the Legions that were gone before in the Vauward, he had not gone far, but that he was troubled by other Turks that he met, and the heaps of the dead bodies that lay in his way; yet at last, having with much labour and more danger passed the Straights, and a River running thereby, being glad in many places to ride over the dead bodies of his own people, and some of his own Souldiers now resorting unto him, he there saw John Cracazene, a noble and right valiant Gentleman that had married his Niece, fighting alone against a great number of the Turks, to be compassed in and slain; whom he was no way able to relieve. Which Turks also seeing him pass by, followed after him, as after a most rich Prey, in hope to have either presently taken or slain him; whom nevertheless he (encouraging the small Company he had about him) notably repulsed, and so sometime marching forward, and again as occasion required making a stand, came at length long looked for, but most welcome, unto the Legions that were gone before; nor so sorry for their own hard estate, as careful of his danger.

But before he could come to those his Legions, he ready to faint for thirst, commanded water to be brought unto him out of the River that ran by the fast by; which after he had tasted, and by the unpleasant taste thereof perceived the fame to be infected, he fetching a deep sigh, Oh how unfortunately have I tasted Christian Blood! whereunto an audacious and malapert Souldier there present, and more bitter than the cruel time it self, replied, Emperor, thou didst not now, thou didst not now, I say, first, but long since, and oftenest thou drink the blood of the Christians; even until thou wast drunk again, at such time as thou didst with most grievous exaction vex and devour thy poor Subjects. Which reproachful Speech the Emperor put up in silence, making as if he had not heard it. With like patience he also forbore the same railing Companion, at such a time as he seeing his Treasures hardly best, and in danger to be taken by the Turks, to animate his Souldiers, willed them to do what they could to rescue the fame, and to take it for their labour: This Treasure (said this impatient Fellow) should before have been given to thy Souldiers, rather than now, when as it cannot be recovered but with great danger and bloodshed; and therefore if thou be a man of valour, as thou wouldst be accounted, and as the present case requires, valiantly charge the Turks (now ready to carry it away) thy self, and so recover them will gain good booty. Whereunto the Emperor answered no more but, Good words, Souldier, and so put it up, as did David the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the coming of the Emperor unto those Legions of his Vanguard (the only remainder of his Army that was left whole and unbroken) came also Andronicus Comnenophanus, who had the leading of the Rearward, with divers other of great place, who had by good fortune escaped the fury of the Turks. The miseries of that day (not well to be expressed) being ended by the coming on of the night, the Christians fast in the Camp, oppressed with a general heaviness, leaning their heads on their Elbows, and considering the present danger wherein they were, scarcely accounted themselves among the living; the Turks in the mean time to increase their fear, all the night running about the Camp, and crying aloud unto such of their Countrymen in the Camp, as had abjured their Religion, or for other respects had taken part with the Imperator, that they should that night get them out of the Camp, whereas otherwise if they stayed unto the morning, they should be all but lost men. In this so great an extremity the Emperor nor knowing what to do, came together his chief Commanders, declared unto them the desperate danger they were in, together with his resolution: which was, secretly himself to fly, and to leave the rest, every man to make what shift he could for himself. Which his base determination, so foul as fowler could not be, they all wondering at, and by chance overheard by one of the Common Souldiers that stood without the Tent, the same Souldier fetching a deep sigh, in desperation there of cried out with a loud voice, *What means the Emperor? And so turning himself unto him, said, on of a drear night be that hath thrust us into this desolate common and straight way, and cast us into destruction? And half as it were in a mortar included us in these Rocks, and Mountains, ready as it were to overthrow us! What had we to do with this vast of mourning, and mouth of hell? Wherefore came we into these mischievous and rough Straights? What can we particularly complain of the Barbarians, which in these execrable windings and straight ways thou imposedst upon us? Was it not thou that broughtst us hither? And wilt thou now, as Sheep appointed to the slaughter, thy self betray us? With which so forth a reprehension the Emperor thoroughly peirc'd, changed his former determination for flight, resolving now to stand by it, whatsoever happened. But what should he now do, beset with his Enemies still ready to devour him? Help he saw none, either in himself, or to be expected from others, nought remained but death and despair. In this extremity, all mans help now failing, it pleased the most Mighty (which chastified and health again, which frisketh, and yet giveth life, and suffereth not the staff of the sinners always to rage into the portion of the Just) with merciful eye to look down upon these distressed men, and with an unwanted kind of clemency to touch the Sultans heart, in such sort, as that he which but the other day stood in dread of the Emperor, and now having him as it were in his power, was overcome with his misery; or as in times past he by Husai overthrew the council of Achmetoph, and changed the mind of Abulston to follow such advice as should bring him the destruction; so then also he turned the mind of the Turkish Sultan, that (perforated by certain of the chief men about him, who in times of peace had used to receive great Gifts and Presents from the Emperor) he of his own accord by his Embassadors offered Peace unto the Emperor, before that he in so great distress sued unto him for any; and that upon the self same conditions they had made their League before. The Turks in the mean time ignorant of the Sultans resolution, early in the morning were ready to assault the Emperors Camp, in hope at once to have overthrown his whole power; and with a barbarous outcry still riding about it, came so nigh, that with their Arrows they flew divers of the Christians within their own Trenches; against whom the Emperor sent out John the Son of Constaninus Angelus, and after him, Macrodonas Constaninus, but to little or no purpose. by whose commandment the Turks ceased further to assault the Camp. This Gabrus coming unto the Emperors, and as the Emperors of the Barbarians honouring him with reverence down even to the ground; first presented him with a goodly Horse, whose furniture was all of Silver, as if it had been for triumph, and a rare two edged Sword. Afterwards falling into a large discourse concerning a Peace to be made, and with many kind words, he began to appease the Emperors heaviness conceived of his late loss; he among other pleasant conceits then uttered, seeing the Emperor in a rich Robe of yellow over his Armor, told him, that the colour was not fit for War, as ominous, and portending evil luck; whereat the Emperor a little smiling, gave it him, with the fortune thereof; and receiving the Horse and Sword sent him from the Sultan, signed the Peace. Amongst other conditions of the Peace (which the dangerousness of the time suffered not the Emperor curiously to examine) one was, That Dorileum and Sabulum, before by him fortified, and the ground of this unfortunate War, should be again refaid. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the Emperor delivered of a great fear, purposed another way to return home, to avoid the sight of the Slain: yet was he by his Guides, even of purpose as it was thought, led back the same way, to behold with his eyes those miserable fountains of the Slain, which could not with any tears be sufficiently lamented; for the Straights were made plain, the Vallies were raised into Hills, and the Forests lay covered with the Carcasses of the Slain; no man passed by, but with heaviness and grief, calling by name upon their Friends and Familiars there lost. Having again passed those doleful Straights, the Turks were again in the tail of the Army; for it was reported, That the Sultan repenting himself to have suffered his Enemies to so escape out of his hand, had given leave to such as would, to pursue them, but followed not himself with his whole Power, as before; for most of the better sort of his Soldiers loaded with the Spoil, were now returned home. Yet those that followed after the Army, saw many, especially such as were weak or wounded, and so unable to follow the rest; although the Emperor to help the matter, had for the refreshing of them, sent out some of his Captains and Souldiers in the Rearward. Being come to Chonos, and now out of fear of his Enemies, he gave unto every one of his hurt Souldiers money to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their Countries; and coming to Philadelphias, there staid for the refreshing of himself after his great misfortunes. In his return he raised Sabulum, according to his promise, but not Dorileum; whereof the Sultan by his Embassadors complaining; he answered, That what he had promised, enforced thereunto by necessity, he greatly forced not to perform. In revenge whereof, the Sultan sent out one of his most valiant Captains, called Atropack, with a good Souldiers chosen out of his whole Army, with straight charge to waste and destroy all the Emperors Provinces and Towns even unto the Sea-side, without sparing Man, Woman, or Child; and in token thereof, to bring with him some of the Sea-Water, and as some of the Sea-Sand: who according to his Charge spoiled Phrygia, with the Cities along the River Mander, even unto the Sea-side; and so returning with a rich Prey, by the way spoyled what before he had left untouched. But in passing the River Maender, when he feared least, he fell into the hands of John Batacas the Emperors Nephew, and of

Ducas Constantine a most valiant Captain; of purpose sent against him by the Emperor with a great Power; where he was slain, and taken together with all his Army, and the rich prey he had taken, all again recovered. Many other hard conflicts passed after this, betwixt the Emperors and the Turks, the one continually seeking to annoy the other; all which, for that therein nothing fell out much worth the remembrance, I for brevity willingly pass over. Of them only I left troubles did Emanuel the Greek Emperor, when he had by the space of eight and thirty years worthily governed that great Empire, having in the time of his sickness but a little before his death taken upon him the habit of a Monk, in token he had forsaken the World. All the time of his Reign he was no less jealous of the Christian Princes of the West, than of the Turks in the East; and therefore ever dealt with them unkindly. In time of War he was so laborious, as if he had never taken felicity but in pain; and again in Peace to give over to his pleasure, as if he had never thought of any thing else. After whose death the Turkish Sultan, without resistance invading the Frontiers of the Empire, took Sesepolis, with divers Towns thereabout in Phrigia, and long besieged the famous City of Atalia, and so daily encroached more and more upon the Provinces of the Empire, joyning the same unto his own: which was no great matter for him to do, the Greek Empire being then no better governed than was the Chariot of the Sun (as the Poets feign) by Phaeton, far unfit for so great a charge: for Alexius Comnenus, otherwise called Porphyrogenitus, being then but a Child of about twelve years old, succeeding his grave Father in the Empire, after the manner of Children altogether following his pleasure; his Mother with his Fathers Kinsmen and Friends, who above all things ought to have had an especial care of his Education, neglecting the old Emperors trust in them repofed, followed also their own Delights, without the regard of the Ruine of the Commonwealth. Some enamoured with the Beauty of the young Emperess, gave themselves all to bravery, and the courting of her; other some in great authority, with no less desire in the mean time, with the common Treasures filled their private Coffers; and a third sort there was (of all the rest most dangerous) who neither respecting their sensual pleasure, nor the heaping up of wealth, looked not so low, aiming at the very Empire it self. As for the common good, that was of all other things of them all least regarded. Among the third sort of the ambitious, was old Andronicus, the Cousin of the late Emperor Emanuel, a man of an haughty and troublesome Spirit, whom he the said Emperor Emanuel had for his aspiring, most part of the time of his Reign kept in prison, or else in Exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for fear of raising new troubles, confined to live far off from the Court; who now hearing of the death of the Emperor Emanuel, of the Factions in Court, of the Childishness of the young Emperor Alexius, given wholly to his Sports; and the great men put in trust to have seen to his bringing up, and to the Government of the Empire, some like Bees to fly abroad into the Country, seeking after Money; as the Bees do for Honey, some others in the mean time like Hogs, lying still and fattening themselves with great and gainful Offices, wallowing in all Excess and Pleasure, to have no regard of the Honour or Profit of the Commonwealth; thought it now a fit time (in such disorder of the State) for him to aspire unto the Empire after which he had all his life-time longed. That he was generally beloved of the Constantinopolitans, yea, and of some of the Nobility also, he doubted not; for then he had long before by his popular behavior gained, together with the distrust of the late Emperor, jealous of his Estate; which as it cost him his Liberty, so mislaid it not much but that it had cost him his Life also; but now that he had dead, wanted nothing more than some fair colour for the shadowing of his foul purpose. Among many and slight divers things by him thought upon, he was at length the Out of Obedience which he had given to the Emperor Emanuel and slain his Son, (which Oath he had delivered unto him in Writing) That if he should see, hear or understand of any thing dangerous or hurtful to their Honor, Empire, or Persons, he should forthwith betray it, and to the utmost of his power withstand it; which words (not so to have been wrested) as he felt serving for his purpose, he took first occasion to work upon. And as he was a stout and imperious man, thereupon writ divers Letters unto the young Emperor his Cousin, unto Theodossius the Patriarch, and other such as he knew well affected unto the late Emperor Emanuel; where he amended in the present Government, he seemed most to complain of the immoderate power and authority of Alexius, then President of the Council; who in great favour with the young Emperor, and more in ward with the Emperess his Mother than was supposed to them, with her honour, ruled all things at his pleasure, informally, as if nothing done by any the great Officers of the Empire, or by the Emperor himself was accounted of any force, except his approbation were thereunto annexed: whereby he was grown unto such an excessive pride, having all things in his power, as that no man could without danger, as upon the venomous Basilisk, look upon him. Of which his so execrable and insolent power Andronicus by his Letters now greatly complained, moved thereunto (as he would have it believed) with the care he had of the young Emperors safety, which could not (as he said) long stand with the others so great power, which he therefore (as in duty bound) wished to be abridged; as in aggravating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiarity with the Emperess; which first muttered in Court, afterwards flew (as he said) throughout the whole World. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the Person of the Emperor, and Dishonour of the State, he forthwith as one in confidence bound, with great Gravity and Eloquence (being a very learned man) both in open Speech and Writing most earnestly desired: and thereby so wrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithful Counsellor to the State, a thing much to have been wished. Wherefore leaving Osmun, the place whereunto he was by the Emperor Emanuel in a fort banished, travelling towards Constantinople, he gave it out in every place where he came, what he had sworn, and what he would for his Oaths sake do: unto whom men desirous of the change of the State, and such as gave credit unto the report long before given out, That he at length should become Emperor, flockt in great numbers, as Birds about an Owl, to see him, and with vain praises to chattering about him. In this sort he came as far as Paphlagonia; in every place honourably received, as if he had been a deliverer of his Country from long God. And in the Imperial City he was not longed for of the Vulgar People only, as their Light and Load-Star, but divers of the Nobility also by secret Messengers and Letters, perswaded him to hasten his coming, and to take upon him the Government; assuring him, that there would be none to resist him, or to oppose themselves against his shadow, but all ready to receive him; especially Mary the young Emperors Sister by the Fathers side, and her Husband Cesar (who being a Woman of great spirit, and grieving much to see her Fathers Empire made void, unto Alexius the President, and the Emperess her Step-Mother, whom she naturally hated) had raised a great and dangerous tumult in the City against them both, which was not without much bloodshed appeased; and now ceased not by often and most earnest Letters (to her own destruction and her Husbands, as it afterwards fell out) to prick forward Andronicus and to hasten his coming; who by Letters and Messengers daily coming unto him from the Court still more and more encouraged, leaving behind him the Country of Paphlagonia, came to Heraclaea in Pontus, and thill on towards the Imperial City, with great cunning and dissimulation winning the hearts of the People as he went. For who was so fit to be heard, whom his sweet words and abundant tears flowing from his gracious eyes, as from two plentiful Fountains down by his hoary Cheeks, might not have moved? All that he did or desired, was (as he said) for the common good and liberty of the Emperor. By which means he had drawn unto him a wonderful number of the rude Country People by the way as he came. But coming unto Bythinia, he was by John Ducas Governour of the State, and so to Nicomedia as an Enemy to the great City of Nice, thrust out also. Nevertheless, passing by those Cities, he held still on his way, until at length he was near unto a Castell called Chanae, encountered by Andronicus Angelus, sent with a great power against him, by the great President Alexius; who otherwise as an effeminate man, given over to his pleasure, spending the greatest part of the night in rioting by candle light, and most part of the day in his bed, with curtains close drawn as if it had been night; yet doubtful now of the coming of his Enemy, left nothing undone which he thought might help for the assuring of his State. Many of the Nobility of whom he stood in doubt, he gained unto him by means of the Emperors Mother; who by her rare Beauty, sweet Words, and gracious Behaviour, as with a Line drew all men to her. Other some he overcame with Gifts and great sums of Money, whereof he now made no spare; And so wrought the matter, that no man of any account or mark went over to Andronicus. Who nevertheless with such followers as he had, joyning battel with Angelus (sent against him, as is before said) overthrow him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great displeasure and without reason, called Angelus (now dead) unto him for an account for the Money delivered unto him for the assuring of the Charges of that unfortunate War; who seeing his misfortune to be taken as if he had framed it himself, and of purpose betrayed the Army committed to his charge; by the Counsel of his six Sons, being all men of great Valour and great spirit, first took the refuge of his own house; but finding that was in no safety, with his Wife and his said Sons (two of which came afterwards to be Emperors) presently fled over the Straight to Andronicus; who seeing of him coming towards him, is reported to have used this Text of Scripture, Behold I will send mine Angel before thy face, to prepare thy way, alluding to his name of Angelus, as the Prestige of his good Successor.

Andronicus
encamped in field
Constantinople.

Wherefore encouraged with the coming of these Noblemen his Kinsmen, he without longer stay marched directly unto the Sea-side, and there a little above Chalcedon encamped almost eight or nine miles from Constantinople, causing many great fires (more than needed) to be made in his Army, to make it seem unto them of the City greater than indeed it was; and with the light thereof to keep the Citizens in suspense, with the doubtless expectation of some great matter to ensue. Wherein he was not without deceits, for they having him now as it were in fight, leaving their work, ran some to the Sea-side, some up to the Hills and high Towers to behold his Army a far off, willing with their friendly looks, it had been possible, to have drawn him over the Straight into the City. Alexius knowing himself not able by Land to encounter with so strong an Enemy, (for now home which on foot could not go over to Andronicus, were secretly in heart already with him; otherwise thought themselves sufficiently to show their fidelity to the Emperor, if finding fill at home, they should take part with neither, for to have filled heads and aspiring minds, for the furtherance of their desires, taught the common people both to say and think) thought it best by Sea to avert the present danger; and therefore commanded all the Emperors Gallies (being before rigged up and ready) to be throngly manned and put to Sea, for the lessening of Andronicus and the Straight of Bosphorus, that Andronicus should not that way pass. Now had he determined to have made especial choice of some assured Friend of his own to be General of this Fleet, as he had done of the Captains and Masters, being all of his own Kinsmen and Domestical Servants, but as he was about to have done, Constance (surnamed the great Captain) opposed himself against it, challenging that place as due to himself before all others; so that overcome by his Authority (which it was no time for Alexius now to dispute) he was glad to commit the charge and trust of the whole Fleet unto him, as General. Thus having (as he thought) made the Sea sure, he sent over unto Andronicus, as from the Emperor, (for all was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with Letters and other Instructions, whereof the effect was, To command him forthwith in peace to return to the place from whence he came, and not farther to trouble the State; promising him in so doing, the Emperors Favour, with many great Honours and Preferments to be afterwards bestowed upon him; which otherwise might turn to his utter destruction. Which Letters Xiphilinus having delivered, and done his Message, is reported to have secretly advised Andronicus to proceed in his purpose, and not in any case to yield to that which was of him required: whereupon Andronicus encouraged, proudly rejected the graces offered, and willed the Messenger to tell them that sent him, that if they would have him to the place from whence he came, they should first displace the proud President Alexius; and call him to an account for the Villanies he had done; then the Emperors Mother they should deprive of her honours, and shut her up as a Nun into some Cloyster; there to learn to amend her life, and of all that the Emperor according to his Fathers Will, should take upon himself the Government, and not be overtopped by others, by whose too much Authority, his Majesty and Honour was (as he said) too much impaired. But within a few days after, Constance, the great Captain and General, carried over all the Gallies to Andronicus, leaving nothing but their names for the President in his Rolls to look upon, whose revolt above all other things encouraged Andronicus, and cast Alexius even into the bottom of despair. For now Andronicus his Friends flocked together in the City, not secretly as before, but openly in all places; and such as wist a change in the State, impudently footing at Alexius, passed over the Straight to Chalcedon in great numbers to Andronicus, where having filled their Eyes with beholding of his goodly Person, his chearful Countenance, and reverent Age; and their Ears with his sweet words and great Promises, returned home merry and joyful, as if they had been in some terrestrial Paradise, filling the City with his praises. After that, Andronicus his two Sons, Tobin and Mamuel, with divers others, whom the President had cast in prison, were for a liberty, and of his chief Favourites laid fast in their rooms. As for Alexius the President himself, with all his Friends and Faction in the Court, they were taken and committed to the keeping of the Guard; a right strange alteration. But about midnight, Alexius himself was secretly conveyed out of the Court to the Patriarchs House, and there kept with a stronger guard than before. A wonderful change and worth marking, a man so honourably born, but yesterday in greatest honour, attended upon with many thousands, all at his command, having the power to spill or save; to day in bonds, in disgrace, in misery and despair, and not so much as a Page to wait upon him. Which he taking very grievously, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not suffer him to sleep or take any rest. Of whose misery, the Patriarch taking pity (although he had of him very evil deserved) yet cheered him up with comfortable words, persuading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with such speeches as fitted not his present state, to provoke his Keepers to use him evilly. Within a few days after early in the Morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs House, and set upon a very little bad Jade, and so with a ragged clout put upon the top of a Reed in manner of an Ensign, carried before him in derision, was brought to the Sea-side, and there cast into a little Boat, was so brought to Andronicus, by whose commandment, with the general consent of the Nobility, he for his evil Government shortly after had his Eyes put out. This was the miserable end of the immoderate power, or rather of the insolent Sovereignty of Alexius; who, had he with more moderation and vigilancy governed, might both have kept Andronicus out of the City, and himself from so great misery; having at his command all the Emperors Treasures, his Gallies, with most part of the strength of the Empire. Now came the Noblemen over space to Andronicus; the last that came, was the reverend Patriarch Theodosius, with the chief of the Clergy; of whose approach, Andronicus hearing, went out of his Tent to meet him, and falling down (as great as he was) flat at his Horles feet, and in a while after arising again, kissed the Patriarchs foot, calling him the Emperors Saviour, the Lover of Virtue, the Defender of the Truth; and comparing him with the famous Father Tobin Chrysostome, omitted not any honourable Title he could possibly devise to give him. But the devout Patriarch, that had never seen Andronicus before, having now well viewed him, and marked his stern Countenance, his sullen Nature, his crafty and dissembling Manners, his exceeding Statue, being almost ten foot high, his stately Gait, his proud Looks, his continual Severity, and melancholy Silence, he did never think that to their own destruction had called such a man man in, said, Hitherto I have heard, but now I have also seen, and plainly know, and fetching a deep sigh, adjoynded therunto that saying of the Prophet David; As we have heard so have we also seen. In which words, he covertly quipped the dissembling meeting and sublimation of Andronicus; and withal called to remembrance the words of the Emperor Emanuel, wherewith he had many times painted forth Andronicus unto the Patriarchs, if he would most lively have represented him unto his view.

All things in the City and in the Palace fit in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two Sons, and leave given unto the Emperors Friends to come over unto him, and to be acquainted with him; at length Andronicus himself departing from Damalus, in a Galley crossed the Strait, oftentimes by the way merrily singing that saying of the heavenly Psalmist; Return my Soul into thy rest, because the Lord hath done well unto thee, having delivered my life from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. The Emperor with his Mother Xene, then lay not in the Palace at Constantinople, but at another Princely House of his in the Country near unto Philopaton, as Andronicus had appointed; whither Andronicus first went, and coming unto his presence, most humbly prostrate before him, with sobbing and tears, as his decent manner was, kissed his feet. As for the Emperor his Mother, he lightly saluted her, and as it were but for fashion sake, not dissembling in his countenance the old grudge he bare against her. And so without longer stay went unto his Tent provided for him not far off; round about which, all the great Noblemen had pitched their Tents also, flocking unto him as Chickens seek for Refuge under the Hens wings. Having there stayed with the Emperor a good while, he was desirous to go unto the Imperial City, and to see the late Emperor Emanuel his Cousins grave. Where entering into the Monastery of our Lady, where he was buried, and coming to his Tomb, he wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainly out. So that divers of the standers by, ignorant of his dissembling nature, by way of admiration said; O what a wonderful thing is this! O how he loved the Emperor, his Cousin, although his fierce and cruel Persecutor! And when one of his standers would have pulled him from the Tomb, saying, Thou hast had sorrow for him enough; he would not be removed, but requested them to suffer him yet a little to tarry by the Tomb, for that he had something in secret to say unto the dead; and so with his hands cast up and clofe together, as if he had prayed, and his eyes fast fixed upon the Tomb, he moved his lips, and secretly said something, but what, no man could tell. Some said it was some charm or incantation. But others more pleasantly conceived, said, and (as it afterward appeared) more truly, that Andronicus did triumph over the late Emperor Emanuel, and revel with his ghost, with which of the dead was awake, but by the sounding of the last Trump. And now will I be revenged of thy Poverty, and I will justify myself as a Lion with a fat Prey; and take sharp Revenge of all the Wrongs thou hast done me, when I have once possessed my self of thy Royal City.

After this the Emperor's lately Houses, but staying in no place long, he disposed of all Matters of State, according to his own pleasure. Unto the young Emperor he allowed Hunting, and other his vain delights, with Keepers joyous unto him, to watch not only his going in and out, but also that no man should talk with him of any matter of Importance; for all the Government of the State he took unto himself; not for that he wist so well thereunto, above others, but so to drive from the Court all them of the contrary Faction to himself, that were able to do any thing, and to restore born some Sway. The Soldiers, whose help he had used in aspiring to the Government, he rewarded with great bounty; at all their Offices and Preferments he bestowed either upon his own Children, or other his great Favorites; divers of the Nobility whom he liked best, were by him in short time driven into exile; some were by him deprived of their fight, and some others cast into prison, not knowing any cause why, more than that they were by him secretly condemned, for that they were of the Nobility, or had done some good Service for the State, or exiled for their Perjurance, or some other thing that grieved Andronicus, or else for the spark of some old displeasure which yet lay hid as fire raked up in the ashes. So that the State of that time began to grow most miserable; and the treachery even of men nearest in blood, seeking the destruction one of another, far to serve their own turns, or to gratify Andronicus, most horrible; and not only one Brother betrayed another, but even the Father his Son, and the Son his Father, if Andronicus would have it so. Some accused their nearest Kinsmen, that they derided Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more favoured Alexius the young Emperor, then, a great offence. Yea, such was the mischief of the time, that many in accusing others, were themselves accused, and charging others of Treason against Andronicus, were themselves charged by them whom they accused, and so clapt up both together in one prison. Neither were they of the Nobility only, which were Enemies to Andronicus, thus hardly dealt withal, but even some of his great Favorites and Followers also; for some whom but yesterday he had used most kindly, and enrolled among his best Friends, upon them to day he frowned and tyrannized most cruelly; so that you might have seen the same man the same to day crowned and beheaded, to be graced and disgraced; insumuch that the wiser folk deemed Andronicus his praifings, the beginning of a mares disgrace; his bounty, his undoing; and his kindness, his death. The first that talked of his Tyranny, was Mary the Daughter of Emanuel the Emperor, who for the hate she bore to Alexius the late President, and the Emperors her Mother in law had (as is aforesaid) above all others, with for his coming; but was now by one Pererignonites (sometime an Eunuch of her Fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, having in his aspiring mind polluted the utter destruction of the Emperor's Possession) cunningly poisoned; as was her Husband Cesar, who lived not long after her, poisoned also (as was supposed) with the same Cup that his Wife was. Now among others of the late Emperors House, none had ever stood more in his lights, than had the fair Empress Xene, the young Emperors Mother, who now he caused not more bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuse, as an utter Enemy both to the Emperor and the State, making as if he would leave all, and again depart, if he were not removed from the Emperor her Son; and by his cunning so incensed the glodly detested vulgar people against her, that they came flocking to Theodosius the good Patriarch arch, ready to tear him out of his Cloaths, if he confessed not to the removing of the Empress, as Andronicus had desired. So a Council being called of such his Favorites and others, as were not like indifferently to hear her Cause, but affuredly to condemn her, the Guiltless Empress after many things fallily laid to her Charge, was accused of Treason; that she should by her Letters have solicited Bela King of Hungary, her Brother in law, to invade Brantzaba and Beldigade, two strong places belonging to the Empire. Whereupon she was condemned, and shamefully cast into a most filthy Prison near unto the Monastery of St. Diomedes. Amongst other Noblemen called into this wicked Council, were Leo Monisteris, Demetrius, Tornicus, and Confantius Paternus; who not yet altogether devoted to Andronicus, being asked their Opinions concerning the Empress, said, They would be glad first to know, Whether that Council against his Mother, were called by the Emperors consent or not? With which Speech, Andronicus pierced to the heart, as with a Sword, in great rage thrust up and said, These are they which encouraged the wicked President to all his Villanies, lay hands upon them. Whereupon they of his Guard in threatening manner shook their Weapons and Swords at them, as if they would even presently have slain them; and the common people, casting them by their Cloaks as they came out, pulling them some one way, some another, were so fierce upon them, as that they had much ado to escape out of their hands with life. Now lay the fair Empress (but the other day one of the greatest Princesses of the East, and honoured of all her Subjects) in grief, misery and despair, forced even of her hair Kept every hour expecting the deadly blow of the Hangman. Yet was not the cruelty of Andronicus against her, any thing affwaged, but grieving that the yet breathed, shortly after assembled the former Council, the Ministers of his Wrath, demanding of them, What punishment was by Law appointed for such as betrayed any Town or Province of the Empire? whereunto answer being given in Writing, That it was by the Law, death; he could no longer hold, but that he must in great cheer break out against the poor Empress, as if it had been the case that had done it; and thereupon the wicked Counsellors crying out with one voice, That she was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed; by and by without longer stay, a damned Writing was subscribed by the young Emperor her Son, as if it had been with the blood of his own Mother, whereby she was (I abhor to write it) most unworthily condemned to die. The same appeared to be this most horrible and cruel Execution done, were Manuel, Andronicus his eldest Son, and Georgius Augustus, his near Kinsman; who both did maid at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the Emperors Command, said plainly, that they never before confessed to the death of the Empress, but had clear hands of her innocent offence, and therefore would now much less see her innocent Body dismembered in their fight. At which unexpected answer Andronicus much troubled, with his Fingers oftentimes plucked himself by the hoary Beard, and with burning eyes casting sometime up his head, and sometime down, lighted at his own most miserable tyrannical estate, fretting inwardly, that they which were nearest unto him, whom he thought he might even with a beck have commanded to have done any mischief, abhorring his cruelty, should refuse to do the thing he so much desired to have done; yet repressing his anger for a while, within a few days after, he again commanded her to be strangled; which was accordingly done by Confantius Tryphicus, and Perperionis the ungracious Eunuch; by whose help he had before poisoned Mary the Emperors Daughter, with Cesar her Husband, as is before declared. Thus perished this great Empress, cruelly strangled in prison, by these two wicked men, the merciless Executioners of Andronicus his Wrath. Her dead Body lately adorned with all the Graces of Nature, even to the admiration of the Beholders, was without more ado secretly raked up in the Sand fast by the Sea-side; a poor Sepulchre for so great a Person.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durst thus cruelly deal with the young Emperors own Mother, and nearest Friends? yet was all covered under the pretence of the common good, and safety of the State and Empire. And the more to shadow Andronicus his secret purposes, as not proceeding of any private or hidden malice, or aspiring humor, from which he of all men would seem most free; and the more to manifest his Devotion and Loyalty to the young Emperor his Cousin, he was the only Perwarder unto the rest of the Nobility, to have him solemnly Crowned (which as yet by reason of his tender Age he was not); and at the time of his Coronation, with his own hands supported him up, as he was (after the manner of the Solenities) carried unto the great Church, and so back again; the Crocodiles rears fill plentifully running down his aged face, as if it had been for exceeding joy; which many of the meaner sort beholding, and deeming thereof the best, highly commended his kindness, accounting the young Emperor thrice happy, in so grave a Governor and faithful Counselor; who in love and kind affection towards him, seemed not inferior to his natural Father; so cunningly had he under the Veil of Piety, shadowed his most execrable Treachery; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted most loving and kind. But hidden Treason, he it never so well dissembled, must at length shew it self. So Andronicus having got into his Power both the Emperor and the Empire, and the chief Friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way, or else driven into exile, thought it now high time for himself to aspire unto that high Sovereignty, after which he had so many years longed. Wherefore calling together a Council of his Flatterers and Favorites, whom he had for such purpose promoted unto the highest Places of State (all or the most part of the grave Counsellors and friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being now displaced, or otherwise taken out of the way) he at a man only careful of the common good, declared unto them the dangerous State of the Empire, by reason of a Rebellion raised in Byzania at Nice, by Isaac Angelus, and Theodorus Catacenus; and another at Prusa, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their grave advice for the suppressing thereof; who for ignorance of their Lords purpose (as thereof before sufficiently instructed) answered with one consent, That of such great Mischief there would be no end, except he were joined in Fellowship of the Empire together with Alexius, by his Gravity and deep Wisdom to supply what wanted for the good Government of the State in the young Emperor his Cousin. At which speech the flatterers (being in number many, and for the most part the Followers of Andronicus his Flatterers) gave a great shout, and as if it had been already granted, with an Applause cried out, Long live Alexius and Andronicus the Greek Emperors; and that with such a vehemency, as if they would therewith have

And that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Lark. So by the general consent that wicked Assembly (unworthily the name of a grave Council) the choice was made, That Alexius should (as a man unfit to Govern the State) be deprived of all Imperial Dignity, and commanded to live a private life. Which dishonourable Decree of the Conspirators was yet scarcely published, but that another more cruel came out of the same Forge. That he should forthwith be put to death, as one unworthy longer to live. For the execution of which horrible a Sentence

Stephanus Hagiochristophorites (one of the chief Ministers of Andronicus his Villanies, and by him promoted even unto the highest Degrees of the Honours of the Court) with Confantius Tryphicus, and one Theodorus Badirinus, Captain of the Tornentors, were sent out; who entering his Chamber by night, without compassion of his tender age, or regard of his Honour or Innocency, cruelly strangled him with a Bow string; which detestable murder so performed, Andronicus shortly after coming in, spurned the dead body with his foot, railing at his Father, the late Emperor Emanuel, as a baseborn and injurious man; and at his Mother, as a common Whore. The dead was forthwith truck off from this miserable Carcase (the mirror of Honours unfaithful) and left for the monstrous Tyrant to feed his eyes upon; the body wrapped up in Lead, was in a Boat carried to Sea by Jo. Camaterius, and Theodorus Clamatus, two of Andronicus his noble Favorites; who with great joy and glad return with the same Boat to the Court, as if they had done some notable Exploit. But long continued not the joy of the Mischievous, Vengeance still following them at the heels as it did the two, who not long after, with the rest that conspired the innocent Emperors death, all or most part of them came to shameful or miserable ends. Thus perished Alexius the Emperor, not yet full fifteen years old, in the third year of his Reign; which time he lived more like a Servant than an Emperor, first under the command of his Mother, and afterwards of the Tyrant which brought him to his end.

Who joyeth now but old Andronicus, made young again, as should seem, by his new gained Honours? for shortly after the murder committed, he married Anne the French Kings Daughter (as some report) before betrothed to young Alexius; a tender and most beautiful Lady, not yet full eleven years old, an untimely Match for three score and ten. And in some sort as it were to purge himself and his Partakers of the shameful murder by them committed, and to stop the mouths of the people, he by much flattery and large promises procured of the Bishops a general Absolution which they had before given unto the Emperor Emanuel, and Alexius his Son. Which obtained for a while had the same Bishops in great Honour, and shortly after in greater Contempt, as men forgetful of their Duties and Calling. After that he gave himself wholly unto the establishing of his Estate, never reckoning himself thereof assured, so long as he saw any of the Nobility or famous Captains alive that favoured Emanuel the late Emperor Alexius his Son; of whom some he secretly poisoned, as Mary the Empress Emanuel Daughter, rant the very Heavens. The brut thereof flying abroad into the City, forthwith you might have seen every floor and corner of the City full of the vulgar people, with some also of better sort swarming together like Bees, and founding the Praises of Andronicus (who now was come out of his House into the Court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long live the Emperors Alexius and Andronicus. With which loud acclamations and the least signs of many good men, (for all were not mad of that frenzy) the young Emperor awaked, and seeing the Court full of people, and Andronicus by them saluted his Fellow in the Empire; knowing now no other remedy, thought it best to yield unto the time, and to with the rest flattening the old Tyrant, welcomed him full free as his will, by the name of his Friend and Companion in the Empire; which he now in dissembling manner feigning unwilling to take upon him, and refusing the place offered, was by the rout of his flattering Favorites enforced to his own great contentment, to yield to their request; some of them with both their hands carrying him up, until they had all were against his will placed him in the Imperial Seat, prepared for him fall by the young Emperor; others in the mean time no less busied in pulling off his private Attire, and putting upon him the Imperial Robes.

The next day, when this Participation of the Empire should be published, and they both proclaimed Emperors, the name of Alexius was set before the name of Alexius; whereof his Favorites (though some others interpreted it otherwise) gave this reason, That it fitted not with the Majesty of the Empire, that the name of a Boy should be set before the name of so reverend, grave, wise, and excellent a man as was Andronicus, his Companion in the Empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great Temple to be Crowned, then first began to shew to the people a cheerful Countenance, and setting aside his stern Look, after his long devotion done, filled the vain people heads with many large Promises of a more happy form of Government than before. All which proved nothing but more dissimulation and deep deceit, that cheerfulness of Countenance and Speech serving but for a while to cover his inward, secret, and most inhumane Cruelty. And the more to deceive the World, the Ceremonies of his Coronation past, at such time as he stood for Confirmation and Confirmation of all, receive the sacred and dreadful Mystry, the pledge of our Redemption, not without due reverence to be named, much left with impure hands touched; after he had received the Bread, and taken the Cup in his hand, he with most devout Countenance framed of purpose to deceive, and his eyes cast up to Heaven, as if his Soul had there already been (the fairest Match of Hypocrisy) fore by those dreadful Mysteries, and most deeply protested in the hearing of the people standing by, that he had taken upon him the Fellowship of the Empire for no other end or purpose but to assist Alexius his Cousin in the Government, and to strengthen his Power; whereas his secret meaning was nothing less, as shortly after appeared. For after a few days spent in feigned Devotions for the prosperous beginning of his Empire, he forthwith turned his mind unto other Designs. And having above all things purposed the death of the young Emperor, he called together them of the Council, his own Creatures and corrupt Ministers of his Wickedness, who had now oftentimes in their mouths that saying of the

with her Husband Cefar; some for light occasions he deprived of their light, as he did Emanuel and Alexius the Sons of that noble Captain John Comnenus; Andronicus Lapidus, whose good Service he had oftentimes used; Theodorus Angelus, Alexius Comnenus the Emperor Emanuel's base Son; some he hanged, as Leo Synglus, Martin Laganus, with divers others; some he burnt, as Mamali, one of the Emperor Alexius his chief Secretaries; all men of great Honour and place. For colour whereof he pretended himself to be sorry for them, deeply protesting, that they died by the feverity of the Law, not by his will, and the just doom of the Judges, whereas he was himself (as he said) to give place; and that with tears plentifully running down his aged Cheeks as if he had been the most sorrowful man alive. O deep diffimulation, and Crocodiles tears, by nature ordained to express the heaviness of the heart, flowing from the eyes as showers of rain out of the Clouds, in good men the most certain signs of greatest grief, and surest testimonies of inward torment; but in Andronicus you are not so, you are far of another nature, you proceed of joy, you promise not to the distressed pity or compassion, but death and destruction: how many men's eyes have you put out; how many have you drowned; how many have you devoured? Most of the Nobility that favoured the late Emperor Emanuel and Alexius his Son, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, struck such a fear into the rest, that for safeguard of their lives they betook themselves to flight: some one way, some another, never thinking themselves in safety so long as they were within the greedy Tyrants reach; whereof shortly after ensued no small Troubles, to the shaking of the State of the whole Empire. Isaac Comnenus the Emperor Emanuel's high Kinsman, took his Refuge into Cyprus, and kept it till to himself. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuel's Brother, Son fled into Silicia, and there first up William King of that Island, against Andronicus, who with a great Army landed at Dyrrachium, took the City, and so from thence without resistance passing through the heart of Macedonia, spoiling the Country before him as he went, met his Fleet at Thessalonica, which famous City he also took by force, and most miserably spoiled it, with all the Country thereabout, so that he brought a great fear upon the Imperial City itself. Unto which so great evils Andronicus (intangled with domestic Troubles, and not knowing whom to trust) was not able to give remedy, although he flew he had (to no purpose) sent out certain of his most trusty Ministers with force as he could well spare. For the Majesty of his Authority growing still less and less, and the number of his Enemies both at home and abroad daily increasing, and the favour of the unconfront people (who now began to speak hardly of him) declining, he uncertain which way to turn himself, rested wholly upon Tyranny, proscribing in his fear, not only the Friends of such as were fled, and whom he distrusted, but sometimes whole Families together, yea and that for light occasions, sometime those who were his best Favorites, whose Service he had many times used in the execution of his Cruelty; so that now no day passed wherein he did not put to death, imprison, or torture one great Man or other. Whereby it happened that the Imperial City was filled with sorrow and heaviness, every man hanging the head, and with silence covering his inward grief; nor without danger to have been then uttered. Among many others appointed to this slaughter, was one Isaac Angelus a man of great Nobility, whom Hagioriphorites (the chief Minister of Andronicus his Tyranny, and for the same by him highly promoted) suspecting, as one that bare no good will to the Emperor (cause enough of death) came to his house to apprehend him; and finding him at home, after a few hot words commanded him to follow him; whereas the Nobleman making some stay, and abhorring the very sight of the Wretch, as unto him ominous and fatal, Hagioriphorites himself began to lay hands on him, reviling his Followers, that they had not forthwith drawn him out of his house by the hair of his head, unto the Prison by him appointed. For they, touched with the Honour of the Man, moved with pity, forced him not, but stood still as beholders. Isaac seeing himself thus beset, and no way now left for him to escape, resolving rather there presently to die, than shortly after to be murdered in Prison, drew his Sword as the rest were laying hands upon him, and at the first blow cleaved the wicked head of Hagioriphorites down to his shoulders; and so leaving him wallowing in his own blood, and like a desperate man laying about him amongst the rest, made himself way through the midst of them. And so imbued with blood, with his bloody Sword yet in his hand, running through the midst of the City, told the people what he had done, and crying unto them for help in defence of his Innocency, fled into the great Temple, there to take the Refuge of the Sanctuary; where he had not long fast (in the place where the guilty flyer thither for Refuge used to sit, and confessing their Offence, crave Pardon of such as go in and out) but that the Temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of all parts of the City, come to see the Nobleman, come to behold what should become of him; for all men thought that he would before Sun-set (notwithstanding the reverence of the place) be drawn thence by Andronicus, and put to some shameful death. Thither came also John Ducas, Isaac's Uncle, and his Son Isaaco increase the tumult; nor for that they were anything guilty of the death of Hagioriphorites, but for that they had before become Sureties unto the suspicious Tyrant, for their Kinsman Isaac, and he likewise for them; by whose trespass they well knew themselves now brought into no less danger than if they had been Abettors thereunto. And beside them also, many other there were, which doubting of their own estate, and fearing the like might happen to themselves, picked forward with hard Speeches, the common people flocking thither, instantly requesting them to fly there, and to stand by them now at their need, being so injuriously wronged; whose piteous complaints moved many to take part with them. At which time also, no man yet coming from the Emperor (being as then out of the City) to repress the Sedition, nor any of the Nobility opposing themselves, no Friend of Andronicus, appearing, none of his bloody Ministers or Officers shewing themselves, nor any that do much as speak a good word in his behalf, or in dislike of the tumult, the boldness of the feditious people increased, every man in a great liberty saying what he list, and after their rage more and more encouraging another. So spent Isaac that long night, not thinking (God wot) of an Empire, but still expecting the deadly stroke of Andronicus. Yet had he with great intreating so prevailed, that divers of the Assembly shutting the Church doors, and bringing Light into the Church, stayed there with him all night; and by their example caused some others to fly also. The next morning by break of day were all the Citizens flock again unto the Temple, cursing the Tyrant to the Devil, as the common Enemy of mankind, wishing unto him a shameful death, and the honour of the Empire unto Isaac. At that time by fortune, or rather God so appointing it, Andronicus was out of the City at his Palace of Meladinn, on the East side of Propontis, where he was by nine a clock at night certified of the death of Hagioriphorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night fired he not, neither did any thing more, but by those Letters advised the people to pacify themselves, and not by foolish Rebellion to cast themselves into further danger. In the Morning Andronicus his Favorites began to shew themselves, and to do what they might to have appeased the tumultuous Multitude: yea and presently after came Andronicus himself, landed with his Imperial Gally at the great Palace in the City, but with the enraged People nought prevailed either the persuasions of the one, or report of the presence of the other; for they all, as upon a signal given, and as men inspired with one spirit, or stirred up with the same fury, flocked together into the Temple of S. Sophia, one encouraging another, and scoffing at such as stood by as idle lookers on, without Weapons in their hands, reviling them and calling them rotten Limbs that had no feeling of the common harm. After that, they broke open the Prisons and set at liberty the Prisoners, as first instruments to increase the Tumult, were not all notable Offenders of the Dregs of the People, but many of them born of good Houses, and for some light Fault; or inconsiderate Word (whereof every man was in those times bound to give an account) or for some Friends Offence against Andronicus, there laid fast. These of all others most animated the people, in this sort, as they which before fear of the danger did but softly murmur to themselves against Andronicus, did now openly join with the rest of the base feditious. Then might you have seen some with their Swords and Targets, some also in their Armour, but the greatest part armed with Clubs and Staves, and other such like rude Weapons, Arms of Fury, hastily taken in their Shops as by chance they came first to hand, running forth in every place. By this Assembly of the most furious and promiscuous People was Isaac hoisted up, and with a general applause saluted Emperor. At which time one of the Sixtons of the Church, with a ladder took down Constantine the Great his Crown of Gold, (which for a Monument hung over the holy Altar) and set it on Isaac's Head; which he at the first seemed unwilling to wear, nor for that he was not desirous enough of the Empire, but for that he feared the extreme danger of the matter, and thought those things that were then done to be but as it were a sick mans dream, like enough straightway to vanish; beside that, he feared in doing the more to exasperate Andronicus. Which his Uncle John Ducas (as is said before, standing by him) perceiving, plucking off his Cap, and shewing his old bald Head, requested the People, That if his Nephew did refuse it, they would set it upon his; whereunto they with a great outcry answered, That they would no more yield their obedience to an old bald Man, as having received many harms from the hoary hairs of old Andronicus; and therefore for his sake hated, every old Man, more fit for Charon's Boat, and his Coffin, than for an Empire, and especially if he had a forked Beard, and bald Head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Isaac by the tumultuous Multitude invested in the Empire; and so royally received upon one of the Emperors Horles, richly furnished with a Saddle and Trappings of Gold, which they had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the Temple unto the Court, and Rafael Comnenus the Patriarch waiting upon him, whom the headstrong People had intreated against his Will to confirm with his Authority what was by them done for the establishing of Isaac in the Empire. Andronicus at his coming to the Palace perceiving first by the confused cry of the tumultuous Multitude, and afterwards by shewing with his Eyes, how the world were calling upon his old Friends and flattering Favorites, thought first by their help to have repelled the Fury of the Rebels; who as Friends of his better Fortune, and not of himself, were now for the most part shrunk from him; and those that were left, so feignly coming on, as if in his quarrel they had no mind to spend their lives; with which heartless Company Andronicus fearing to oppose himself against the Fury of the Multitude, with his Bow and Arrows in his hand got him up into the highest Tower of the Palace, called Centauria, and from thence bestowed certain shot amongst the People. But seeing that to be to no purpose, and better persuaded to do more with them by fair words, than such vain force, he from the top of the Tower cried aloud unto them, That if they would be quiet and depart, he would by their consent resign the Empire unto his Son Adamus; whereas the People, who were now all armed, feared not to pour forth most reproachful words in contempt both of himself and his Son; and so furiously broke into the Court by one of the Gates called Carax, which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope, casting from him all his Habilliments of Honour, and disguising himself fled again to his Gally accompanied only with Anna his Wife, and Martina his Minion, and to returned to Meladinn, his place from whence he came. Isaac but yesterday in the bottom of despair, and shadowed as it were with the hand of Death, by the strange change of Fortune to day mounted unto the highest Type of worldly Honour, entering the Palace, was there again with the greatest applause of the People that might be, saluted Emperor. From whence he forthwith sent out certain Companies of his most assured Friends and Followers, to apprehend Andronicus; who now as a man at once forsaken both of his Friends and of his better Fortune, secretly fled with his Wife and his Paragon, before remembered, to Chele, attended upon only with a few of his trusty Servants, which had of long time served him before he was Emperor. There taking Ship, with purpose to have fled unto the Troacetybes, (as no man thinking himself safe in any Province of the Empire) he was twice or thrice by foul Weather put back again, the rough Sea abhorring (as it seemed) to carry him that had polluted it with the dead bodies of the Innocent by him slain, and still threatening (as it were) to devour him. Thus strangely flayed by foul Weather, or more Isaac, yet blinded in appealing to the Mercy of the Highest, he was found by such as were sent out to seek after him, and being by them apprehended, was with two great Iron Chains fast locked about his proud Neck, and heavy Gyves upon his legs, cast into the Caltie of Adema; and in that miserable Habit shortly after presented to the Emperor, yet blinded in appealing to the Mercy of the Highest, he was found by such as were sent out to seek after him, and being by them apprehended, was with two great Iron Chains fast locked about his proud Neck, and heavy Gyves upon his legs, cast into the Caltie of Adema; had before murdered or deprived of their fight, afterwards being committed to the hateful Fury of the People, he had his right Hand cut off, and was again committed to the same Cattle, without Meat, Drink, or any other comfort : where after he had lien a few days, having one of his Eyes put out, he was transported to the Gallies, as if he was to be put to death thereoff, and fo as if he were in Triumph) led through the Market place, his bald Head all bare, as if it had been a dead mans Skull taken out of a Charnel Houfe, in a short old Coat: fo miserable a Spectacle, as might have exprefsed a fortune of a man. But the Bedlam and most infolent Citizenz especially they of the bafter fock, as Cooks, Cobers, Curriers, and fuch like, flocking about him like Bees (without regard that he had but the other day worn upon his Head the Imperial Crown, then honour'd with the name of King) and as if they were the Ravens, that they had not long before folemly fworn unto him Obedience and Loyalty) ran now as men out of their Wits, omitting no kind of Villany they could devise to do unto him : fome thrust nails into his Head, fome, caft dirt in his Face, fome the dung both of Men and Bees, fome caft Stones at him as at a mad Dog, and other fome opprobrious and defpiteful words, no lefs grievous unto him than the reft ; amongst others, an impudent Drab coming out of the Kitchen, caft a pot of fcaolding water in his Face : and in brief, their outrage fo excited, that he was forc'd to fwear, that he would be as good as he should be him the greateft Villain. Having thus shamefully, as in a ridiculous riddle brought him into the Theater, they there betwix two Pillars hang'd him up by the Heels ; where having fuffer'd all thefe defightful Indignities, with many more, not without offence to be mov'd, he was at length forc'd to fwear, that he had patience, not giving one evil word, but sometimes faying, Lord have mercy upon me ; and otherwiles, Why do you break a braised Reed? Yet the furious People nothing mov'd with the Calamity of fo great a man, (of all others now the most miserable) (thrice him of his back, Clasp'd in a fag, and with a fword in his hand) (and then to make an end of him, thrust his Sword in at his Throat : up to the twift as he hung ; other two with their long Swords proving their Strength, who could strike furthest into his Buttocks. This miserable perished this famous Emperor after he had reigned above twenty years, and was buried in the Church where he had carried away fome pieces thereof) being taken down from the place where he hung, was caft into a bafe Vault in the Theater, where it for a fpace lay, as the loathsome Carcafs of fome wild Beaft, and the miserable Spectacle of Mans Fragility : for ſince the Emperor would not fuffer his Name to be forgot, he was call'd the Emperor of the People overpaſſed it was by fome more charitable men remov'd thence, and laid in a low Vault near unto the Monastery of the Ephori ; which, as Nicetas Choniater (Author of this Hiftory ſpeaking of the time wherein he liv'd) faith, is yet there undilford to this day. He was a man of a goodly ſtature, of a ſquare tall, and well proportioned ; in his Countenance fate a certain reverend Majeſty, adorned with ſuch notable Vertues, as might have made him worthy to have been compar'd unto the greateſt Emperors of his Stock and Family, had he not obſcur'd his Name, and his goodly Fortune, by his own wickedneſs : whoſe ſon he once ſaid him to lead the greateſt part of his Life in Priſon or Exile ; the other brought unto him a moſt shameful End.

*King Angels his Successory: by the Favour of the People thus exalted unto the Empire, at the first governed the same with great Lenity and Moderation, as if he had altogether abhorred from the Effusion of his Subjects Blood; but afterwards, when he was troubled both with his Enemies, and Domesticks, he did invade the Imperial City by such of the Nobility as thought themselves no less worthy of the Empire than himself: for repenting of such Infolencies, and the afflicting of his State, he became so severe punishing the Offenders, and such others as he had forgiven, that he was accounted by his Subjects not inferior in Cruelty to Andronicus his Predecessor; for many days passing without the condempnation or execution of one great Man or other, he seemed of the manner sort, of whom he is famous to make no great reckoning; whereby he left them in such a manner, that his Subjects, who before had him in great honour, and became unto him no less odious than he was before Andronicus. Upon which general dislike of the People, his ingrateful younger Brother Alexius (by him before for the great love of Money he was called the Money-Lover) took occasion to rise up against him, and by the Favour of some Soldiers desired him together both of his Empire and his Sight; and having put out the Eyes, thrust him into a Monastery, there to live as it were out of the World, as a man condemned to perpetual darkness, after he had reigned nine years and six months. In the mean time, Alexius being now Whither it were the revenging hand of God, for the hard measure used to Andronicus, or not, he leave it to the wifer to confider, who in his deep Providence, wherewith he best governeth all things, would have a moderation used in punishing of such a tyrannical Empire, as this was. And while before our Eyes the Empire of State, of Power and Authority; and that as all worldly things are subject to change, so by the just Judgment of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt we do unto others, the same we may receive again from others. In these few gates we have seen the fall of the Empire of Constantinople (which I have somewhat more at large prosecuted, not so much for the novelty of the matter, although it were right strange, as for that it was the end of the Loffes and Ruin thereof, the greatness of the Turks for the last part grew) Glorious Emperor Constantine the fourth, means to take from the Empire divers strong Towns and Castles in the lesser Asia, together with a great part of the Country of Phrygia; Alexius, Andronicus and Isaac the succeeding Emperors, troubled with dangers nearer home, having nothing to oppose to the Emperor Constantine the fourth, were not redeeming for a while an unfire Peace, with no less change in short time to be renewed again. This victorious Sultan (for so he may of right be called) holding in his Subjection a great part of the lesser Asia, now a Man of great years, dying, left behind him four Sons, Masius, Agapane, Almasius, and Caspianus, all of them young, and without strength when he divided his Kingdom. Unto Masius he bequeathed Amalia, Agapane, Dory, Almasius, with divers other pleasant Cities of Pamphylia; unto Caspianus, he assigned Melyene; Caspianus, and the Colony now called Tyrra: unto the youngest, Almasius, he gave Armenia, and some other Cities upon the Sea-Coast; but unto Caspianus, he left Iscionia his Regal Seat, and with it Lycania, Pamphilis, and all the Countries thereabouts as far as Cotianum. Of these four, Caspianus long lived not after his Father; for whose Inheritance Recurtine Prince of* of Deuce, and Majus Prince of Amyra his two Brothers) fell at variance, and so at last into an open War. But Majus finding himself too weak to fight for his warlike Brother Reuterine, yielded unto him the Territories which he saw he must needs forego; and glad now to keep his own, he made peace with him, and so returned home. But this ambitious and haughty Spirit, with his Forces thus doubled, denounced War unto his Brother Caisiofrees; who doubting his own Strength, fled unto the Emperor Alexius Angelus for aid, as had his Father done before him unto the Emperor Manuel, who was his Father's good friend. But the Emperor but of late had obtained the Empire by the deposing of his Brother; and altogether given to pleasure, reputed all those Domestical Wars of the Turks, some part of his own safety; sent him home without Comfort as one quarrel enough of him. He therefore defended his own ground against his Brother, who was his Father's good friend.

Howbeit, he was scarcely come to Iconium, but he was by Reusinate expulſed thence, and driven to fly into Armenia, where he was by Zebane King of that Country, a Turk alſo, honourably received and courteouſly uſed, but yet denied of the aid he requeſted; the King pretending that he was already in League with Reusinate, and therefore could not; or as ſome thought, that he was the ſon-in-law of the ſame, and could not intermeddle with him. Whereupon the poor Sultan utterly diſcouraged, returned again to Conſtantinople, and there in poor Eſtate, as a man forlorn, paſſed out the reſt of his

Now having thus passed through the Turkish affairs in the lesser Asia, together with the troubled Estate of the Constantinopolitan Empire, no small cause of the Turkish greatness; the course of time calleth us back again before we pass any farther, to remember their proceedings also at the same time, and shortly after, in Syria, Judea, Egypt, and those more Southerly Countries, which the People of that Region call not by all means to enlarge their Empire, until they had brought all those great Kingdoms under their Obedience.

Almeri-

King of Jerusalem

After the death of Baldwin King of Jerusalem, of whom we have before spoken, Americus his younger Brother, Earl of Yppa and Afcalon, being chosen to succeed him, was crowned with the better good liking of the Clergy, and the People, than of the Nobility, elected King. Not for that there wanted in him any good parts worthy of a Kingdom, but for that some of them were wanting in the Nobles of the Nation. Nevertheless he was (as we said) by the general consent of the People, Elected, Proclaimed, and by Americus the Patriarch with all Solemnity crowned, the seventeenth day of February, in the year of our Lord's Birth, 1163. At which time, the Egyptians first of all denied to pay unto him their wonted Tribute. In revenge whereof, he in person himself with a puissant Army entered into Egypt: and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, and his Army, he fought with him, till he had slain him, and his Army, and he returned him to flight; who to flay the further pursuit and safety of the Christians, cut the Banks of the River Nilus, and so drowned the Country, that the King was glad to content himself with the Victory he had already gotten, and so to return to Jerusalem.

The next year Almericus was again drawn down with his power into Egypt, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him against Saracou; whom Noradin the Turk, King of Damafco, had sent as General with an Army, to restore Samar the Sultan before expelled, and to depose Dargan. In which Expedition Dargan being slain, and Saracem being won certain Towns, kept them to himself; Saracem doubtfull of his good meaning, joynd his Forces with Almericus, and by his help expelled Saracem out of Egypt. But whilst Almericus was thus buied in Egypt, Noradin the Turk making an irruption into Arabia, the Christians near unto Tripoli, was by Gilliers, the Count of Antioch, and Bohemond Prince of Antioch, Raymond the younger, Earl of Tripoli, Calamoun Governor of Cilicia, and Toros Prince of Armenia, came with their power. Of whose coming the Turk hearing, raised his Siege and departed. After whom the Christian Princes eagerly following, were by the Turk set up in certain deep and rotten Fens (wherein they were wont to be wont to be entrined) and there with a great Slaughter overthrowen. In which conflict, all the chief Commanders of the Army were taken, except the Prince of Armenia, who foreseeing the danger had retired, after he had in vain disswaded the rest from the further pursuit of the flying Enemy. This Armenian being taken, was about a Year before the last fall of Noradin, but the Count of Tripoli was after eight years straight Captivity hardly delivered. Noradin after this Victory returning again to the Siege of Arcthisia, in few days won the Town; and encouraged with such good success, and the absence of the King, laid Siege to the City of Panade, the Prince being delivered unto him, upon condition that the Citizens might at their pleasure be safely deare.

At the same time Saracen General of Noradin his Forces, took from the Christians two Cattles; the one in the Country of Sidon, the other beyond Jordan upon the Borders of Arabia, both in the Custody of the Templars; twelve of whom the King at his return hanged up for Treason.

Shortly after Saracen, King Noradin his great Man of War, with all the power of the Turks, came down again into Egypt, with purpose to have fully subdued all that notable Kingdom unto his Lord and Maffer. Of whose power, Sanne the Sultan standing in dread, prayed aid of Almeric, promising unto him besides his yearly Tribute, a fine of forty thousand Ducats for his pains. The matter fully agreed upon, and all things now in readines, Almeric set forward with his Army, and encountering with Saracen and his Turks at the River Nilus, overthrew him in a great Battel, yet not without some loss, for the Turks in their Flight lighted upon the Kings Carriages with the whole Baggage of the Army, and overrunning them that way, made the chariot way so full of dead men, that a moft rich Rife, whereby it came to pass that the Christians had the Victory, for the Turks enjoyed the Spoil.

Saracón after this overthrow having again gathered together his dispersed Souldiers, took his way to Alexandria, where he was by the Citizens received; after whom the King following, gave no attempt unto the City, for that he knew to be but vain, but incamped close by the side of the River Nilus, from whence the City was chiefly to be victualled. Whose purpose Saracón perceiving, and betime foreseeing the distress of his whole Army

Army for want of Victuals, if he should there long lay; leaving there his Son Saladin (or as some call him his Nephew) with a thousand Horsemen for the keeping of the City, secretly by night departed with himself, and the rest of his Army; and passing through the Defars, did great harm in the upper parts of Egypt. Of whose departure Almericus understanding, was about to have followed him, but that he was otherwise persuaded by the Egyptian Captains to continue his former purpose for the gaining of the City; wherefore when the Countess of Saracen began to approach the Walls, and with divers Engines of War to disturb the Defendants; wherewith the Citizens (better acquainted with the Trade of Merchandize, than the Feats of War) discouraged, began now to consult among themselves for the turning out of those troublesome Guests whom they had so lately received; which Saladin perceiving, certified Saracen his Uncle thereof, requesting his speedy relief in that his dangerous Estate, and with much intreaty persuaded the Citizens for a while to hold it out, until he might from him receive an answer; of all which the Christians and Egyptians without having Intelligence, laid so much the harder unto the City. Gladly would Saracen have done what he was by his Nephew requested; but perceiving it to be a matter of no less danger than difficulty, he by the means of Hugh, Count of Cesarea, and one Amruthus another noble Christian, both then Prisoners with him, concluded a peace with the King; whereupon the City was forthwith yielded up, and Saladin with his Turks suffered in safety to depart. At which time also all Prisoners were on both sides freely and without ransom set at liberty. Thus Saracen for this time disappointed of his this purpose for the Conquest of Egypt, returned back again to Damascus and Almericus with great glory to Aleppo, where he arrived with his Army the one and twentieth day of September in the year 1167.

In this late expedition, King Almericus on the one side enlisted with the Wealth of Egypt, and on the other encouraged with the Weakness of that effeminate People, relying for the most part upon foreign Strength; had purposed himself to invade the Kingdom, and so if possible he might, to join it to his own. For colour whereof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before given, had secretly sought to join in League and Amity with Noradin King of Damascus. The chief thrirer up of the King unto this War, was one Gerbert Master of the Templars; who in respect of the aid by them of his order to be given, had obtained of the King, after the Victory gained, to have the City of Pelufium with all the rich and fertile country about the same, given unto him and his Brethren the Knights of the Order for ever; upon which hope, he contrary to the mind of many of the Knights, for the furtherance of that War, gaged his whole Wealth and Credit, with all the Treasure of his House. So all things now in readiness for so great an Enterprize, Almericus country his Army for forward in October, and having in ten days passed the sandy Defars, came to Pelufium; which City he (after three days Siege) took by force, and put to the Sword all them that were therein, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition; which City, he according to his promise before made, gave unto the Templars. After that, he began also to besiege Cairo, at which time his Fleet lacked the City of Tapium. In the mean time, Saracen the Egyptian Sultan, considering the danger he was in, to satisfy Almericus his greedy desire, offered to pay him twenty hundred thousand Ducats to withdraw his Forces; and forthwith sent him one hundred thousand, for the ransom of his Son and his Nephew taken Prisoners at Pelufium; and for the rest to be paid within five days after, he gave two of his Nephews Hostages. Whereby the payment he deferred from day to day, of purpose in the mean time to raise the whole power of Egypt, alio to receive aid from the Turks by Saracen, which he daily expected; of whose speedy coming, Almericus understanding, left part of his Army at Pelufium, and with the rest went to have met him; but missing him by the way, Saracen with his Turks came in safety to Cairo, unto the Sultan, as he had desired. Wherefore Almericus dismayed with the multitude of two so great Armies now joined together, retired back again to Pelufium, and there taking with him the Garrison before left, returned home to Hierusalem; having in that expedition (begun with the breach of Faith) laid the foundation of the ruin of his Kingdom, as in few years after, it by proof appeared, by the evil Neighbourhood of the Turks, by that means brought down into Egypt.

Saracen the Turk after the departure of Almericus, easily perceiving a most fit time and opportunity to be offered for him now to obtain that which he had in vain before both fought and fought for, encamped with his Army near unto Cairo, and notably counterfeited himself of all others the most devoted Friend of the Sultans; so that he was then two paces all the King's tokens of Love and Friendship, that could possibly be devised; the Sultan oftentimes feasting the Turk, and in kindness likewise being feasted of him; but at length going as his manner was, unto the Camp to visit him, he was by the Turks slain. So Saracen having brought to his what he desired, and entering the City with his Army, was by the great Caliph, (from whom the Egyptian Sultans, as from their Superiors, the true Successors of their great Prophet Mohamet, took their Authority) appointed Sultan, the first of the Turks that ever enjoyed the same; which Royal Dignity he had not possessed fully a year, but that he was taken away by death. In whose stead Saladin his Brothers Son, by and by stepped up; who altogether a Martial Man, not regarding the reverend Majesty of the Caliph (as had his Uncle Saracen, and all the Egyptian Sultans before him) with his Horsemen's Mace struck out all his Pottery, the better to affirm himself and his Successors the Turks in the possession of his new begotten Kingdom; and after that divided the great Treasures of the Egyptians among his Turks, to encourage them the more to follow him in his Wars against the Christians.

This glorious Kingdom so much spoken of in Holy Scripture, and renowned of the Learned Historiographers of all Ages, after the Ruine of the Roman Empire, was sometime part of the Constantinopolitan Empire, and a notable Member of the Christian Common Weal; until that about the year of our Lord 704, the Egyptians weary of the Pride and Covetousness of the Grecians, revolted from them unto the Saracens, whose Superstition they also received; and so under the Government of the Sarafin Caliphs, the Successors of the false Prophet Mohamet lived about 464 years, until the year when invaded by Almericus; they prayed aid of Noradin the Turk, Sultan of Damascus; who to their relief sending Saracen with an Army, repulsed indeed the Christians, but oppressing their liberty, took to himself the Kingdom, which he left unto his Nephew Saladin, in whose Pottery it remained mained until it was from them again taken by the Christian Slaves the Mamelukes; under whose servile Government it was holden of long time, till that by the great Emperor of the Turks Selimus the first, it was again conquered and the Mamelukes utterly destroyed: In the Government of whose Prosperity, the mighty Emperors of the Turks, it hath ever since remained as part of their Empire, until this day, as in the process of this History God willing shall appear.

Saladin thus possessed of the great Kingdom of Egypt, and all things set in such order as he thought best for the Benefit of his Estate, with a great Army entered into the Land of Palatine, in the year, 1170, and there besieged Daron, which Town he won, and overthrew such as were sent by King Almericus to have relieved the same; with which small Victory contenting himself, as with the good beginning of his rising Fortune, he returned back again into his Kingdom; yet he was his Army to great and populous, as that the like Army of the Turks had never before been seen in the Holy Land. Wherefore Almericus considering in what danger he stood, his Kingdom now being on both sides beset by the Turks, sent out his Embassadors unto the Christian Princes of the West, to crave their Aid for the defence of that Kingdom which their Fathers had won; and for the same purpose went himself in Person unto the Emperor of Constantinople, of whom he was Royally entertained, and afterward sent back loaded with the promises of great matters, as were also his Embassadors from the Princes of the West. All which for all that forced unto nothing, but vanished into smoke.

The year following, viz. 1171. Saladin besieged Ferrea, the Metropolitane City of Arabia; but hearing that Almericus with a great Power was coming to the Relief thereof, he raised his Siege, and retired; as he did also next year after, having in vain attempted the strong Castle of Mont-Royal, on the further side of Jordan. In like manner also the third year he came again into the Holy Land, and spoiled the Country beyond Jordan; but hearing of the Kings coming against him, he forthwith returned again into Egypt. All these light Expeditions, this potent Prince made not so much for hope of Victory, or to prove his Enemies strength, as to train his Soldiers, especially the effeminate Egyptians, and to make them fitter to serve him in his greater designs.

Shortly after did Noradin Sultan of Damascus, and in his time a most notable Champion of the Turks, after he had reigned nine and twenty years. Upon whose death, Almericus forthwith besieged the City of Panalea, in hope to have again recovered the same; but he was by the Widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great sum of money and certain number of certain Prisoners, intreated to raise his Siege and depart. So having first away his Army, and traveling with his ordinary Retinue to Yberia, where he had the Summer before been sick of the Flux, feeling himself not well, he returned on Horse-back by old Difdase intending upon him, he was also taken with a Fever; whereupon after he had been some few days grievously tormented, he requested his Physicians, with some gentle potion to loofe his Belly, which was now somewhat stayed; which they refusing to do, he commanded the potion to be given him upon his own peril, hap thereon what he should; which being given him, and his Belly again loosed, he seemed thereafter to have been at the first well eased; but his worsted Fever with great vehemency returning, before his weak and spent Body could be with convenient means refreshed, he suddenly died the tenth of July, in the year, 1173, when he had reigned about ten years. His dead Body was with the great lamentation of all his Subjects, solemnly buried by his Brothers. He was a most wise Prince, and withal right valiant, amongst many most fit for the Government and Defense of that troublesome Kingdom, to hardly beset with the Infidels, if it had pleased God to have given him longer life.

Four days after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his Son, then a Youth about thirteen years of age, by the general consent of the Nobility chosen King, and by Almericus the Patriarch in the Temple with great Solemnity Crowned in the year, 1173, unto whom as not yet by reason of his tender age, fit himself to manage the weighty Affairs of the Kingdom, Raymond Count of Tripolis was by the whole consent of the Nobility appointed Tutor to supply what was wanting in the young King.

Noradin Sultan of Damascus (dead as is aforesaid) left behind him Melechala his Son, yet a Youth, to succeed him in his Kingdom. Whose Government the Nobility disliking, sent secretly Saladin Sultan of Egypt, unto whom at his coming they betrayed the City of Damascus, the Regal Seat of the Turks in Syria. Whereof Saladin did possess, and entering into Caloforia without Resistance, took Helipolis, Emiffa, with the great City of Cesarea; and in fine, all the whole Kingdom of Damascus, the City of Acrehala only excepted. But thus to suffer Melechala the young Prince to be wronged, and the Kingdom of Damascus to be joynted to the Kingdom of Egypt, was of the wiser sort thought not to stand with the safety of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherefore the Count of Tripolis, Governor of that Kingdom, made out certain Forces to have hindered his proceedings. At which time also, Cashed Prince of Partibia, and Melechala Uncle, sent certain Troops of Partibian Horse-men to have aided his distressed Nephew, who were by Saladin overthrown and almost all slain, near unto Aleppo where Melechala lay. As for the Count of Tripolis and the other Christian Princes, with whom Saladin in the newness of his Kingdom had no desire to fall out; he appeased them with fair Intreaty and Rewards; unto the Count he sent freely the Hostages, which yet lay for his Ransom at Emiffa; unto the other Princes he sent rich Presents; and thereupon he consented them all, that they returned without any thing doing against him. After which time, three or four years passed in great quietness, to the great strengthening of him in those new gotten Kingdoms. At length upon the coming over of Philip Earl of Flanders, the Christian Princes of Syria encouraged, consulted of an Expedition to be made into Egypt, whereof Saladin having Intelligence, drew down into that Country the greatest part of his strength. But Philip disliking of that Expedition, and the rather for that he saw no great cheerfulness in the Count of Tripolis and the rest therewith; they with some consent changed their Purpose for Egypt, and turning their Forces a quite contrary way, miserably and without resistance wasted the Country about Emiffa and Cesarea.

Whilst the Christians were thus busied in Caloforia, Saladin on the other side took occasion to send Bayez to invade the Kingdom of Jerusalem, of whose coming, King Baldwin having Intelligence, with such small Forces as he had left, halted hastened himself to Afcalon. In the mean time Saladin with a great Army was entered into the Holy Land, where burning the Country before him, and raging in the blood of the poor Christians, he came and encamped not far from Afcalon; and struck such a fear upon the whole Country, that they which dwelt in Jerusalem, were about to have forsaken the City, as far as the King himself, he lay close within the City of Afcalon, not daring to adventure upon so strong an Enemy. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of fear of his Enemies, dispersed his Army, some one way, some another, to forage the Country. Which the King perceiving, secretly came to the City, and with all his Power, as he might overtake the Sultan unawares; neither was he deceived in his expectation; for coming suddenly upon him, and secretly charging him, he had with him for a good space an hard and doubtful battle, until that the Victory by the Power of God, at length inclining to the Christians, Saladin with his Turks fled, overthrowing with a great slaughter, most part of his great Army being either there slain, or left afterward with hunger and cold. This Victory fell into the Christians the 25th day of November, in the year, 1177. nor without the Almighty Hand of God, the Turks having in his Army above six and twenty thousand Horsemen, and the King not past four hundred Horse, with some few Foot-men. After which Victory, Baldwin in great Triumph returned to Jerusalem, and there shortly after with great care and diligence repaired the decayed Walls of the City. Saladin in revenge of this Overthrow, made three Incursions into the Frontiers of the Christians, and did great harm, especially in the Country about Sidon. For the repelling whereof, the King put himself in Arms, and going against him, overthrew part of his Army, as they were carrying away a great Booty. Of which overthrow Saladin understanding, came in such haste with the rest of his Army, as if it had been a sudden Tempest, upon the Christians, then in great security dividing the Spoil; of whom they slew a great number, and put the rest to flight: In which so sudden a Confusion, Otto, grand Master of the Templars, and Hugh the Earl of Tripoli his son in law, were both taken Prisoners. The Earl himself with a few fled to Tyre; the King also at the same time was glad to shift for himself, and by flight to save himself as he might; after which Victory, Saladin besieged a strong Castle which the King but the year before had built upon the bank of the River Jordan, and given it to the Templars, with the Country round about; which Castle Saladin took by force, and put to sword all that were therein, except some few whom he carried away Prisoners. By this Victory Saladin became dreadful unto the Christians in Syria, which caused them, especially such as had any charge, with more vigilance to look about them. Yet shortly after, a Peace was for a time concluded betwixt the Sultan and the King; whereby their troubled Spirits breathed themselves almost the space of two years.

But this so welcome a Calm was by domestic troubles again by the Kings Friends suddenly troubled: for the Count of Tripoli, to whom the Government of the Kingdom was committed, coming towards Jerusalem, being by the suggestion of his Enemies brought into suspicion with the King, as if he had affected the Kingdom, was to his great disgrace by the way commanded to fly. The chief Authors of which discontentment, were the Kings Mother, a Woman of a turbulent nature, and her Brother the Kings Steward; who in the absence of the Earl, had wrought the Kings sick mind according to their own appetite. But the rest of the Nobility wisely foreseeing unto what great danger that discord might tend; in despite of them, with much labour, caused him to be sent for again, and so reconciled unto the King; by which means, that dangerous fire of dissention was for that time appeased, which afterwards brake out again, to the utter ruin of that Kingdom.

Saladin now weary of the League he had before made with King Baldwin, as no longer standing with his haughty Designs, renounced the same, and raising a great Power in Egypt, he directed towards Damascus. Of whose knowledge, King Baldwin having knowledge, with the whole Power of his Kingdom went to have met him, not far from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old Town called Petra. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the Kings Territory, came and encamped before Mount-Royal, a Castle which Baldwin had given unto the Templars, about three days march from the place where the King lay.

There Saladin with the Spoil of the Country refreshing his Army, now weary of long travel, fell forward again, and so without reluctance arrived with his Army at Damascus. At the same time the Turk Captains about Damascus, Bezzum, and Emilia perceiving the Frontiers of Saladin thereabout to be kept with small strength, passed over Jordan, and spoiling a great part of Galilee, besieged the Castle of Burie, at the foot of Mount Tabor, not far from the City of Naius; which Castle they in few days took, and having there made a great slaughter, carried away with them about five hundred Prisoners. Saladin being come to Damascus, called together all the Garrisons of that Kingdom, and joining them unto the Forces he brought out of Egypt, entered into the Holy Land; at which time the Count of Tripoli, Governor of the Kingdom, lay sick of a burning Fever. Nevertheless the King encouraged by the Knights of the Order, went out with his Army against him; and encountering with him near unto a Village called Froblet, overthrew him in a great battle; wherein, afterward in the flight, most part of the Sultans Army perished; Saladin himself being glad by speedy flight to escape the danger, and so by long marches to get him again to Damascus.

In revenge of this overthrow, Saladin having repaired his Army, and sent for his Fleet out of Egypt, came and besieged Beirut both by Sea and Land; at which time also his Brother, whom he had left Governor in Egypt, besieged Darum, a strong Town in the uttermost bounds of the Kingdom of Jerusalem towards Egypt; both whose Forces Baldwin being not able at once to repress, by the Council of his Nobility, thought it best first to relieve Beirut, as the place of greatest Importance. And for that purpose set forward with his Army by Land, having allowed up three and thirty Gallies at Tyre, for the Relief thereof by Sea. Of which preparation Saladin understanding, as also of the Kings coming (by Letters intercepted by his Scouts, directed to the besieged, for the holding out of the siege, with promise of speedy Relief) he presently rode with his Army, and departed; whereof the King being advertised, retired to Sepher.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, desirous above measure to extend the bounds of his Kingdom, and seeing the success of his Attempts against the King of Jerusalem not answerable to his desire, converted his Forces unto the Countries more Eastward; and passing passing the River Euphrates, and entering into Mesopotamia, partly by force, partly by corruption, got into his hands the Cities of Edessa, Carrai, and divers others. In which time the King of Jerusalem took occasion first to spoil the Country about Damascus, and after that divers other places of the Sultans Kingdom, making havoc of whatsoever came in his way, and so laded with the spoil of the Turks, retired to Jerusalem.

Saladin with Victory returning out of Mesopotamia, in revenge of the injuries done unto him in his absence, marched directly to Alleppe, the strongest City in that part of the Country of Syria, which above all other he longed after; where he had not long lie, but that it was by the treason of the Governor delivered into his hands, with all the Country thereabouts; wherewith the Christian Princes were so discouraged, that they even then began to fear greater matters to ensue. The Prince of Antioch sold Tamir the Metropolitain City of Cilicia, to Rapinus Prince of Armenia; for that he saw it was not without great charge and danger to be by him defended, being so far from him, and Saladin as it were now steep in betwixt him and it.

At the same time, King Baldwin at Nazareth fell sick of a Fever, the Leprosy also his old Disease growing daily more and more upon him; infomuch as despairing of his life, he called unto him Gay Luffigan Count of Joppa and Ascalon, unto whom he had before espoused Sybil his eldest Sister, and in the presence of his Mother, the Patriarch, and all the chief Commanders of the Squadrons of the Sacred War, appointed him the Governor of the Kingdom, referring unto himself only the Title of a King, with the City of Jerusalem, and a yearly Pension of ten thousand Ducats; all which was done to the great disgrace and discontentment of the Count of Tripoli the old Governor.

It was not long, but that Saladin having breathed himself a little, after so great Labours came again into the Holy Land, where he took many Castles, and did infinite harm; infomuch that the Country people were glad for fear to forsake their Houses, and to fly into Cities. The Christian Army in the mean time lying fast by at Sepher, not once moving, although many a fair occasion were offered for the chief Commanders affectionated unto the Count of Tripoli, and envying the Preference of Gay the new Governor, were unwilling to fight, but finding one excuse or other, suffered the Enemy at his pleasure to spoil the Country, and so in safety to depart, which he had never before done in those Quarters.

Within less than a month after, Saladin with a great Army well appointed with all the Habilliments of War needful for the besieging of a City or strong Castle, came again into the Land of Palestine, and passing through the Country beyond Jordan, fate down, as last before Petra, in hope by the taking thereof to have made his passage between Egypt and Damascus more safe. Of which his purpose King Baldwin having knowledge, and taught by the evil success of late, to what small purpose it was to commit the managing of his Wars unto a General so evil beloved, and less regarded, as was Gay his Brother in law; he sent against him with his Army, Raymond the Count of Tripoli, the old Governor, whom he had again restored unto the Government, and displaced Gay. Of whose coming Saladin hearing, raised his Siege after he had lien there a month, and so departed.

A little before this Expedition, the King still growing sicker and sicker, his soul Disease still increasing, by the common consent of the Nobility, appointed Baldwin his Nephew by his Sister Sybil, a Child but of five years old, to succeed him in the Kingdom; and the Count of Tripoli to have the Government of the State during the time of his Minority. This Sybil the Kings Sister was first married to William the younger, Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, who dying within three months after, left her with child with this his Posthumous Son Baldwin, now by his Uncle deputed unto the hope of the Kingdom. After whose death she was married to Gay Luffigan Count of Joppa and Ascalon, the last husband of which, who taking in evil part this the Kings designment, especially for the Government of the Kingdom by the Count of Tripoli, departed from the Court as a man discontented, unto his City of Afcalon; whereof the Patriarch and the Princes of the Sacred War, fearing (and that not without cause) great danger to ensue, came to the King, then holding a Parliament in the City of Asen, most humbly requesting him for avoiding of further danger, and the safety of his Kingdom, to receive again into his Favour the Count Gay his Brother in law, and to make an atonement betwixt him and the Count of Tripoli. But this their request forced to no purpose, so that the Parliament was dissolved without any success, and the good of the Common-wealth in that point concluded.

After that time the Kingdom of Jerusalem began still more and more to decline. In the old King Baldwin (sick both in body and mind) was almost no hope; in the young King (yet so unfit for great a burthen) much less; and the dissension betwixt the two Counts Gay and Tripoli among their Favorites, was like enough to bring great harm unto the State. Besides that, the Count of Tripoli fearing the Power of Gay his Enemy, was thought to have secret Intelligence with Saladin the Turk, infomuch as the King was almost in purpose to have proclaimed him Traytor. Wherein the King now relied only upon the Council of William Archbishop of Tyre, and the Masters of the Knights of the Sacred War; by whose advice he sent Heraclius Patriarch of Jerusalem, Roger Molins Master of the Knights of St. Johns, and Arnold Master of the Templars, Embassadors unto Lucius the Third, then Pope, unto Frederick the Emperor, Philip the French King, and Henry the Second, King of England, to declare unto them the dangerous State of that Christian Kingdom, and to crave their Aid against the Infidels. These Embassadors coming to the Council then holden at Venice, with great gravity and diligence, in the presence of the Pope and of the Emperor, declared the hard estate of the Christians of the East, with their humble Request unto them for Aid; in such sort that they moved them, with all the Princes there present, to Compassion. From thence they were by the Pope directed unto Philip the French King, with whom having dispatched their Affairs, they returned, first into England, and afterward into Germany; and had at length brought their Negotiation to good pass, that in every place great preparation was made for a great Expedition to be made against the Turks, for the Relief of the Christians in the East; with which good News the Embassadors returning to Jerusalem, filled the sick King with the hope of great matters. But greater Quarrels shortly after arising betwixt the Pope and the Emperor, and sharp War likewise betwixt the French King and the King of England, and the other Christian Princes also being at no better quiet, the notable Expedition that had with the expectation thereof to filled the

from the distressed Christians, and the effectual perfections of Clement the Third, then Pope; promised, and all, or most part indeed, made great preparations; which they afterwards, though not all at once (as letted by other occasions) but at divers times employed, for the most part with the danger of their own Persons, against the Turks, for the relief of the poor oppressed Christians, and recovery of the Holy Land; but with what success shall hereafter (God willing) be declared.

Of which for great preparations made against him, Saladin not ignorant, for at liberty Guy the King of Jerusalem, who contrary to his promise made at Affaila, he had now detained a year in Prison; yet before his inlargement exacting of him an Oath, Never by force of Arms afterwards to seek to recover his Kingdom, or to revenge the wrongs he had sustained; hoping thereby to stay the coming of the other Princes in his quarrel. Which Oath for all that, the Pope defended withall, at extorted by constraint from him, at such time as Saladin had longer detained him in Prison, than of right he should.

Guy now at liberty, and yet in mind a King, came to Tyre, but could not be there received, the Citizens having before sworn their Obedience unto Conrade Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, by whom they had been notably defended against the Fury of Saladin. Wherefore departing thence with such power as he had, and the distressed Christians daily repairing unto him out of all parts of Syria, he came and besieged Ptolemais; where he had not long lien, but first came unto him the Venetian Fleet, with them also a Fleet of fifty Sail, who all joined their Forces together for the winning of the City. But whilst the Christians thus lay at the Siege of Ptolemais, came Saladin with a great Army to the relief of the besieged; where betwixt him and the Christians was fought a great Battle, wherein the Christians at the first had the better; but afterward fainting, and ready to flee, had there undoubtedly received a notable overthrow, had not Giffrey Lysignan the Kings Brother (left for the guarding of the Camp) in good time come in with new Supplies; and not only raised their Flight, but also repressed the further pursuit of the fierce Enemy, now almost in possession of the desired Victory. Nevertheless there were 2000 Christians there slain, and among them Gerard Master of the Templars. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiving how hard a matter it would be for him by Land to relieve his City, sent for the Fleet which he had formerly rigged up at Alexandria, and by force put new supplies both of Men and Victuals into the besieged City. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often sallies upon the Christians; and in despite of the Christian Religion, whipped the Image of Christ crucified, which they had for that purpose in the figure of a cross set up on the top of the Wall. With the same Fleet also he fooured the Seas, that no Victuals or new Supplies of Men could that way without great danger be brought unto the Camp; whereby such Scarcity and Want of all things being thrust shortly after to arise among the Christians, that some of them not able longer to endure the Famine, fled unto the Turks Camp, then lying not far off, crying out for Bread. Of which distress in the Camp of the Christians, Saladin knowing right well, both by such Fugitives as daily came over unto him, and by his own Epistols, yet made shew as if he understood nothing thereof; but suddenly rising with his Army (as doubtfull of his own Strength) departed, leaving his Camp full of all manner of Victuals. Whereof the Christians understanding, and supposing him to have for fear been gone indeed, in great numbers halted unto the forsaken Camp, as unto a most desired Prey: where whilst they were gorging themselves, Saladin suddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great Slaughter. Nevertheless the Christians having now lien before the City six months, continued the Siege all the Winter, overcoming with patience the hardest difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Christian Princes, whose coming they expected with the first of the next Spring; during which time many hot skirmishes passed betwixt them and the Turks both by Sea and Land.

Whilst the Christians thus lay at the Siege of Ptolemais, Frederick the Emperor, with divers of the great German Princes and others, before resolved upon an expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land, and the relief of the distressed Christians in Syria; having now raised a great Army, furnished with all things necessary for so long a journey, set forward from Ratisbon, and so coming to Vienna, and passing through Hungaria, Bulgaria, and Thracia, arrived at length at Constantinople; where he by Iaac Angelus the Emperor that then reigned, honourably entertained; but indeed more for Fear and Fashion sake, than for any Love or good Will; for that he after the suspicious manner of the Greeks, having in distrust to great a power of the Latine Emperors, withheld rather for his absence than his presence. And therefore ceased not in what he might, to hasten his passage over into Asia, pretending for colour thereof, the necessity the Christians had of his present aid. So the Emperor with his Army passing over, the Straight, and without resistance marching through the greatest part of the lesser Asia, entered into Lycania, where meeting with a great power of the Turks, that were come from the Sultan of Moravia to stay his further passage, he overthrew them in a great Battle, and so marching directly on to Icomium, took it by force, and gave the Spoil thereof unto his Soldiers, in revenge of the injuries before done unto his Uncle the Emperor Conrade, by the Sultan of that City. Departing thence, and marching through Cilicia, he in another Battle overthrowing the Turks, that having taken the Straights of the Mountains, had thought, to have raised his further passage into Syria. After that he took the City Philomela, which the Sultan had strongly fortified, which he raised to the ground, and put to the Sword all the People therein, for that they contrary to the Law of Nations, had slain such Messengers as he had sent unto them for the summoning of the City. In like manner he entered into the lesser Armenia, where he took the City Melietene, and subdued all the Country thereabouts; unto the relief whereof the Turks coming, with a most huge Army, were by him with an exceeding great Slaughter overthrowing and put to Flight. After that, entering into Comagena, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his Son, with a great Army of the Turks, he overthrew him in the plain Field, and discomfited his whole Army; but whilst he too eagerly pursued the Enemy he had then in chase, his Horse foundering under him as he passed the River Saleph, he was so overthrowing, and his Foot hanging fast in his Stirrup, drawn through the deep River, and almost drowned; and at the farther side of the River was so plunged by his Horse, at his landing, that he was taken up for dead; yet breathing a little, and casting his Eyes up to Heaven, with much ado he uttered these few words, Lord receive my Soul; and so in the Hands

Hands of them that took him up gave up the ghost, unto the great grief and hindrance of the Christian Common-wealth; for Saladin hearing of his approach, was so afraid of him, as that he began to doubt, not how to keep that he had before won in Syria, but how to defend himself in Egypt. Thus miserably perished this worthy Emperor, the tenth of June, in the year of Grace, 1190, being then of the age of seventy years, whereof he had with much trouble reigned eight and thirty. His dead Body was carried along with the Army, and afterward with all funeral Pomp buried in the Cathedral Church at Tyre. Frederick the Emperor thus dead, Frederick his Son Duke of Saxony, by the general consent of the Princes in the Army chosen General in his stead; upon whom, with the rest of the Army, yet mourning for the death of the Emperor, the Turks gave a sudden and fierce Charge, in hope so to have overthrowing them; but finding greater resistance than they had before supposed, and having lost some of their men, they with like speed that they came, retired again. Now began Famine (one of the ordinary Attendants of great Armies) to increase in the Camp; for why, the Turks for that purpose had before destroyed or carried away all that was in the Country, nothing remaining for the Christians more than the bare ground. Wherefore the Christians, weary out of the way, came to Antich, which was easily delivered unto him, and his hungry Soldiers well refreshed by the Citizens, being as yet for the most part Christians. But he had not there stayed past fifteen days for the refreshing of his Army, but the Plague (the Hand-Maid of Famine), and another Scourge of the great multitude) began to rage among his Soldiers, in such sort, that he was glad with his Army to forsake the City, and to get him abroad again into the open field, where forthwith News was brought unto him, that Dodecan General of such Forces as Saladin had sent for out of Egypt (which were not small) was by great Journeys coming towards him; against whom he in good order set forward, with his Fathers Corps still carried in the midst of his Army. These two Armies meeting together, and both willing to fight, joined a great and doubtful battle, fortune now inclining to the one side, and by and by to the other; the Christians exceeding their Enemies in valour, and they them again in number. At length the Christians in the Vanguard began to retire, and they that seconded them were also hardly charged; when Frederick mindful of his Fathers valour, with a Troop of valiant Horsemen brake into the Enemies battle with such force, that the Turks were glad to give ground; after whom Leopold Duke of Austria coming presently on with his Footmen, brought such a fear upon the whole Army of the Turks, that they brook themselves to speedy flight. In this battle were slain divers of the Enemies slain, with very small loss of the Christians; and about one thousand more taken Prisoners, with fifteen of their Ensigns. After which Victory, Frederick marching further in Calo-Syria, pacified Laodicea then in mutiny, and in like a way had delivered unto the Turks. He also with a little labour took Berytus, where divers other Cities of Syria, which before belonging unto the Turks. So afterward coming to Tyre, he there solemnly buried his Father, (dead, as is before said;) and from thence certified Guy the King (still lying with the other Christian Princes at the Siege of Ptolemais) of his coming; who forthwith sent the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, with part of the Fleet, to transport him with his people that were left, by Sea; for that by Land he could not so safely have come, being now but weak; for meeting with Saladin; who with a great Army lay still hovering about his besieged City, intensive to all opportunity. So was Duke Frederick, with his Soldiers yet left, safely by Sea conducted from Tyre to the Camp at Ptolemais, and there joyfully received by the King and the other Princes, with the general Applause of the whole Camp.

In the mean time the Turks falling out of the City of Ptolemais, had done great harm among the Christians, by whom they were not without some loss again repelled. But after the coming of Duke of Frederick and his Germans, it was thought good by the general consent of all the great Commanders in the Army, that the City should be assaulted round; and to that purpose was every man Regiment appointed what place to assail. The King himself with the Templars and the Italians from Pifa, undertook that part of the City which was toward the Sea; unto Duke Frederick and his Germans, was allotted all betwixt the Bridge over the River Belus, and the Bishops Palace; the Venians, Genuoyes, and Knights Hospitallers, were appointed upon the rest of the Wall as far as the Court of Raymond; the Friarslanders, Flemings, and Hollanders, took up all the rest of the Wall unto the Sea-side. Thus was the City on every side assailed by the Christians, with such fury, as if they had thereon purposed to engage their whole Forces; seeking by a thousand Wounds, and a thousand kinds of death to have by their scaling-Ladders gained the top of the Walls; the Turks with no less courage still beating them down again. But in the heat of this so dreadful and desperate an Assault, Saladin still hovering aloft, came now upon the sudden and assailed the Camp of the Christians, filling the same with fear and tumult; whole charge they that were left for the defence of the same, at the first notably received, but finding themselves too weak, began to give ground; by which means the Turks took certain Tents with some Ensigns, and fired some other of the Pavilions of the Christians, having slain somewhat more than an hundred of the Defendants.

The Christians in the mean time little prevailing in the Assault, and troubled with the danger of their Camp, retired to the Relief thereof. But the Turk perceiving himself too weak for the whole Power of the Christians, retired also; yet not with such half, but that he had there almost lost himself. This notable Assault was given the fourteenth of October; after which, many light skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks; more for booty than for any other great purpose.

In the mean time, divers great Princes of the West that had vowed themselves unto this Sacred War, came thither, whose number rather increased the want of Victuals, than furthered the Service. At which time also the discord betwixt Guy the King (whose Wife and Children were now dead) and Conrade Marquis of Mont-Ferrat (who had married the late Queens Sister, by whom he pretended a Claim unto the Title of the imaginary Kingdom) did much harm unto the proceedings of the Christians; by pleasing a thing their haughty Princes by the lofty minds of the ambitious. Shortly after the Christians yet lying at the Siege, the Contagion and Famine still increasing, it fortified that Duke Frederick fell sick of the Plague, whereof he died; and with the great mourning of the whole Army,

Army, was afterward solemnly buried fast by his Father in the Cathedral of Constantinople, upon whose death the Christians attempted no great matter against the City, although they were oftentimes by the Turks provoked, but lay still strongly entrenched, expecting more greater Aid from the Princes of the West.

Now all the hope of the Christian Affairs in Syria, and the Kingdom of Cilicia, rested upon the coming of the two mighty Princes, Philip the Second of that name, King of France, and Richard the Fifth King of England; who having agreed betwixt themselves, with their combined Forces to relieve the distressed Christians of the East; and again (if it were possible) to repair the broken State of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, were now met together at Marple in Provence. From whence the French King first departing with his Fleet for Cilicia, and with a prosperous gale for certain days holding on his course, and now come night unto the Island, was by force of a furious tempest suddenly arising, to be tossed and tumbled in the deep, that many of his Ships there perished, eaten up of the Sea; others by force of Weather driven upon the Sands and Rocks, were there broken all to pieces; and the rest, some with their Masts broken, some with their Tacklings and Sails rent, and all in general Force Weather-beaten, with much ado arrived at Messina, the destined Port. At which place King Richard afterwards (but with better fortune) arrived with his Fleet also. Both the Kings now met together, relieved those to winter; the French King enforced by necessity to do so, for the repairing of the late Losses he had received, as well in his People and Provision, as in his Shipping, all which was to be relieved by new Supplies out of France; and the King of England staying to take Order for the Dowry of his Sister Joan (Widow of William the late King of Cilicia) with Tancred the base Son of Roger, that had now aspired unto the Kingdom of that Island. About which matter great Strife arose betwixt King Richard the Queens Brother, and Tancred the new King, inasmuch that it was like to have broken out into open War, had it not to the good contentment of King Richard been otherwise taken up, and so the Controversie ended. But whilst these great Kings thus remained in this Island, and oftentimes with good Friends met together, sometime for their disport, and sometime to confer of their private Affairs; the way (as was thought) to have appeased all former displeasure, and to have increased love; it fell out clean contrary, jealousy and distrust, not only reviving the old, but also still raising new Quarrels betwixt them, to the great hindrance of the common good by them intended; which may serve for a warning to all great Princes, willing to continue in Amity, and to hold a good Opinion one of another, never to see one the other; or coming to an interview, not to converse or stay long together; which as it was often done without the danger of their persons, so can it not possibly be long continued, but that it will engender in themselves as well as in their Followers, Jealousie, envy, hatred, and mistrust, as we have before said and hereafter in the course of this History may appear.

There was an old Contest betwixt these two great Kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French Kings Sister; whom Richard having before (his Father yet living) affianced, had now rejected, as her whom his aged Father Henry the Second had too familiarly used; and in stead of her, to the great disgrace of the French, espoused the Lady Berengaria, Daughter to the King of Navarre; which Indignity was more added, when arising betwixt the French and the English, as then with great heart-burning mouldred up in respect of the common Cause then in Hand, afterwards broke out again, to the shameful overthrow of this most honourable Expedition, and lamentable disturbance of both Realms.

Winter past, and the Spring now come, the French King not altogether the best pleased, first looked from Messina, and with his Fleet in safety arrived at Prolemais, where he was by the Christians, now the third year lying at the Siege, so joyfully received, as if he had been there sent with Succours from Heaven. After whom, shortly after followed also King Richard, with his whole Fleet (by force of Weather fore beaten and dispersed) two Ships by the rage of the Tempest driven aground upon the coast of Cyprus, were by the Island people spoiled, and the Men that in them had hardly escaped the danger of the Sea, with most barbarous Inhumanity, some slain and some taken Prisoners; the rest of the Fleet arriving there also, were with like Incivility forbidden to land; the Cypriots ready at hand in all places to keep them off. With which to great an Indignity the King justly moved, and by force landing his people, with incredible Celery and Success over-ran the whole Island, and some taken Prisoners; the rest of the Fleet thereof, and taken Isaac Commene, commonly called The King of that Island, and of some (for what reason I know not) Emperor of the Greeks, Prisoner; yet was he indeed neither King nor Emperor, but being a man of great Nobility and Power, and of the honorable Stock of the Comnenians had in the troublesome Reign of Andronicus Commene the Emperor, his Cousin, laid hold upon that fruitful Island, and there tyrannized as a reputed King; until that now he was by King Richard taken Prisoner, and for his unfaithful dealing sent fast bound in Chains of Silver into Syria. The King thus possessed of the whole Island, there at Limonas married the Lady Berengaria the King of Navarre Daughter, brought thither by Joan late Queen of Cilicia, the Kings Sister. And so disposing as he thought best of all things for the safe keeping of the Island, set forward again with his Fleet towards Syria. Where by the way he light upon a great Ship of the Sultans, laden with Victuals and other War-like Provisions for the relief of the besieged; all which became a Prey unto him. So holding on his course, he at length arrived at Prolemais, where he was by the French King, and the rest of the Christians there lying, most honourably received.

Now had the City of Prolemais been three years besieged by the Christians, and notably defended by the Turks; during which time many an hot Assault and bloody Skirmish had passed betwixt them. And now the eyes of all men were fixed upon the two Kings of England and France, unto whom all the rest offered their Obedience and Service. The Christian Camp was great, composed especially of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almain; not them that were left of the Emperor Frederick his Army (for they were for the most part dead, or else returned home again into their Countries) but of such as moved with the Zeal they bare unto this Religious War, came daily in great numbers thither; as did also many others of divers Nations, desirous in some measure to be partakers of so honourable a War.

hour undermined one of the greatest Towers of the City, called the accursed Tower, with some part of the Wall also, by means whereof they were in hope to find a way into the City. Wherefore all things being now in a readiness for the firing of the Mine, it was thought good by general consent, that an assault should also at the same time be given unto the City; and to every Regiment was by lot appointed which part of the Wall to assail, which they all with great courage undertook. In the heat of which Assault, the aforeaid undermined Tower, with some part of the Wall (the Timber whereon it stood, now burnt) fell down with a great fall, laying open a fair breach for the Christians to enter; whereupon the Turks dismayed, forthwith craved to come to parley, which granted, they for safeguard of their lives yielded forthwith to give up the City, and to restore to the Christians the Holy Cross, with two thousand Captives, and two hundred Horsemen, which as they should require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; besides two thousand Constantinopolitan Dukes, to be by him given to the two Kings, for the cost by them bestowed in the Siege. For payment whereof the Turks in the City were to remain as hostages under the safe keeping of the Christians, so that if all the Covenants aforeaid were not within forty days performed by Saladin, they should all for their lives be at the Kings mercy. So was this strong City, after it had been almost three years besieged, delivered up unto the Christians the 12 of July, in the year 1191. The first that entered were the Germans of Asiria, who as if they had been the only men by whose Valour the City had been won, at the first and almost presumptuously advanced their Ensigns upon the top of the Walls, to the great Offence of all the rest of the Christian Princes, but especially of King Richard, who (not unworthily for his Princely Courage was commonly called Richard Coeur de Lion) not brooking for proud an indignity, caused the Ensigns of Leopold his Duke to be pulled down, and foisted under foot; which shortly after gave him occasion of Repentance, as shall hereafter be seen.

The two Kings possessed of the City, divided the same, with all the People and Spoil thereof betwixt them, without regard of the rest of the other noble Christians, that had sustained the whole travel of that long Siege; for which cause most part of them, seeing themselves so deluded, withdrew themselves from them, and with one consent fell them word, That they would forsake them, except they were made partakers of the gains, as they had been of the pains. Which the two Kings to content them, promised they should; however, they delayed so long their promises, that many worthy men, constrained by Poverty, departed discontented from them into their Countries.

But long it was not, that this one City, so lately gained, could contain these two great Kings; whom two large Kingdoms could not retain in peace. For albeit that they were in body together present, and in one, and that a most honourable action, combined, yet were they in hearts far asunder, and their secret designs much different; envy and distrust still reviving undelivered past, and mislending new matter of greater contentments. King Richard, according to his noble nature, was of nothing more desirous, than to have the War continued until they had made a full Conquest of Syria and the Land of Palästina; and for that end requested the French King to bind himself together with him by a solemn Oath, there to stay yet three years, for the regaining of those Countries. But he in mind long more strange from King Richard, and in his deep conceit plotting matters nearer home better fitting his purpose, would by no means be persuaded to do so, but still found one occasion or other for to colour his departure. And shortly after (as the French Chroniclers report) falling extremely sick, he requested King Richard and the other Christian Princes to come unto him, unto whom being come, he in few words declared his purpose of return, as followeth:

I cannot, my Lords, longer endure the inclemency and intemperance of the Air in this extreme hot season. If my death might profit the Christian Religion, or any one of you, or the Christian Commonwealth, there should be no difference whatsoever, that could separate me from you, or withdraw me from hence. But more may the life of one absent, serve and profit you, than the death of him present. I must of necessity depart, yet as my departure I will leave you five hundred men at arms, and ten thousand Footmen, the Flower and Chace of all the Forces of France, under the conduct of my Cousin Odo, Duke of Burgundy, unto whom I will give Pay and Entertainment, with a continual supply of all things for their necessity.

This excuse of the French Kings, King Richard could not take in good part; but said, That it was apparent to all men, that he abandoned the Wars in Syria, to return into France, for no other end or purpose, but the more easily to invade the Provinces of Gaul and Normandy, now distressed of their Garrison, and so subject to his malice. Which point he so urged, that the French King could have no leave with his Honour to depart, until such time as he had by solemn Oath bound himself unto King Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force or fraud against him, or any thing of his, until fifty days were expired after King Richard his return home; which how well it was by the French King observed, I leave it to the report of the Histories of that time. And so the French King, not to be intreated longer to stay, leaving behind him the aforeaid number of men he had promised, embarking the rest of his Army, and accompanied with three tall Ships of the Gons, waxes his Friends, and Raffin Viceroy his Admiral, departed from Prolemais to Tyre, the first of August, and two days after, looting thence, sailed along the Sea-coast of Asia, and cutting through the Mediterranean, arrived at length in the mouth of the River of Tiber, and from thence went to Rome; where after he had visited Pope Celestine, and the famous places of that most Renowned City, he returned again to his Fleet, and so by Sea arrived in safety in France; having in that great expedition, so honourably by him entertained, performed nothing answerable to that the World looked for.

After the French King, followed Leopold Duke of Asiria, with his Germans; and not long after him the Venetians also, with them of Pisa and Genua. Of whose departure Saladin understanding, and that the Christian Forces were thereby much enquired, refused either to pay Money, or to restore the Prisoners, as was promised at the giving up of Prolemais; threatening moreover to chop off the Heads of all such Christian Captives as he had in his power, if the King should show any extremity unto the pledges in the City. Nevertheless, shortly after he sent his Embassadors with great Presents unto the King, requesting a longer time for the sparing of his pledges, which which his request, together with his Gifts, the King refused to grant or accept. Whereupon the Saladin forthwith caused five Christian Captives as were in his power, to be beheaded; which albeit King Richard understood, yet would he not prevent the time before agreed upon for the execution of his Prisoners, being the twentieth day of August; upon which day he caused the Turks Prisoners, to be hanged by the neck (or at the French and Germans write, to the number of 7000) in the sight of Saladin's Army to be executed.

The loss of the strong Town of Ptolemais, much impaired the reputation of Saladin, even among his own People; as it commonly falleth out, that the evil success of a great Commander in his affairs, altereth the good Will, Affection, and Opinion, especially of the Vulgar Sort, which judge of all things by the Event. And albeit that his losses were great, and such as much daunted him; yet he thought it best as the case then stood, to make them greater, and with his own hands (as it were) to rattle and overthrow such Towns and Cities as he saw he could not keep, rather than to suffer them whole and undivided to fall into the Enemies Hand. So carried headlong with despair, he caused all the Towns he had along the Sea coast in Syria and Palestine, to be sacked and razed, and the Walls overthrowen; such cities were of most importance, and like to stand the Christians in stead, namely, Perpatria, Cesarea, Joppa, Affalon, Gaza, and Elam, with divers other Castles and Citadels in the Countries thereabouts; most part whereof were again by King Richard and the Templars fortified and repaired, although Saladin in the mean time did what he might to have lured the same.

Nothing more hindered the good proceeding of the Christian Princes, in this and other their most honourable expeditions against the Infidels, than the discord among themselves; one still envying at another's Honour, and every one jealous of his own. Great strife and heartburning there had been between the two Kings of France and England, during the time they were together in this sacred Expedition, to the great hindrance of the same. No less contention had there been betwixt King the late King of Turkey, and Conradus Marquis of Mantua, about the Title of that lost Kingdom; whereby the whole power of the Christians in Syria was divided into two Factions. Richard King of England, Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Henry Earl of Champaign, the Knights Hospitallars of St. John, the Venetians and Pisans, taking part with Guy; And Philip the French King, the Duke of Burgundy, Rudolph Earl of Claremont, the Templars, the Genovays, the Landgrave of Thuring, Leopold Duke of Austria, and Robert Count of Nassau, taking part with Conradus the Marquis. But Conradus shortly after the taking of Ptolemais being slain, by some of the King's party with Guy, or (as some others say) by two desperate Rustians, (slain thereby by the Prince of Torone, in revenge of the despiteful done unto him by the said Marquis, by taking from him Isabel his Disposed Wife) as he was walking in his City of Tyre, and doubting no such Treason, King Richard being now at an occasion offered for the utter extinguishing of that claim, and how to entitle himself unto that Kingdom; perfwaded the aforesaid Isabel (the Widow of the late Marquis, and in whose right he had laid claim unto the Kingdom) to relinquish that to tranquillize a Title, and to take to her Husband Henry Earl of Champaign, his Nephew, unto whom he gave the City Tyre. Guy the King exclaiming to the contrary, as of a wrong done unto himself. Shortly after he began also to tamper with Guy, perfwading him to resign unto him that little right and interest he had in the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and in lieu thereof to receive at his Hands the Kingdom of Cyprus; which his offer the poor King was glad to accept. By which exchange Guy became King of Cyprus, and Richard King of Jerusalem; which honourable Title he afterwards (as some report) used in his Title, as did some others his Successors the Kings of England after him. So Guy with all his Wealth passing over into Cyprus, took possession of the Kingdom, where he long lived nor. Nevertheless that pleasant Kingdom continued in his Family of the Lusignys, by the space of about 283 years afterwards; untill that at length that Family failing in the Posthumus Son of James the Bastard, last King of that Island, it fell into the Hands of the Venetians, by whom it was holden as a part of their Seignory almost an hundred years, until that it was in his fresh remembrance again from them taken by Selymus the Second, great Emperor of the Turks, in the year 1571. as in the process of this History shall in due place (God willing) be declared.

Now was King Richard, for the increase of his honour, and desire, that before of the City of Jerusalem, as the most precious and honourable prize of all that religious War. And thereupon with all the power of the Christians then at his command, set forward from Ptolemais; and was come on his way as far as Asfus, a Town situated betwixt Asfus and Typpa. In the Vauward was King Richard himself, with the Englishmen; after whom followed Odo, Duke of Burgundy, with his French, and in the Rearward Jaques de Avennes, with the Flemings, Brabanters, and Wallons, who after the death of their Count Philip at the Siege of Ptolemais, had put themselves all under his Regiment. Saladin with a great Army still at hand, and as it were tending upon them, first with certain Embuscadoes charged the Rearward, and so afterwards came on with his whole power; upon whom Jaques turning himself with his Flemings, received the charge with great assurance, and so long themselves endured the same, until the French came in to their succors, and after them the English also. There was fought a notable Battle, and great Valour shewed both on the one side and on the other, but especially by them of the Turks part, who knew well the purpose of the Christians for the besieging of Jerusalem, and that thereupon depended their only hope, and that he that could hold the same, might almost assure himself to carry away the glory of that War. The French and the English in that latter honourably strove who might shew the greatest Valour; neither would the low Countreymen underlings for the Generals sake, be any less bold than them. This sharp conflict began about Noon, and continued until the going down of the Sun. King Richard (as some write) was there wounded with an Arrow; and Jaques valiantly there fighting was slain, having lost his life dear, to the great admiration of the Infidels, and dying left the Victory unto the Christians, and that there in this Battle was slain more Turks and Sarafins, than in any one Battle within the memory of man before; of the Christians were not lost any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforesaid Jaques, the valiant General of the Flemings.

The next day the Christians removed to Beitlhem, a Town

a Town about the mid way betwixt Joppa and Jerusalem. But Winter now coming King Richard, was of Victuals like enough to increase, at the King changing his mind for the Siege, returned with the greatest part of the Army to Affalon, which he that Winter new fortified, the Walls thereof being before by Saladin in his despair demolished; the Duke of Burgundy, with his Frenchmen, was while quiet at wintering in Tyre. In this mean time the power of the Christians was thus greatly diminished, some one way departing from the Camp, and some another. The Italians for the most part, with them of Pisa (who in these three years Wars had striven with the Venetians for the Honour of their Service) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themselves also. Nevertheless, Winter now past, and the Spring time come, King Richard took the Field again, and came to Beitlhem; where by the way he met with an exceeding great number of Camels, charged with great store of Victuals and Munition, sent by Saladin out of Egypt to Jerusalem, all which he took; but purposing to have gone on to the Siege of Jerusalem, he was by the backwardness of the French glad to change his purpose, and to return to Ptolemais; for the Frenchmen, perfwaded by the Duke their General (who well knew the French Kings mind) that any thing worth remembrance was done, it was not to be done by them, and that the glory thereof should wholly redound unto the King of England, as there in person present, and to his Englishmen; shewed themselves to unwilling to the Siege, as that there in was nothing done, to the great grief of that worthy Prince. At which time all news was brought unto King Richard, how that Philip the French King (forgetful of his solemn promise made before his departure out of Syria) had now invaded the Country of Normandy, and excited Earl John (the Kings Brother, a man of an haughty and aspiring nature) to take upon him the Kingdom of England in his absence; as had before in like case William the younger Brother, served Duke Robert his eldest Brother, then absent at his Father the Conquerors death, in the first sacred expedition unto Godfrey of Bulain. Wherefore King Richard beside the present difficulties, fearing lest while he was so far off in Wars for defence of the Christian Commonwealth, he might lose his Kingdom at home; thought it best to grow to some good end with Saladin, and so to make his return; but the politick and wary Sultan, nor ignorant of the discord of the Christians, and that their Forces daily decayed in Syria; either of the troubled Estate of the Kings affairs at home in his Kingdom, or of his desire to return; would not hearken to any other conditions of Peace, but such as might both for the present, weaken the Forces of the Christians in Syria, and discourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward, when they should see that the negotiation but to suffer them in Peace to live, which they must of necessity restore again. The conditions he offered, were, That the Christians should forthwith restore whatsoever they had won in those three years Wars, Ptolemais only excepted; and from thenceforth for the space of five years, the Turks should not in any thing molest the Christians, but to suffer them in Peace to live by them; which hard conditions (for that no better could be had) the King was glad to accept, and so concluded a Peace. Whereby the labour and travel of the two great Kings and so many Nations with them, were all become frustrate and vain; having now to no purpose lost their Men, their Money, their Time, their Hope, their Blood, their long Travel, to gain that they must now in an hour forego; nothing more left unto the poor Christians in Syria, than the Cities of Antioch, Tyre and Ptolemais.

This done, King Richard leaving the affairs of Asia unto the charge of Henry Count of Champagne his Nephew, shipping the greatest part of his People, with his Wife Berengaria, first for Cicilia, and from thence for England, where they in safety at length arrived; followed shortly after with some few himself; where by the way, by extremity of Weather he was in the Adriaticque driven to land upon the Coast of Illyria; where travelling with a small retinue homewards in the Habit of a Templar, he was discovered and taken Prisoner by Leopold Duke of Austria, whom he had before disgraced at the winning of Ptolemais, as is before declared: who now glad to have him in his power, made prize of him, and fold him to Henry the Emperor, for forty thousand pounds; by whom he was kept Prisoner by the space of a year and three months, and then ransomed for the Sum of an hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greatest terror of the Christians; who mindfull of mans fragility, and the vanity of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his death no Solemnity to be used at his burial, but only his Shirt in manner of a winding sheet, made fast to the point of a Lance, to be carried before his dead body as an Ensign, a plain Priest going before, and crying aloud to the People in this sort; Saladin Conqueror of the East, of all the greatest riches he had in his life, carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his Shirt. A light worthy to great a King, and that nothing to his eternal commendation, more than the true knowledge of his Salvation in Christ Jesus. He reigned about sixteen years with great honour, and dying left nine Sons, which were all murdered by Sepradin their Uncle, excepting one called also Sepradin Sultan of Alippo; who by the Favour and Support of his Fathers good Friends, saved himself from the treacherous practices of his Uncle. Of this Sepradin the Uncle, defended Meladin Sultan of Egypt, and Coradin Sultan of Damasco and Jerusalem, Saladin his great Kingdom being by them now again rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in short time bruited abroad, with the discord among the Turks and Sarafins about his Dominions, put Celsinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the City of Jerusalem might in that change and hurly be easily again recovered, and that Kingdom established. But when he had in vain dealt to that purpose with the Kings of France and England, (then altogether buried in their Wars one against the other) he perfwaded Henry the Sixth, then Emperor, to take the matter in hand; who (for that he well could not, or else would not himself in person undertake that long expedition) sent Henry Duke of Saxony his Lieutenant, with a great Army into Asia, under whom were journey two Legats, Conradus Archbishop of Magnus, another of the Electors, and Conradus the Bishop of Herbipolis. At which time also many other great Princes took upon them that holy War; namely Robine Landgrave of Thuring, Henry Palatine of Rhine, Henry Duke of Brabant, Conradus Marquis of Moravia, Frederick Duke of Austria, and Albertus Habsburgensis, with some others; unto whom also joynted themselves the Bishops of Rheme, Hamberg, and Ratisbona, with divers other great Prelats. Who having passed through Hungary and Thracia, and by the Greek Emperor Alexius Angelus relieved with all things necessary, were by the Grecian Ships transported unto Antioch, and fo by Land came to Jyre, and from thence to Ptolemais, with purpose to have gone to relieve the Germans besieged in Joppa; who before their coming were all by treason slain, and the City rased; wherefore being come to the ruins thereof, they departed thence to Sidon, which they found also abandoned by the Turks. After that they took Berithus, which City they fortified, and so went to besiege Tonne; which City when they had brought to the extremity, as that it must needs (as it was thought) either yield or be taken, the Turks came on fo fast to the relief thereof, that the Christians were glad to raise their Siege and to be gone; which they in garriſon at Berithus perceiving, and ſeeing the Enemy to approach them, they abandoned the City, and joyning themselves unto the rest of the Army, marched all together to Joppa, a little before ruined, which they now again fortified. But the Enemy coming to Berithus, and finding it forsoaken, rased it down to the ground, and so in few months space was Berithus both repaired and rased, in the year 1197.

But whilst the Christians were repairing the City of Joppa, the Turks proud of that they had done at Berithus, came now to disturb also the fortifying of that place. Of whose coming the Christians understanding, removed by night about five miles from the City, of purpose to draw the Turks unto a convenient place for Battle. The Turks thinking them to have been fled for fear, sent part of their Army to assail the City; and with the other followed after them disorderly, as if it had been after men they had had in chase.

Upon whom the Christians turning, had with them at the first a sharp encounter, but afterwards put them to flight; in which conflict certain thousands of the Turks fell; of whom the Christians taking the Spoil, and having put the rest to flight, returned again to the fortifying of the City. But the joy of this Victory was by the sudden death of two of the greatest Princes in the Army greatly diminished: for the Duke of Saxony having in the Battle taken great pains in performing the parts both of a worthy General and valiant Soldier, had over-heard himself, and thereupon without regard of his health taking cold, died of a Fever the fourth day after. The Duke of Austria mortally wounded in the Battle, died also the night following.

About this time, or not long after, died Celestinus the Pope, Author of this Expedition, and Henry also the German Emperor; after whose death great troubles began to arise in Germany about the choosing of a new Emperor. Whereof the Bishop of Mogunfia (then chief Commander of the Army of the Christians in Syria) one of the Electors, and the other German Princes with him, having intelligence, could not by any real they were come) be persuaded longer to stay, but that needs home they would; and indeed home they went the fame way that they came. After whose departure the Turks took Joppa, having one of the Ports betrayed unto them by one of the City, at such time as the Germans there in Garriſon, after the manner of their Country, upon St. Marys day were carefully making merry together in their Pots; upon whom fo furcharged with Wine, the Turks entering by the Port given unto them, put them all with the rest of the Christians to the Sword, and so afterward rased the City down to the ground. Of which Victory they became fo proud, that they had thought without stop to have driven the Christians quite out of Syria; but by the coming of Simon Count of Mont-Fort (a most valiant and expert Captain, rent thither by Philip the French King, with a Regiment of tall Soldiers, at the instance of Innocentius the Third, that succeeded Celestinus in the Papacy) and by civil discord then reigning amongst the Turks themselves for Sovereignty, their fury was repressed, and a peace betwixt them and the Christians concluded for the space of ten years; during which time the Turks promised not to molest the Christians in Jyre or Ptolemais; which happened in the year 1199, or as some others say, 1198. After which peace so concluded, the worthy Count returned again with his Soldiers into France; with whom we also will repair into the lesser Asia (whither the course both of the time and of the History now calleth us) to see the other great affairs of the Turks in those Eastern Countries; leaving for a season their poor remainders of so many Christians in Jyre and Ptolemais now for a while in peace, but to be ere long devoured of the Infidels their Enemies, as in the process of this History shall in due time and place appear.

The

The Ruine of the TURKS first Empire in PERSIA; with the Success of their Second Kingdom in the lesser Asia, under the Aladin Kings.

Kingdoms after the manner of other things, have but their time to flourish in, and so again decay.

AS no Kingdom or Empire upon Earth (were it never so flourishing or great) was ever yet so assured, but that in the Revolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a sick Body been subject unto many strange Innovations and Changes, and at length come to nothing; so fared it now with the Turkish Empire, which first planted by Tangralixip in Persia, and the other far Eastern Countries, increased by Ascan his Son, and so by the Turkish Sultans their Successors (although their names and doings, as too far off, be not unto us all known) for the space of one hundred and seventy years continued, must now (I say) give place unto a greater Power, and settle it self else-where, the inevitable destiny thereof so requiring. It fortune, that about this time (when in the space of a few years such Mutations as had not before of long been seen, changed in divers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tatars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare Countries in the North-side of Asia, (of all others a most barbarous, fierce, and needy Nation) stirred up by their own wants, and the persecution of one Zingis (or as some call him, Cangis) holden amongst them for a great Prophet, and now by them made their Leader, and honoured by the name of Ulu-Chan; that is to say, The mighty King, (commonly called The Great Chan) flocking together in number like the Sand of the Sea, and conquering first their poor Neighbours, of condition and quality like themselves, and easie enough to be entreated with them to seek their better Fortune, like swarms of Grasshoppers sent out to devour the World, passed the high Mountain Caucasus, part of the Mountain Taurus, of all the Mountains in the World the greatest; which beginning near unto the Archipelago, and ending upon the Oriental Ocean, and running through the many great and famous Kingdoms, divided Asia into two parts; over which great Mountain, one of the most assured bounders of nature, that had so many Worlds of years shut up this rough and savage people, they now passing without number, and coming down as it were into another World, full of Natures pleasant delights, such as never were to them before seen, bare down all before them as they went, nothing being now able to stand in their way. Old Zingis their fortunate Leader dead in this fo great an Expedition, Hocentia his Son, eldest of his twelve Brethren, a man of great Wisdom and Courage, took upon him of his Fathers Place; who sending part of his great Army for the subduing of the Countries Westward, turned himself with a world of people towards the East; where having subdued the Bedrians and Sogdians, with divers others, he entered into India, and subduing that rich Country on both sides the River Indus, even to the East Ocean, there in the Country of Cathai built the famous City of Cambala, in circuit eight and twenty miles about; for pleasure and plenty of all things necessary for the life of man, of all the Cities of Asia the chief; where the great Chan of Tartary still Resident, as in his Imperial City, commandeth over one of the greatest and strongest Empires of the World. In whose Kingdom also, in the Province Alany, more towards the East, he hath another most famous City called Quinif, of all the Cities in the World the greatest, in circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himself dwelt therein about the year, 1260. It is situate in a Lake of fresh-water, and hath in it twelve thousand Bridges; of which some are of such an height, that tall Ships with their Sails up may easily pass under them. In this populous City the great Chan hath for the keeping thereof always thirty thousand men in Garriſon. The Tartar Kingdom thus planted in Cambala, Hocentia contenting himself with the rich pleasures of India, afterward managed his Wars by his Lieutenants, being for the most part his Brethren, or other his high Kinsmen; of whom he sent out with his Armies some Northward, some Westward, and some toward the South; by whom he subdued the Arachians, Margians, and divers other great Nations; and entering into Persia, subdued the Country, with all Partavia, Alfaria, Myriandania, and Media. At this time in the City Balch or Belch in the Country of Chorasani in the farthest part of Persia, reigned over the Turks one Cavajumes, of the Greeks called Corjanus; who finding himself far too weak to stand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leaving unto them both the City and the Country which he and the Turks his Predecessors had ever since the time of Tangralixip possessed; which City the Tartars rased, and took the Country unto themselves. In this general flight of the Turks, when as every man was glad to make what shift he might for himself, Corjanus their Sultan died, the last of the Kings of the Selaccian Family that reigned over the Turks in Persia; whose Son Urgan-Chan taking upon him the leading of such multitudes of Turks as followed his Father, failed upon the great City of Babylon, now called Bagdad, near unto the ruins of the old Babylon; where having put to the Sword all the Inhabitants thereof, he there and in the Country thereabout seated himself with the Turks his Followers; but long he had not there reſted, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, pursued him, took him Prisoner, and expelled thence all his people. There was at the same time also another Kingdom of the Turks at Nachan a City in Persia, giving name unto the Country wherein it stood, not far from Chorasani; wherein then reigned one Solyman, of the Oguzian Family, as had divers other of his Progenitors before him; who terrified with this dreadful Storm so suddenly risen out of the North, and warned by the sudden fall of the Selaccian Sultan and his Kingdom, of far greater Fame and Power than himself or his, fled also with such his Subjects as would follow him, into the lesser Asia. But of him and his proceedings more shall be said hereafter in the rising of the Victorious Orkoman Family, as descending from him. After this the Tartars together with their good fortune still extending the bounds of their Empire, conquered Armenia the greater, with the Countries of Calchis and Iberia; so that now their Empire was become of all others others the greatest and most flourishing. This great Conqueror the Tartar, as his proud conceit purposed to have subdued all Asia, and to have made the Sea the only bounder of his Empire; but overcome with the delicacies of India, having divided amongst his people those great Provinces and fruitful Countries, with the rich Cities and pleasant Fields, he so reposed, embracing the Manners and Superstition of his people he had overcome, that it was so far from our purpose, to recount all the famous Victories and Conquests of this bare Northern people; suffice it to the History we have in hand, that the Turks were by them then driven out of Perfia, with the Countries thereabout; and their Togran Kingdom (as they call it) first founded by Timgubius, there extinguished about the year of our Lord, 1202. The Turks thus driven out of Perfia, and their Kingdom overthrown, retired themselves into the lesser Asia, possessed by their Country-men, long before brought thither by Culte-Mufes and his Sons; (as is before declared) and by them ever since in some part, though with divers Fortune-holders. Where these Turks now arrived out of Perfia under the leading of Aladin the Son of Ket Hufren, defended also of the Selaccian Family in Perfia, and taking the opportunity offered them by the mortal discord of the Latines with the Greeks, and the Greeks among themselves, feited upon Gilicia with the Countries thereabouts, and there first at Schafnia, and afterward at Iconium, erected their new Kingdom; which of this Aladin is by the Turks called the Kingdom of the Aladin Kings, although their names were not all so.

Now about this time, and within the course of some few years after, such great and strange mutations happened in the Constantinopolitan Empire, as had not therein at any time before been seen; whereby the whole Estate of that great Empire, which sometime commanded over a great part of the World, was almost utterly subverted, and a fit opportunity given unto the Turks and Infidels for the first setting of themselves, and establishing of their Kingdoms both in Syria and the lesser Asia; which briefly to run through shall not be from our purpose; and their Affairs prospering by these Troubles, and their proud and hateful Empire that now braved all the rest of the World, being raised out of the ruins of that Christian Empire; and at this present triumphing even in some Imperial City wherein these so great Innovations happened through the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and destruction of a great part of the Christian Common-wealth.

Alexius the Ullurper, but now Emperor, not contented (as is before declared) traitorously to have deprived Isaac his elder Brother of his Empire and fight together, fought also after the Life of the young Prince Alexius his Brothers Son, and their apparent of the Empire; who feeling the Villainy of the Person of his Brother, fled himself by flight from the fury of his Uncle, and so accompanied with certain great Lords of the Greeks, his Fathers Friends, fled to crave Aid of the Christian Princes of the West, whom the Grecians commonly call the Latines. And first he took his way to Philip the German Emperor, who had married his Sister, the Emperor Isaac Daughter, by whom he was most honourably received and entertained. This great Lady not a little moved with the Miseries of her Father, and the flight of her Brother, ceased not most instantly to solicit the Emperor her Husband, not to leave unrevenge to great a Villany, by the example thereof dangerous unto himself and others of like Majesty and State. She declared unto him, what an execrable Indignity it was, to see her Father the Emperor unworthily imprisoned, deprived of his Empire and fight, and of the society of men, by his Brother that had by him received and recovered his Life, his Light, and his Liberty; and to see the Heir apparent of the Empire banished by the wickedness of his Uncle, to wander up and down here and there like a Beggar. This great part of which disgrace, as the said, redounded unto her self the Daughter of Isaac, and Sister to the young wandering Prince, and to himself also, the Son in law unto the unfortunate Emperor her Father. Moreover the said, that this Murderer Alexius durst never be hardy as to commit so great and detestable a Villany, if he had not lightly regarded and contemned the Majesty of the said Philip; whom if he had had in any Reverence or Honour, or at all feared, he durst not have attempted so Villanous an act. This Greek Lady moved with full grief, with these and such like Complaints to prevail with her Husband, that he promised her to be in some part thereof revenged; which he could not for the present perform, letted by the Wars he then had with Otho his Competitor of the Empire. At the same time it fortuned, that great Preparations were making in Italy, and divers other places of Christendom, for an Expedition to be made against the Turks into the Holy Land. The chief men wherein were Theobald Count of Champagne, (a man of great fame, and General of the Christian Army) Boniface Marquess of Mont-Ferrat, Baldwin Earl of Flanders and Henry his Brother Earl of St. Paul, Henry Duke of Lovain, Gualter Earl of Breame, with divers other noble Gentlemen, which to name were tedious; unto whom referred also many valiant and devout Christians out of divers parts of Christendom, ready to have spent their lives in that so Religious a War; so that now the number of them was great, and the Army right populous. But being thus assembled together, they thought it not best to take their way to Constantinople, through Hungary and Thrace, and so to pass over into Bithynia; for that the Greeks had still in all former times shewed great discourtesy unto the Latines, in passing with their Armies that way; and therefore they thought it much better now by the way of Italy to take their Journey by Sea into the Holy Land; and for their Transportation, especially to use the help of the Venetians, whom they found much easier to be intreated, for that by the means of so great an Army, they were in hope to secure the Adriatick (then much infested by the Dalmatians) as to recover Fadara, with some other Cities upon the Coast of Scalavonia, before revolted from their State to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterward did. But by the way as this Army was marching out of the Adriatick, and came into Tarentum, the noble Count of Champagne General thereof, there fell sick and died, to the exceeding grief and sorrow of the whole Army; in whose stead, the Marquess of Mont-Ferrat, a man of great Nobility, and well acquainted with the Wars of the East, was chosen General. This great Army, transported by the Venetians into Scalavonia, took Fadara, with divers other Port Towns along the Sea coast, and having there done what the Venetians most desired, was about again to have been imbarck for Syria, and so into the Holy Land. But the young Prince Alexius in the mean time had by himself and the noble Grecians (led with him for fear of the Tyrant) so wrought the matter with the Latine Princes of the West, especially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the Emperor his Brother in law, and Philip the French King, that they plying his Estate, and induced also with some other Considerations more proper to themselves, took him as it were into their Protection, commending by Letters and Messengers for that purpose sent unto the Army, (which they might command) the defence both of himself and his Cause; who with the Commendation of three or four Princes, coming to the Army yet lying at Fadara (expecting but a fair Wind to have passed into Syria) was there of them all most honourably received, as the Son of an Emperor, and as became one to them so highly commended. And he himself also, as one knowing his good, was not wanting unto himself, but recommended his person to their Protection, as a poor exiled Prince in Distress; yet was he of a lively Spirit, gracious in Speech, beautiful to behold, and very young, and withall fully instructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might serve to further his purpose. And forthwith as this great Army consisted of divers Nations, especially of the French, Italians, and Venetians, not all to be by one man moved; he fitted every one with such motives as he thought might best prevail with them: Unto the French he promised to pay the great fee of Constantinople, and the recovery of the Venetians for the furnishing of themselves in this War: Unto the Venetians he promised Recompence for all the Injuries they had sustained by the late Constantinopolitan Emperors, especially by the Emperor Emanuel (who for that they refused to Aid him in his Wars against William King of Sicily, did in law confiscate all the Goods of the Venetian Merchants within his Empire, of a great value; and afterwards contrary to the Law of Nations, shamefully entreated their Embassadors sent unto him, amongst whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune General for the Venetians in the Army; who moved as well with the wrong in particular done unto himself, as with the Common, desired to be revenged both of the one and the other; which although he could not have of Emanuel himself, being long before dead, yet was he still desirous to have it of some one of the Greek Emperors, whosoever he were; Unto the Pope and the Italians, both he and the Noblemen with him, had before promised, that the Greek Church should ever acknowledge the Supremacy of the Church of Rome, and from thenceforth submit it felt thereunto, as unto the Sovereign Judge of all the Christian Churches; which caused the Pope Innocentius, by Letters, by Legates, by Embassadors, and by all other means possible, to further the Cause of the young Prince Alexius, so combined with his own; alledging the diversity of Opinions in matters of Religion, betwixt the Greeks and the Latines, to have been the chief cause that the Mahometans had not been long ago by their United Forces subdued, or utterly rooted out. In brief, the young Prince spared not to promise most bountiful Rewards in general, to all that should take his part against his Uncle the usurping Emperor.

By this means, the devout War taken in hand for the Redress of the poor Christians in Syria, and the recovery of the same Forces of the Latines have been therein employ'd, now converted against the Greek Empire, to the great weakening of that side of the Christian Common-wealth, and advantage of the Common Enemy; who might then easily have been oppressed, had he with the United Forces of the Christians been on this side charged home, as he was on the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian War thus resolved upon, it seemed best unto the great Commanders of the Army, to march against the Grecians, as to the head of the Grecian State, and place where the Tyrant whom they fought after was relict. In the mean time it was by them given out through all the Greek Cities which the Emperor had strongly manned and fortified for the buying of their passage, that their purpose was not to make War against the Grecians their Friends, but only to restore their lawful Emperor unto his former State and Honour: And that forasmuch as every City and Town in ancient Greece had appointed Rewards, and almost divine Honours unto such as had delivered them from Tyrants, they should now more favourably receive and intreat them that came to restore unto every City, and to every man in general, their former Liberty and Honour. And to upon the Resolution for Constantinople imbarck their Army, and passing through the Ionian Sea into the Aegean, and so without let through the Straits of Hellipontus into Propontis, and entering the Straits of Bosphorus Thracius, which divide Europe from Asia, they came to an Anchor even in the face of the City. In this Fleet were two hundred and forty Sail of tall Ships, sixty Gallies, seventy Ships for burden, and one hundred and twenty Sail of Viduauns; which all together made a most brave force, covering that Strait in such sort, as that it seemed rather a Wood than a part of the Sea. Thus for a space they lay facing the City, attending if happily upon the coming and fight of so great a Fleet, and the report of so puissant an Army as the young Prince Alexius had brought with him, any Tumult or Sedition might arise in the City. But the wary Tyrant had so well provided therefore before hand, that the Citizens, although they in heart favoured the young Prince, and wished him well, yet durst they not once move or stir in his Quarrel. Whilst the Fleet thus lay, Embassadors came from the life of Creet, in two great Gallies, with three banks of Oars, yielding unto the young Prince that goodly Island, with all the Towns and Cities therein; which he forthwith gave unto the Marquess of Mont-Ferrat, General of the Army, thereby to encourage the other great Commanders of the Army to do the utmost of their devoir, in hope of Recompence and Rewards answerable to their deserts and valor.

Before the arrival of this Fleet, Alexius the Emperor had with a great Chain made fast the entrance of the Haven betwixt Constantinople and Pera, and appointed twenty great Gallies well manned for the keeping thereof; but a great gale of Wind arising, the General sent out the greatest and strongest Ship in the Fleet (for her greatness and swiftness called the Eagle) which with all her sails up, carried with a full gale of Wind, by main force brake the Chain, and gave way for the rest of the Fleet to follow, which the Greeks in the Gallies seeing, for fear fled, leaving the Gallies for a spoil unto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not a man found in them. The Haven thus gained, Theodoros Lascaris the Emperors Son in law, was presently ready upon the shore with a select Company of the bravest of the City and of the Court, to have hindered the Latines from landing; who running their Ships aground, and landed with such cheerfulness and courage, and with such haste, that in one moment you might have seen them leap out of their Ships, take land, enter into the battle, and lay about them like mad men. This hot skirmish endured a great while, while, for that they were only Fooe-men that furnished this brunt, for the Horfes could not fo soon be landed, and the Greeks were bravely engaged. All this great fight the Constantinopolitans beheld, with doubtful hearts, expecting what should be the event thereof. There were in the City fix thousand of the Flower of Greece, which bravely falling out, made the battel much more doubtful; yet fuch was the valour and resolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greeks difcomfited, were glad to retire themselves again into the City, but with what lofs, was not certainly known: cafe it were to guefs, that it was right great, for that the old Tyrant Alexius discouraged therewith, and doubtful of his own eftate, with Theodorus Lafcaris his Son in law, and fome few others of his truly Friends (hard to be found in fo dangerous a cafe), the next night following fecretly fled out of the City, carrying away with him a wonderful mafs of Treafure (which he againft all fuch events had caufed to be fecretly hidden by his Daughter Irene, in a Monaffery of Nuns within the City, whereof he was the Abbeff) and fo faved himself.

The flight of the Tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Constantinopolitans taking the old Emperor Ifaac out of Prifon, faluted him again for their Emperor, rejoicing greatly for his deliverance and the falfeguard of his life; and after that opened the Gates of the City to the Latines, calling and leading them in by the way of the Revengers and Saviours of the Liberty of the Greeks, as alfo of the Life and Majesty of their Emperor; they requelted them that they might fee and falute Alexius their young Prince, whom they had fo long defired; and fo was the City of Constantinople, by the fubmiffion of the Citizens, freed from fackage and fack, and the old Emperor thus delivered, and together with his Son Alexius again placed in the Imperial Seat, gave the molt hearty thanks that poffibly he could unto the Latine Princes, for that by their Bounty, Charity, and Valour, the Greek Empire had been delivered out of a long and miferable Servitude; and for his own particular, that he had received of them fo great good, that albeit his fight could not be reforted to him again, nevertheless he acknowledged his Life, his Liberty, his Empire, his Country, his Son, to have been unto him by them reforted, and he likewise to them; for which their fo great Defers he could not (as he faid) reward them better, contentment, or daffe Rewards or Honours preferable to their Demerits and Valour; and that therefore he did ratifie and confirm whatever his Son had before promifed unto them for his deliverance; and not only that, but further promifed, That if they were not therewith contented, he would of his own bounty give them better contentment, not meaning they fhould go difcontented, that had faved his life, and otherwife fo highly pleafured him. Hereupon this good old Emperor began to confult with his Friends about the means whereby he might fatisfie and content the Latines in fuch things as the young Prince his Son had unto them promifed. And to the intent, that the Citizens of Constantinople might the more willingly do that he was to command them, and the more cheerfully pay fuch Impofitions as he was to lay upon them, he intreated all the Latines to retire themselves out of the City into their Camp, about their Ships, which they accordingly did. But the Impofition being foon down, and what every man was to pay, femed unto the Greeks (as men of long accuftomed to receive Tribute of others, and not to pay Tribute to others) a matter molt heavy and intolerable.

In this very infant that this Exaction was required, died the old Emperor Ifaac, who having of long been kept in a dark and thinking Prifon in continual fear of death, and now delivered and reforted to his Empire, could not indure fo fudden and unexpected a change, both of the Air and of his manner of living, but fo fuddenly died.

At this Exaction impofed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Constantinopolitans grievouly murmured, and exclaimed, faying, That it was a villainous thing to fee the Greek Empire engaged and bound (by a young Boy) unto a covetous and proud Nation, and fo to be fpilled and made bare of Coin: That the great and rich Ifland of Crete lying in the middle of the Sea, was by him given as a Gift unto the Latines: That the City of Constantinople and the Greek Church, had by him been enforced and contrained to yield unto the Sec of Rome, to receive the Opinions of the Latine Church, to fubmit it felf unto the Obedyence of old Rome, from whence it had once happily departed ever fince the time that the Empire was by Constantine the Great tranflated thence to them. Thus every one faid for himfelf in particular; thus all men faid in general. And thereof the Noblemen in their Affemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grievouly complained; whereupon a Sedition and Tumult was raifed in the City. Some prefently took up arms, and the common people all enraged ran furiously difordered unto the Palace, with a purpofe to have committed fome great Outrage upon the Perfon of the young Emperor Alexius; who in that fo fudden an Infurrection, as might well have troubled a right conftant man, without longer delay refolved upon a molt wholfome and neceffary point for the appeafing of the peoples rage; unto whom affembled in a wonderful multitude) he fhewed himfelf from above in his Palace, promifing them to remain in their Power, and not from thenceforth to do any thing without their advice and liking, but wholly to depend upon them; with which good words the people held themfelves well content, and fo was the tumult for that time appeafed. But forthwith the young Emperor confidering the injury done unto him, began to burn with the defire of Revenge, and to change his purpofe. He could not together fatisfie the Citizens and the Latines; for if he would keep his promife with the Latines, he muft of neceffity offend his own people; neither was there any means to be found to fatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himfelf more bound to keep his promife with the Latines, whole Forces he knew not how to withftand, he fent fecretly to requelt the Marquels of Mont-Ferrat, General of the Army, to fend him about midnight certain Companies of Soldiers unto the City, affuring him to receive them in by a Gate near unto the Palace, which fhould be opened unto them by certain of his trufty Servants there left for that purpofe. Of this Plot Alexius Duca of his birds broes firnamed Murzufes, whom of a bafe Fellow the Emperor Ifaac had promoted unto the greateft Honours of the Court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an afpiring mind, and in thofe troublefome times having long thirfted after the Empire, took now this occafion to work upon.

The night following, he by his Agents, men intrusted for the purpofe, raifed a tumult in the City, nor inferior unto that which had happened the day before; and at the fame instant, as if he had had nothing to do in the matter, came fuddenly to the young Emperor in the dead time of the

the night (which he might at all time do, by reafon of the great confidence the Emperor had in him) and with a fad countenance told him, That the People were up again in an uprore, and efpecially they of his Guard, and that they were coming toward him to do him fome violence for the love he bare unto the Latines. With which unexpected news the young Emperor terrified, commanded him of his molt faithful Countellor, What were beft in that cafe for him to do? Who prefently embracing him in his Nightgown, led him out by a fecret doore into a Tent he had of his own in the Court, as if he would there have kept him fafe; but far was that from his traiterous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeafe the Tumult, had been taken order, that he fhould prefently after his departure, be caft into Bonds, and fo be clapt up into a clofe thinking Prifon: which done, the falf Traitor openly fhewing himfelf, made an Oration to the People, wherein he fhewed himfelf to have great compaffion of the Greek Empire, and of the Greeks his Country men themfelves, efpecially in that they were governed by a youth unfit for the government, who fuffied himfelf to be mifled according to the pleafure of the Latines. And that it was high time for the City of Constantinople, the feat of the Greek Empire, to look about it, and to fend an Eye unto it felf, fith it was betrayed and fold by them which by them felf preferved and kept the fame; that they had now need of a man that loved his Country and Country-men, before that which yet remained of the Gracian name were utterly extinguifhed by the Latines.

This his Speech, fitted of purpofe unto the humour of the Seditions, was received with great outcry and applaus of the windy headed People. Some cried out, that he, and none but he, was to be made chief of the Common-weal that was by them to be eftablifhed; otherfome cried aloud to have him made General of the Armies and Forces of the State; but the greateft cry was to have him chofen and created Emperor; whereunto the reft giving place, he was by the general confent of the tumultuous People, without longer flay, chofen and proclaimed Emperor.

Alexius the Traitor, by no lawful Election or rightful Succellion, but only by the fury of the tumultuous People, thus created Emperor; was of nothing more careful, than how to farcher the Forces of the Latines, of whom only he now ftood in dread. And therefore to begin withal, he firft attempted by certain Gallies filled with Pitch, Flax, Brimftone, and fuch like matter apt to take fire, to have burnt the Venetian Fleet; which Gallies fo far on fire and carried with a fure gale of Wind among the Fleet, had been fufficient enough to have done great harm, had it not by the warinefs of the Venetians been prevented; who being good Sea men, and not unacquainted with fuch devices, eafily and without danger avoided the fame, by keeping themfelves aloof one from another in the Sea. This finenefs forcing to no purpofe, he to colour the matter fent certain Meflengers to the General, and other Commanders of the Army, to give them to underftand that that which was done for the firing of the Fleet, had been done without his privy, by the malice of the tumultuous People, and that for his part he would be glad of their Favour and Friendfhip, affuring them likewife of his, and promifing them to aid them both with men and money, and whatsoever elfe they fhould have need of in their War againft the Infidels. Whereunto an anfwer was given by Dandulus the Venetian General, that he would believe it, when Alexis the Son of the Emperor Ifaac, whom the Latines had placed in the Empire, fhould affure him thereof, and intreat for the People, upon whom the fault of that outrage was laid; which anfwer the more moved the traiterous Tyrant to rid himfelf clean of the fear of the young Prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the People of the hope and great defire they had to grow to fome peace with the Latines, by taking him out of Prifon, and receiving him again for their Emperor. For the People (by nature mutable, and not defirous of the good of themfelves, but according to the occurrents prefent, without any great regard of that they had already done, or ought to have done) began now to repent themfelves of that they had done againft their Emperor Alexis in Favour of the young Prince, and commonly faid, That they muft find fome means, whatfoever it were, to remedy their fault together with their troubles. Wherefore Murzufes fearing the fudden mutation of the People, with his own Hands molt villainouly frangled the young Prince Alexis in Prifon, having as yet not attained much above fix months, and immediately after caufed it to be bruited abroad, That the fad young Prince departed out of his Eftate, had as a man difperate, hanged himfelf.

The Tyrant in vain having thus attempted the burning of the Fleet, and filt fearing the revengeful fword of the Latines, refolved now by plain force to meet them in the field, and there to put them to battel. So having made ready and armed the whole Strength of the Imperial City, he with cheerful fpeech encouraged his Souldiers, requetting them valiantly to maintain and defend their Country of Greece, the Monuments of their Fathers, the Glory of their Anceftors, their prefent Honour, and the future Hope of their Pollicy; that having before their Eyes the Walls of their City, within which they were born, nourifhed, and brought up in hope of great matters, they would have pity and compaffion of their Temples, their Wives, their Children, and in no cafe to fuffer them to fall again into fo miferable and wretched a Servitude, but rather to die a thoufand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterprife taken in hand for the defence of his Country (as he would have the world to believe it) with the colour of a fuperftitious Devotion aloof, he caufed the Priests in their Ecclefiaftical Attire and Ornaments, to march forth before his Army, with an inging, having in it displayed the Picture of the Virgin Mary. So courageoufly marching forward, he firft charged that quarter of the Camp where Baldwin the Count of Flanders lay, where at the firft was fought a right fierce and doubtful Battel. But afterward the Alarm running throughout all the Camp of the Latines, and new fupplies coming in, the one fide of the Greeks were put to the worfe, and enforced again to retire into the City, having loft a great number of men, together with their fuperftitious Engin. It was a wonderful thing to fee, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of divers Nations, continued this expedition undertaken againft the Greeks. Seventy two days was the City of Constantinople ftrenghly befieged by the Latines both by Sea and Land, without giving any time of reft or refpofe day or night to the befieged, frefh men coming fill on to the Affault, as the other fell off, and in fuch fort troubled the Greeks in the City, that they knew not well what to do, or which way to turn themfelves. The Venetians upon whom was committed the charge to affault that fide of the City which was toward the Haven, upon two great Gallies made faft together, built a ftrong Tower of Wood, higher than the Walls and Rampiers of the Town, out of which they both with Shot and Fire-works much troubled the Defendants, wherewith they in the time of the assault approaching the Wall, by their fire devices first: that side of the City by the rage without, and a great number of Houses were burnt, with many other flames; and ancient Monuments of that famous City; and had at that present gained a great Tower near unto the Port, destitute of defenders, had not the Tyrant himself in good time come with new Supplies to the rescue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the rest, assailed the other side of the City by Land, where they were to fight not against the Defendants only, but against deep Ditches, high and strong Walls, and Bulwarks also; nevertheless, such was the Valour and Fury of the Latines, with the desire of Victory; as that they were not with any difficulties to be dismayed; but pressing still on, by a thousand dangers, at length after a most sharp Assault, they gained one of the greatest Bastions on that side of the City, called the Angel Tower, and so by plain force opened a way both for themselves and the rest into the City: Whereof Alexius undefending, and struck with present despair both of his State and Life, the night now coming on, fled with Euphrosina the Emperor Alexius's Wife, and Eudokia her Daughter, whom he had married when he had reigned about a month and fifteen days.

The Tyrant, Author of all this mischief, and of the calamities ensuing, thus fled, and the Latines furiously entering, the Priests and Religious Men in their Surplices, and other Ecclesiastical Ornaments with their Croffes and Banners (as in solemn procession) met the Latines, and falling down at the Soldiers Feet, with Floods of tears abundantly running down their heavy countenances, besought them, but especially the Captains and Commanders to remember the condition of worldly things, and consenting themselves with the Victory, the Glory, the Honour, the Empire, the Immortality of their Name, to abstain from Slaughter, from burning, from spoiling and ransacking of so beautiful a City; and that seeing they were themselves men, they would also have pity of men; and being themselves Captains and Soldiers, they should also have compassion upon Captains and Souldiers; who although they were not so valiant and fortunate as they were, yet nevertheless were both Captains and Souldiers; and that they would keep and preserve their City, wherof (if they ruined it not) they might have much more pleasure and commodity, than if they should destroy the same, which as it had been the principal fear of the Greek Empire, so might it now be of the Latines; That seeing they had thereof a careful regard, as then belonging to another man, they ought now upon better reason, to have more care thereof, being their own: That the Authors of all these troubles and mischiefs, Alexius the Elder, and Mursule, had already received a reward answerable to their follies, in that they were driven into Exile; That they would have pity and compassion of an innocent and unfortunate Multitude of poor People, oppressed and grievously tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous Lords and Governors; That in so doing, God the Lord of Hosts, the giver and guider of Battels, the God of mercy, would therefore reward them. To conclude, they humbly besought them to pardon their Citizens, to put on the hearts of gracious and merciful Lords and Fathers, not of Enemies and rough Masters; of Forgivers, not of Revengers; and to understand by their Tears, their miserable Estate and Woes passed. With this he humble a Submission and Complaint of the Religious, some of the better sort were happily moved, but with the common Soldiers, breathing nothing but Victory, with their Weapons in their Hands; and the Spoil of an Empire in their Power, what availed Prayers or Tears? Every man fell to the Spoil, and in so great choice and liberty of all things, fitted his own disordered appetite, without respect of the wrong or injury done to others; only from the effusion of innocent blood they abstained: they whose lives they fought after, being already dead, together with the Tyrant. Other injuries and outrages (so great as that greater noise could be) were in every place to be seen, that every Street, every Lane, every Corner of the City was filled with Mourning and Heaviness. There might a man have seen Noble Men carst of great Honour, and reverend for their hoary Hairs, with other Citizens of great Wealth, thrust out of all they had, walking up and down the City weeping and wringing their hands as men forlorn, knowing not where to throw their Heads. Neither stayed the greedy rage of the insolent Souldiers within the Walls of mans private Houses, but brake out into the stately Palaces, Temples and Churches of the Greeks also, where all was good prize, and nothing dedicated to the Service of God, left unpolluted and defaced, no place unfought, nor corner unsifted: right lamentable and almost incredible to report all the miseries of that time. Some of the Greek Historiographers, men of great mark and place, and themselves Eye-witnesses and Partakers of those evils, have by their Writings complained to all Posterity, of the insolency of the Latines at the winning of the City, to their eternal dishonour; but that disordered Souldiers in all Ages in the liberty of their infatuated Victory, have done such outrages, whose minds abhor to think upon. This Constantinople the most famous City of the East, the seat and glory of the Greek Empire, by the miserable ambition and diffention of the Greeks for Sovereignty, fell into the Hands of the Latines, the twelfth of April, in the year 1204, or after the account of others, 1206.

Constantinople thus taken, and the Tyrants put to flight, the Princes and great Commanders of the Army held a Council, to consider what were best to be done concerning the City and the new gained Empire; for after so great a Victory, they thought it not good to raise so ancient and important a City, seated as it were at Watch-Tower upon the Theatre of the World, overlooking both Asia and Europe from the one to the other, as an eye of the Universal, and so commodiously placed, as was no other City of the World, for the keeping under of the Enemies of the Christian Religion; but that it were much better to place there a Latine Governour, to establish there the Latine Laws and Customs, and to unite the Greek Church as a Member unto the Church of Rome. In which consultation, some were of opinion, not to have any more Emperors in Christendom but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the German Emperor, Author of this War, whose Wife Irene was the only Daughter and Heir of the late Emperor Isaac Angelus, unto whom by all right the Inheritance of her Fathers Empire belonged. But the greater part, considering that the troubled affairs of Greece, in so great a change and newness of the Empire, had need of the personal presence of a Prince, thought it better to make choice of one among themselves, who there fill vacant in that place, might as all times give aid unto the Latins in the sacred Wars, taken in hand against the Infidels; which opinion as the better, was approved of them all.

The

The chief men in this Election of the new Emperor, were Baldwin Count of Flanders and Hainault, Henry his Brother, Lewis Count of Blies, Simon de Montfort, John de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh Count of St. Paul, John Count of Brenne, Boniface Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, Stephen Count of Perth, and five German Bishops; unto whom all were joynt two Bishops of Syria, the one of Bathlem, the other of Ptolemais, who had oftentimes come to the Camp of the Latines, to stir them up for the taking in hand the sacred War in Syria; with two Bishops of France also, namely of Soufflon and Troy in Champagne, and the Abbot of Lemey. These great Lords and Prelates assembled into the Church of the holy Apostles, after they had there with great devotion craved of God to inspire them with his Spirit for the choice of a good and just Prince fit for so great a charge; with one consent made choice of Baldwin Count of Flanders and Hainault, for Emperor of Greece; a brave and valiant Prince, about two and thirty years old, who was afterward the sixteenth day of May, in the year 1204. (Or after the computation of others, in the year 1205.) in the great Temple of S. Sophia solemnly crowned by Theobald Marquis a Venetian, first Patriarch of the Latines in Constantinople. From which time the Greek Church in Constantinople began to receive the Rites and Ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the Supremacy of the Church of Rome.

It was not long after that Constantinople was thus taken by the Latines, but that they dividing their Forces without any resistance, took in the most part of the great Countries and Provinces on Europe side, belonging to the Greek Empire in the time of Isaac Angelus the late Emperor; the fortune of the whole Empire, as it were following the fortune of the Imperial City. Which large Countries so gained from the Greeks, the Latines divided amongst themselves, as good prize taken from their Enemies. Unto Baldwin the Emperor and his Successors in the Empire, was assigned the Imperial City of Constantinople and the Country of Thracia, with a limited Sovereignty over all the rest of the Provinces by the Latines already or afterwards to be gained. Unto the Venetians in this division of the Empire, was allotted for their share all the rich Islands of the Ægean, and Ionian, with the famous Island of Candy also; which although it was divided by the Venetians and Alexius in the beginning of these Wars, given unto the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, yet in this division of the Empire, it was taken from him (not without his good liking) and given to the Venetians, as for them more fit; instead and lieu wherof, the Marquis had the City of Thessalonica with all the Kingdom of Thessaly, and a great part of Peloponnesus assigned unto him, with the Royal Title of a King. Of the aforesaid Islands (in number many and exceeding much) the Venetians in the name of the State, fortified some few of the greatest with convenient Garrisons, the rest they left to be possessed and defended by the better sort of the Citizens at their private cost and charges; who according to their ability, took into their possession, some one Island, some another, and some two or three, as they were able to for out the Gallies, one, two, or more, for the keeping of the same; over all which, the Signiory nevertheless had a general care, still keeping a Fleet with one of their Admirals at Sea; by whom they not only repressed the Genna Pirates then busy in those Seas, but also took in certain strong Towns in the Main upon the coast of Peloponnesus, namely Modon and

Corone; all which they of long time after held as a part of their Signiory. Some other particular places, yet parts of the Empire, were given unto particular men; as the Dukedom of Arbeni unto one Geffrey of Troy in Champagne, a Frenchman, a valiant Captain, whom they also made Prince of Arbeni; another Dukedom was also given to the Count of Blies; as were divers other Countries and Towns also unto other more private men; who nevertheless were bound to hold the fame of the Emperor, as of their Lord, and to pay him yearly a fourth part of the Revenue arising thereof, towards the maintenance of his State. Yea the Greeks themselves in this shipwreck of their State and Empire, although they did nothing more than the strange Government of the Latines, yet yet they not being persuaded to joyn together in so common a calamity, but after their wonted manner fought every man how to share out something for himself, without regard of the common good; one seized upon one strong Town or City, and so likewise another; which for all that they held not long, driven thence for the most part by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their own Countrymen.

The man whom the discontented Greeks most looked after, was Theodorus Lascaris, the Emperor Alexius Angelus his Son-in-Law; who at the taking of the City, fled to Adrianople, and afterward into Bythynia, where he was of the People, not of that Country only, but of others also farther off, joyfully received and honoured as their Emperor.

So taking into his hands the Countries of Bythynia, Phrygia, Mysia, Ionia, and Lidia, even from the windings of the famous River Mæander Southward, unto the Euxine Sea Northward; he with the general good liking of the People, took upon him the Estate of an Emperor, and so in the renowned City of Nice made the seat of his Empire. At the same time also David, and Alexius Comneni, the Nephews of the Tyrant Andronicus (sometime Emperor of Constantinople) by his Son Manuel, possessing the more Eastern Countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, erected unto themselves another Empire in Trapezond, where their Posterity of the honorable house of the Comneni reigned in great glory many years after, until their Empire, together with the Empire of Constantinople, was by the great Emperor of the Turks, Mahomet the second, subverted and brought to nought; as shall afterward in due time and place be declared. Thus the Greek Empire expoi'd (as it were) to the general Spoil, was no longer one, but many Empires; Baldwin reigning in Constantinople, the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat in Thessaly, Theodorus Lascaris at Nice, Alexius Comnenus in Trapezond, and the Venetians in the Islands, all in Royal Dignity. Besides whom were many other lesser Princes, which had here and there according to their ability seized upon some one or other part of the Empire, and there erected their Toparchies, reigning therein as petty Kings; as did Aldrandinus in Attalia, Michael Angelus in Epirus, with divers others too long to rehearse.

Baldwin (as is aforesaid) created Emperor of Constantinople, by the help of the Venetian Admiral Dandolo, and other great Commanders of the Army in short time brought unto his obedience all the Cities of Thracia, excepting the City of Adrianople, whereunto the better sort of the discontented Greeks, together with Theodorus Lascaris (disclaiming the Government of the Latines) were fled, as unto a most safe Sanctuary; which Baldwin knowing, and wistly desiring whilst yet he had his Friends about him, to set his new Empire in some good stay, without farther delay came and laid hard Siege to the same. Now the Greeks generally evil entreated by the Latines, and grieved to be governed by them, were some of them fled into other their Neighbour Princes Countries, but especially into Bulgaria, otherwise called Misia, a large Kingdom lying betwixt the great Mountain Æmus and Danubius; by whose perswasion, John King of that Country, aided by the Scythians, (a fierce Northern People, but lately come into those quarters) and by the fugitive Greeks themselves, took upon him to relieve the besieged City, and to fight with a great Army approaching the same, first before certain Troops of the Scythian Archers on horseback, to fetch in such booty of Horses or Cattel as they should find near unto the Emperors Camp; and whilst commanded them, that being charged by the Imperials, they should forthwith retire, so to draw them out of their Trenches, into the place where the King with the greatest part of his Army lay covertly to entrap them. Which the Scythians (well acquainted with such service) so well performed under the leading of one Cocuz their General, that having once or twice drawn their Enemies unto some light skirmishes, and so retrying, and ere long again with a greater number returning, they at length cunningly drew the Emperor with all his Army, in hope to do some great matter upon them, even as they wished, into the place where the King with his Army lay in wait among the Woods and Mountains for them; where they, weary and out of breath with the former pursuit, and now on every side beset with fresh Enemies, were overthrown with a great slaughter. In which conflict to increase the loss, Baldwin the Emperor himself was taken and sent Prisoner in bonds to Ternova; where afterwards by the commandment of the barbarous King he was most cruelly put to death, having his Hands and Feet cut off, and so dismembered was cast out into a deep Vally, where he yet lay miserably breathing three days after, and so died; leaving his body as fortunes scorn, for a Prey unto the wild Beasts and Birds of the Air, no Man vouchsafing to bury it. Thus perished this worthy Prince, for his Virtues commended even of the Greeks themselves, being about the age of three and thirty years, and not having reigned yet a full year, in the year of our Lord 1206.

The Victory thus gained, and the City relieved, the barbarous King with his late Soldiers having tasted the wealth of the Latines overthrown in the late Battle, and the pleasures of Thracia now subject to their Lust's greedily pursued their good fortune, without respect of all humanity; the open Country they overran, spoiling whatsoever came to hand, the rich and famous Cities they rifled, and afterward rased them down to the ground; namely Serræ, Philippæ, Apia, Rhodesium, Perinthum, Damium, Aradopolis, Melina, Zurula, and Silyria; the Citizens and Country People fled into the Cities for refuge, they put all to the sword, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition, except some few, whom they carried away with them Prisoners; so that of all the Provinces of that rent and ruined Empire, the Country of Thrace was most miserable, as first spoiled by the Latines, and now laid desolate by the Bulgarians and Scythians. Only some few of the strongest Cities, as Didymotichum and Adramyttum (valiantly defended by the Greeks and Latines) escaped this fury of the Barbarians, all the rest that fell into their hands being laid waste and desolate.

In this so troubled a State of the new erected Empire of the Latines in Constantinople, the Latines made choice of Henry the late Emperor Baldwin's Brother, as of all others the fittest to succeed him in the Empire; who sided by the Marquis, now King of Thessaly, and the other Latin Princes, notably repulsed the Barbarians, and left them not until that at length he had recovered from them all such Towns and Cities as they had before taken, and driven them quite out of the Country, and so well established himself in his new Empire.

But to leave this dismembered Empire, now in the hands of many, and to come nearer to our purpose; Alexius Angelus the Usurper, driven out of the Imperial City by the Latines, to save himself fled into Thessaly, and from thence unto Leo Scurus (then a man of great Fame among the Greeks) who tyrannizing at Nauplius, as had his Father before him, was in these troublesome times grown greater, by surprising of the two famous Cities of Argos and Corinth; by whose means he cunningly entraped Alexius Ducas, surnamed Murza, the Traitor, and for a secret gain not commonly known, put out his Eyes; himself an exiled man, being a most heavy Enemy unto the other also exiled; and himself thrust out of the Empire, a deadly Foe unto the other, oppressed with the like calamity. Shortly after which loss of his Sight he was by chance taken by the Latines, and so brought back to Constantinople, where he was for murdering the young Emperor Alexius, worthily condemned unto a strange and horrible kind of death; for being hung up at high Towers, and tumbling Heels over Head downward, he was with the weight of himself and violence of the Fall, crushed all to pieces, and so miserably died; a death too good for such a Traitor. Not long after it fortune also, that Alexius himself wandering up and down in Thracia, was by the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, going against Scurus, taken and stript of his great Treasure, and whatsoever else he had; and so sent away naked, long time after in beggars Estate wandered about in time after in beggars Estate, now far unlike that Alexius which sometime proudly reigned in Constantinople; but such is the assurance of evil gotten Honour. He hearing that Theodorus Lascaris his Son-in-Law reigned in Asia, and there held the State of an Emperor, rejoiced not thereat as a kind Father-in-Law, but inwardly grieved thereat as an Enemy, sorry that any other but himself should be honoured with the Title of the Greek Emperor; in which malicious humor he falling out of Greece into Asia over the Ægeum, came fiercely unto the Turks Sultan Jahangir his old acquaintance, then lying at Atalnia, (which famous City he had not long before taken from the Christians) unto whom he declared his heavy Estate, and how his Empire had been rent from him, as well by the Greeks as the Latines; requesting, that by his means he might be restored again unto some part thereof, especially that in the lesser Asia, which was by Thanasius Lascaris, together with the honour of the Greek Emperor, unjustly (as he said) deained from him. This Jahangir, now Sultan of Iscion; was the younger Son of Sultan Aladin; who not long surviving his Brother Cai-Chosro, left his Kingdom unto his two Sons Asadun and Jahangir, of the Greeks called Assacines and Jahangir; where long it was not, but that these two Brothers falling out for the Sovereignty, (which admitteth no Equality) the younger Jahangir his Elder Brother driven into Exile, and for the safeguard of his life fled to sit unto this Alexius, then reigning at Constantinople, by whom he

he was honourably entertained, and as some write, converted and baptised. But Assacines the Sultan shortly after dying, this Jahangir returning home again, and renouncing the Christian Religion, was by the Turks received for their Sultan; of whom the Emperor Alexius in like extremity now craved Aid. The Sultan not forgetful of his own Troubles before past, or of the kindness he had received, and moved with the pitiful Complaint of his old Friend, together with his large Offers, besides that he was in hope to share out some good part of whatsoever he got, for himself; took him into his Protection, and forthwith sent Embassadors to Lascaris, threatening unto him all extremities, except he did forthwith give place unto Alexius his Father in Law, unto whom, as unto the Greek Emperor, those Countries which were by him possessed, of right (as he said) appertained. With which unexpected Message Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans Power, and the inclination of the people to their old Emperor. Nevertheless, having propounded the matter in Council, and finding the minds of his Subjects well affected towards him, and a readiness in them in his quarrel to adventure their lives; he encouraged therewith, accompanied only with two thousand choice Horse-men, together with the Sultans Embassador, without farther stay set forward to Philadelphias, the Sultan at the same time with Alexius, (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceive the people withal) and twenty thousand Turks, besieging the City of Antioch, situate upon the winding banks of the River Meander. Which the Emperor Theodorus well understood, and that the Sultan by gaining that strong City (standing upon the passage of the great River, the boulder of his Empire) should open a fair way for himself into the heart of Romania Asiatice, to the great hazard of his whole Empire, resolved with those few he had, to do what he might to relieve his City. And so setting forward upon the Spur, carrying nothing with him more than a little Victual; and now come near unto the City, sent before the Sultans Embassador, following him at the heels. Who coming to the Sultan, and telling him of the Emperors approach with so small a Power, could hardly persuade him that it was so, although he bound it with many Oaths; yet as length persuaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was so, he in all haste put his Army in the best Order he could upon such a sudden; but not to his best advantage, being hindered to do by the straits of the place wherein he lay. Of the two thousand filed Horse-men in the Emperors Army, were eight hundred Italians, all most resolute men, who giving the first charge, broke through the midst of the Sultans Army, disordering his whole barrel as they went; after whom followed also the Greeks, though not with like courage; but those Italian Horse-men now divided from the rest, and in number but few, in coming back again, were by the disordered Turks, some on Horseback, some on Foot, to be set on every side, as that there was no way left for them to pass, but there valiantly fighting, were altogether slain, having both before and at the time of their death made such a slaughter of the Turks, as is hardly to be believed to have been possible for so few men to have made. The Greeks also hardly laid to by the Turks, and discouraged by the laughter of the Latines, were even upon the point to have fled; when as the Sultan, now almost in possession of the Victory, despatching the Greek Emperor, and trusting to his own great Strength, singled him out, being as ready as himself to meet him; when as at the first encounter, the Sultan with his Horse-mans Mace gave him such a blow upon his head, as might have killed a Bull, so that the Emperor, therewith astonished, fell down from his Horse; who yet even in the fall coming something again unto himself, and although dismounted, yet quickly recovering his feet, with his Faulchion hoisted the hinder legs of the Horse whereon the Sultan rid, being a most beautiful Beast, and of a wonderful height; which was now suddenly falling under him, and so the Sultan tumbling down as from an high Tower, before he could recover himself, had his head cut off by the Emperor; which by and by put upon a Lance, and so holden up, with the sight thereof so dismayed the Turks, that stricken with a sudden fear, they presently fled, leaving the Victory unto the Emperor, before more than half overcome, who for all that, considering his small number, durst to further pursue them, but entring the City gave thanks to God for so great a Victory. Unto whom the Turks shortly after sent their Embassadors, and so upon such reasonable conditions as it pleased him to set down, concluded with him a Peace. Alexius himself Author of these Troubles, taken in this battle and carried to Nicos, was by the Emperor his Son in Law, notwithstanding his evil deeds, well intreated and used.

Whilst the Latines thus spend their Forces in subverting of the Greek Empire, which should have been employed for the Relief of the Christians in Syria, and that the Greek Emperor Lascaris was thus troubled with the Turks; the Affairs of the Christians in Syria and the Holy Land grew still worse and worse. Whereof the Knights Hospitallers and Templars (the chief Champions of the Christian Religion in those Countries) greatly blamed Abmonius the King of Cyprus, for that he being so near at hand, and having married Isabella the Heir of that Kingdom, and so in her Right taken upon him the Title of the King of Jerusalem, gave himself wholly to pleasure, doing nothing for the Defence or Relief of the poor distressed Christians, or relieving of the Turks; who although they were yet in League with the Christians there, and at some discord also among themselves, yet spared not as occasion served, still more and more to encroach upon them, and by building of new Castles and Fortresses to cut them short. Of all which things, the aforesaid Knights by their Embassadors certified Pope Innocentius, requesting his fatherly care for the remedy thereof; certifying him withal, that there was yet living one Mary, the Daughter of the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, a Lady of rare beauty, whom they as her Tutors had brought up in hope of the Kingdom, and now were ready to bestow her upon some such man as he should think worthy of her, together with the right she had unto the Kingdom. Hereson Innocentius discharging Abmonius of the Title of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, gave it to John Count de Brenno of Dauphine in France, a man of great fame and valour, then in Arms with the other Latin Princes against the Greeks. Who now re-appointed King of Jerusalem, his Brother and with such Power as he was able to make, setting forward, came first to France, where he was royally entertained; and from thence, failing to Constantinople, was with like Honour received by the Emperor Mury, and so at length the fifth of September arrived at Prolembus in Syria, where he was with the great rejoicing and applause of the people received as their King. And the last of the same month marrying the aforesaid Lady Mary at Tyre, was there together with her with a great Solemnity Crowned King, in the year, 1209. Which Americus the old King of Cyprus hearing, shortly after died for grief. Neither wanted this noble Gentleman, thus honoured with the Title of a Kingdom, some that envied at his Promotion, and therefore commonly called him in derision, a King, but still with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to say, Without a Town.

Now was the ten years Peace, before taken betwixt the Turks and the Christians in Syria, at the coming over of Simon Marqués of Montfort (as is before expressed) almost expired, which had not so much given to those poor remnants of the Christians some time of rest and breathing, as had the discord of the Turks among themselves; which having for the space of nine years continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the Sovereignty, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himself with the Government of Aleppo, and Coradin and Meladin the two Sons of Saphadin, dividing their Father's Kingdom betwixt them, the one taking unto himself Damascus and Syria, and the other the great Kingdom of Egypt, but all Enemies unto the Christians.

About this time also, or not long after, Innocentius tertius yet Pope, summoned a general Council at Lateran, whereunto, besides a multitude of great Bishops, and other reverend Prelates, repaired also the honourable Embassadors of most of the Princes of Christendom; unto whom he assembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous estate of the Christians in Syria, and how the same was by the help of the Christian Princes of the West to be relieved. Whereunto all the Fathers and Princes there assembled easily gave their consent; and thereupon were some appointed in every Country and Province, to publish this Decree, and to stir up the Christians, and to stir up the devout people for the undertaking of so religious a War. The chief Furtherers of this sacred Expedition, to be thus taken in hand against the Infidels, were the Bishops of Germany, especially the three great Bishops of Metz, Cullen, and Trier, whose example moved also many others, all to see rehearse were tedious. Out of France also were sent three Count of St. Vallery, one Gualter the Kings great Chamberlain, with a great number of the gallant Youths of France, and so out of divers other places; so that at length such a number of men were met together at divers Ports of the Adriatick, as made up a Fleet of two hundred Sail; which with a prosperous Wind carried over into Syria, arrived in safety at Ptolemais, the chief City of the Christians, now that Jerusalem was lost. After whom followed also Andrew King of Hungary, long before bound both by his Fathers commandment and his own promise, for the undertaking of that sacred Expedition; with whom came also Lewis Duke of Bavaria, and Leopold Duke of Austria, with their Forces all well appointed; unto whom also John King of Jerusalem joyned himself with his Power. Great hope and expectation there was for some great matter to have been done, now that so great Forces of the Christians were thus met together. Who setting forward from Ptolemais, and the first day marching into Galilee, by the way met with certain Companies of the Turks, whom they easily overthrew and put to flight. The next day they came to the River of Jordan, where they also defeated certain of the Turks Garrisons. The King of Hongary bathing himself in the River, forthwith (as one discharged of his Vow and Promise) returned with all his Power unto Ptolemais, and so from thence back again into his Country, all the rest of the Army of the Christians crying out to him to the contrary; who after the Kings departure still marching on, came to the Mount Thabor. But shortly after, Winter now coming on, and many of their Cattel dying for cold and want of meat, they returned some to Ptolemais, some to Tyre, and there wintered. King John and the Duke of Austria in the mean time took a Castle betwixt Cesarea and Caipha, called The Castle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians throughout all that Winter. Upon the appearance of the Spring, and the Army again met together, it was thought best by all the great Commanders, that for so much as the Kingdom of Egypt was the chief Maintenance of the Mahometan Superstition, against the Christians in those parts, and that so long as it stood upright, they should not be able to do any great matter in Syria, to attempt the Conquest thereof, as an explicit self becoming their Valour, and so great preparation; for that Kingdom being once subdued, the City of Jerusalem, with all the Land of Vallefine, would of themselves without more ado straightway yield unto them. And for as much as the famous City of Damietta, called in ancient time Pelufium, not much inferior unto Alexandria, was the first and most commodious Port for that purpose, as nearest unto Syria; and that by the taking thereof they should have a fair entrance into the great River Nile, with the command of a most rich and pleasant Country about it. They resolved there to begin the War; and thereupon embarking themselves with all things necessary for so great an Enterprize at Ptolemais, and carried with a fair Wind, they in short time arrived at the desired Port. Now that rich and ancient City, the Key of that side of the Kingdom, stood at some mile from the Sea, and somewhat distant also from the great River, environed with a Navigable Ditch or Cut, drawn out of Nile, in manner of an Island, as a man cometh from Syria by Land; and compassed about with three strong Stone Walls, the work of the good Emperor Alius Pertinax, and of him (as some affirm) called also Alisilius. At the mouth of this Cut, as you should enter into the City, stood a strong Watch-Tower, the defence thereof, and round about a number of fair Houses, in manner of a pretty Town entrenched. Besides that, for the more safety thereof, the fame Cut was barred with a great strong iron Chain, in such fort, as that it was not possible for any Ship, without breaking of the fame to enter. The Christians with their Fleet entering the mouth of the River, and coming to this Cut, by great strength brake the Chain, but thinking so to have made their passage unto the City, they found a greater lay at the Watch-Tower, which strongly built of square Stone, and well stored with Warlike Engines of all sorts, and a good Garrison of valiant Souldiers, stayed their further passage, overwhelming them as they approached, with shot, fire, Stones, timber, and such like, before provided for that purpose.

The Christians (after the manner of the fight of that time) had upon certain flat Vessels built certain high Towers of Wood for the affailing of the Watch-Tower; in the approaching whereof, they were not only troubled with the Enemy, but with the tumult and stir of their own people also some, crying that they should yet draw nearer unto the Tower; othersome crying out to fall, to have the Bridge cast down, and the Enemy likewise with much clamour encouraging one another for the repelling of the Christians. So the Souldiers, hindered the Mariners to do their business, and the Mariners the Souldiers. In the midst of this hurly-burly and tumult, one of the wooden Towers, surmounting the rest in height, overcharged with the press of men, fell; and in falling made such a noise, as if Heaven itself had fallen; in a moment (as it were) was presently to be seen a most heavy Spectacle; many overwhelmed with the falling of the Tower, lay there crushed to death; some grievously hurt, and yet not dead, lay oppressed with the timber, crying out for help; others bruised or hurt, but not overwhelmed, for fear of further harm, leapt some into the Nile, some aboard the other Ships near by, some crying out of his Arm, some of his Leg, some of his Head or other part of his body, to the great commixture of the rest, in so much that the Assault was for that time given over.

King John (as well for his Valour, as for the Title of the King of Jerusalem, chosen General of the Army) after he had appeased this tumult, and given the charge of them that were maimed or hurt, unto skillful Surgeons, and buried the bodies of such as were found drowned or overwhelmed; with cheerful Speech encouraged the rest of his Souldiers, persuading them not to be discouraged with the accident of the fall of a Tower, which was neither to be imputed to their Cowardice, or the Valour of the Enemy, but only to the chance of War.

In the mean time Meladin the Egyptian Sultan, had with a great Army encamped himself within the fight of Damietta, thereby to encourage the besieged, and to fill them with hope of relief; sending them by Posters, by the River, News, Messages, Victuals, Souldiers, Armor, and whatsoever else they wanted. The chief cause of his staying there, was to take occasion for the surprising of the Christians, if any should be offered, either by chance, or their own negligence. Every day some skirmish or other passed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, ours still carrying away the Victory; yet could these Barbarians neither be drawn forth to battle, neither could our men keep them from Victuals, for as much as they had the River of Nile at command, whereby Victuals were out of the upper part of Egypt in great abundance conveyed into the Sultans Camp; whereas on the contrary part, the fame River dividing it self into many Arms, in some places here and there overflowing, in another cut into many Ditches and Channels, and in some other pent up by Ways and Causays, gave unto our men a thousand displeasures. And therefore seeing that the Sultan would neither give nor accept of battle, they resolved again to lay siege to the Tower. Wherefore having with great cunning, upon two Ships made fast together, framed a Tower of most strong Timber, equal in height unto the Watch-Tower, they brought the fame near unto the Turks Tower, and the Souldiers adjoining thereto, after which followed also the rest of the Fleet well appointed for the Assault. At which time all the rest of the Army at Land stood in battle ready ranged, as well to discourage them of the Town, as that the Sultan should not be able to help them without the hazarding of battle. There began a fierce and cruel Assault; they of the Suburbs right valiantly defending themselves against their Enemies. Within those Suburbs, the Tower, and the Trenches, dwelt not only Egyptians, (the natural Inhabitants of the Country) but also Arabians, Persians, Syrians, Indians, Moor, and Atiopians, who were there resiant; for that that City was a publick Mart whereunto all kind of Merchandises were brought from far out of the remotest parts of the World, and so from thence in like manner transported; also; which encouraged them the more to fight for the defence of their Lives and Goods, the two things which men hold most dear; and in like sort animated our men unto the Assault, as well in the stead of the Christian Religion, as to enrich themselves with the spoil of those rich Nations. The Christians with their Ships drew as near as possibly they could unto the Land, so the intent that upon the bank of the River they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and so come close unto their Enemies. But the Barbarians on the other side fought by shot and all other means they could, to keep them further off, and so from landing.

That which most feared the Egyptians, was, that as one of our Ships by chance ran aground upon that side of the River where the Enemy lay, and being boarded by the Enemy, thronging in as fast as he could, and there making a cruel slaughter, one of the Christian Souldiers going down under the Hatch, made there a great hole, whereby the water abundantly coming in, sunk the Ship before the Enemy was aware, and so drowned a great number of the Barbarians together with the Christians. At which time also the high Tower built upon the two Ships, joyning now close unto the Watch-Tower, and mating the fame, dismayed the Defendants with the strangeness thereof, as with a Miracle, in such fort, that they stricken with a great fear, as now being to fight with a strange, hardy, and cruel kind of men, without any great resistance forsok the Tower and fled. The Watch-Tower thus taken, and they that should have defended the fame, some slain, and some fled; they in the Suburbs discouraged, and flying away, were many of them wounded from above, out of the Watch-Tower but now gained by the Christians. At which time also the other Ships landed the Souldiers, who entering the Suburbs, put all they found there to the Sword, even unto the last man. There was found great abundance of Victuals, but far greater store of Riches, in so much that it seemed to have been the spoil of Arabia, Persia, and the rich Indies.

Now yet remained the strong Town of Damietta, which was forthwith assaulted by the Christians, more to prove if in that heat and sudden fear it would be yielded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But having done what they could both by scaling, and by other Engines, they gained nothing but hard blows and wounds, and so retired. Nevertheless they lodged themselves in the Suburbs, and laid a great part of the Army betwixt the Sultan and the besieged City, to the intent that no supply of Victuals should be brought unto it; yet both the Enemy oftentimes attempted to have entered the City, and the besieged to have sallied out, but both the one and the other were lerred to do what they would have done, and that not without the great loss of their men; for why, the Town was now on every side so inclosed by the Christians, as that no man could enter in or out thereof. Whilst the Christians thus lay at the Siege, it fortuned that the River of Nile swelling with a great Eastern Wind, rose above the banks, and so overflowed the places wherein the Christians lay, that they could keep nothing dry, and that most part of their Victuals were therewith spoiled. With which unfavourable rising of the River, the Christians not a little troubled, by commandment of Pelagius the Popes Legate, gave themselves to fasting and prayer by the space of three three days. But the Wind falling the fourth day, and the River again decreasing, they gave themselves more earnestly to prayer than before, thanking the Almighty, that as he had put them in a great fear, so he had in mercy again comforted them.

Now with long lying began Victuals to grow scant in the Sultans Camp, so that he was glad to send away half of his Army up again into the Country of Caire. At which time also it chanced (as if it had been in an extremum and common danger of the Mahometan Superstition) that Embassadors sent from Corradin Sultan of Damascus and Jerusalem, unto the Princes of the Christian Army, came to sue for Peace, both for Himself and his Son the Egyptian Sultan; promising in regard thereof again to restore unto them the Holy Cross, and whatsoever else himself, his Father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them; of which their Offer, most part of the Army liked well, saying, That they had therefore taken up Arms for the recovery of that which had been before gotten, and gained by the Valour of the worthy Christian Captains, and had of late been taken from them; and to blot out the Ignominy of the loss thereof, to the end it should not be said, that they could not leave whole and entire unto their Children, what their Fathers had got, when they had the keeping thereof; neither having lost it, be able again to recover it; that all these things being restored, there rested not any further occasion of War, or let to lay them as most victorious Conquerors to return home. Nevertheless Pelagius, Pope Honorius his Legate (for Innocentius in the preparation of the Wars was before dead at Pelagium) with King John, the Masters of the Knights Hospitallers and Templars, the Duke of Austria, and the German, were of opinion to the contrary; alleging, That this Sacred War was undertaken generally against the Infidels, and for Religions sake against the Mahometan Superstition; whereof the Kingdom of Egypt was the chief Seat and stay; and that therefore they ought especially to impugn that. Which persuasion, together with the Authority of the Persuaders, so prevailed, that the Sultans large Offers were rejected, and so the Embassadors dispatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Whereupon Corradin fearing that the Christians would at length come to Jerusalem, as the place they most desired; and doubting how he should be able to defend the same, forthwith raised the Walls thereof, and the more to defend it, overthrew and plucked down most of the goodly Houses, and other stately Buildings therein, sparing yet the Tower of David, and the holy Sepulchre; which he is said to have done at the humble Request and Intercession of the Christians of divers Countries, which yet dwelt there mixt with the Turks and Saracens.

Whilst the Christians thus lay at the Siege of Damietta, the Plague began to rage in the Camp, whereof so many died, that it began to report that the great Commanders of the Army that they had so much hearkened to the persuasion of the Legate (a man making no profession of Arms) rather than to the found Advice of others, who by long experience taught the sudden alteration of matters of War, would willingly have accepted of the Sultans large Offers; so began Pelagius the Legate to be generally evil spoken of. There were now about six months past since the beginning of the Siege, and the Sultan lay in sight had not with him so great an Army as before, but only the flower and choice of his people, having (as we have before said) for want of Victuals sent away the rest up again into the Country; now it fortuned that the Christians, as men weary of the long Siege, stood not so carefully upon their Guard, with Watch and Ward, as before, but gave themselves more to ease; which the Sultan perceiving, drew nearer to the Town, in hope under the covert of the silent night, to find new Supplies unto the besieged; which Companies by him appointed for this Service, courageously set forward, in hope to have deceived the Christian Sentinels, and so indeed came near unto the Town unseen or discovered; and now the foremost of those Companies were already entered the Town; when the Christians perceiving them, and raising an Alarm, put themselves in Arms, and so furiously assailed the hindmost of them, and in such sort, that they which were before within, and those that were but now entered, fearing lest the Enemy in that hurly burly should sell mell enter in with the rest, shut them out of the Gates, exposed to the butchery, where all were presently cut in pieces.

The Christians encouraged with this Victory, the next day leaving a great part of the Army before the Town to continue the Siege, presented themselves before the Sultans Camp to give him battle; who for all that well considering that the loss of a battle might endanger the whole state of his Kingdom, would by no means be drawn out of his Trenches, but lay still; wherewith the Christians, especially the French-men (in the first charge naturally furious) greatly encouraged, attempted to have forcibly entered their Rampiers, but not with success answerable to their courage. For the Egyptians perceiving the small number of their Enemies, nobly regulated them, and in fine enforced them to retire, having lost Quater, one of their chief Commanders, with divers others; yea King John in assailing the Camp, lost many of his men, and grievously burnt in his face, hardly escaping himself with life. After which discomfort, they resolved, not to think of any thing else but of the Siege, and above all things to provide that no Succours should be brought into the Town. They in the City more straitly beset and besieged than before, and now brought unto extremum necessity and famine; and out of all hope of Relief, assembled themselves to consult of their Affairs, and what were best for them to do in so dangerous a state; some one or other of them by night or otherwise secretly flying into the Camp. And that more was, the City had undoubtedly been yielded by the greater part, had not the chief Commanders within mured up the Gates, and commanded that none of the Inhabitants upon pain of death should come upon the Walls or Rampiers, to the intent they should not get out, or cast themselves from above the Walls into the Ditches. The chief Commanders and Captains went here and there up and down the City, to search and view all things, especially the shops and store-houses, where finding small store of Wheat, they divided it in small portions among themselves; the common people enforced with want, eat whatsoever came to hand, were it lawful or unlawful, or forbidden by their Superstition, wholesome or unwholesome, good or bad, salt or fresh, roasted or raw; and so prolonged their lives with such things as they could find. Now the besieged, not able to endure these extremities of the Famine (being the passion that most grievously and often troubleth Mankind) they were also stricken with the Wrath of God; for the Plague (the fury whereof had before attained the Camp of the Christians, and afterward quite ceased) was now got into the City, where it made a great Slaughter; which mortality lity day by day in such sort increased, that men were not only now no more to be found, to visit, comfort, succor, serve and help the Sick; but were wanting also to bury them, to draw them out of their Beds and Houses, and to separate the Living from the Dead; the Streets and Houses full of dead Bodies, gave forth a most horrible stink, which a most grievous and infectious Air; there was not any place clear from the Plague, or any man that could boast he had not been attained therewith, or the fear thereof; and remedy there was none. The rage and fury of these two Devourers, the Famine and Plague, devoured them without number, choosing rather to die, than to submit themselves to their Enemies; or to humble themselves so low, as to crave their Favour. That they within were thus pinched with Famine, the Christians knew; but that the Plague so raged amongst them, they knew not. Now the Christians had of purpose cast up certain Trenches and Baricadoes, for the keeping in of such as the Famine should enforce to come out of the Town; thinking that the besieged, to ease their wants, would thrust the baser sort of the people, unto whom the Christians meant not to give any passage; for they having long before so faithfully environed the City, as that no relief could be brought unto it, lay now still expecting when the besieged, enforced by necessity, should yield themselves; and so without loss of any man, to become Masters of so strong and rich a Town. It was now more than a year that the Christians had thus lain at the Siege of Damietta, when as certain of the Soldiers, who heavily adventured with a few scaling Ladders to mount the Wall; in which doing, finding no resistance, and withal hearing of great silence, as if there had been no body within the City, they stood still a great while hearkening, but seeing that dumb silence fill to continue, they returned unto the Camp, giving the Captains to understand how the matter stood; who at the first thought it to be some policy and fineness of the deceitful Enemy; yet afterward they thought it good to adventure certain men, to prove their fortune, and to cause certain companies well appointed to scale one of the Bulwarks of the City, in such sort, as if they should have gon against a puissant Enemy, that had had the power to resist them. And hereupon were scaling Ladders brought forth, and all things made ready, as for a great Assault. So the Christians courageously mounting the Ladders, without resistance took the Bulwark. But as they were entering farther into the Town, a small Company of the Turks and Barbarians (all the Soldiers that the Fury of the Plague had left, and they also with the Famine and Infection of the Air very weak and feeble) met them, and began to make some small resistance, but to no purpose, being forthwith all cut in pieces. Which done, the matter wherewith the Gates of the City were mured, was presently removed, the Gates opened, and the Christians with signs displayed let in; but even at the very entering in at the Gates, they were attained with a most grievous and horrible stink, they saw a fair City dispeopled, and that which was most fearful to behold, the Streets covered with bodies of the dead and such a dreadful desolation, as might move even the Enemy himself to compassion. The Christians were entered, as men appointed to have done a great execution, and to have made the Channell run with blood; as men justly wroth with the long Siege, and the pains they had endured; they had their Swords and Weapons in their Hands, but found none against whom to use them; for a man could not enter into any House, or go into any Street, but he must pass over the dead, or others, which being not yet altogether dead, were miserably drawing toward their end. Of seventy thousand persons in the City, were not found above three thousand alive, and these for the most part were young Children; for all the rest were dead, taken away either with the Sword, Famine or the Plague; the greatest part whereof lay yet stinking above the ground unburied. These three thousand that were left, were so maigre and poor, that pity it was to behold them; unto whom their lives were granted upon condition that they would make clean the City, and bury the dead, which they were three months in doing.

Thus was Damietta taken by the Christians the fifth day of November, in the year 1212, after it had been more than a year by them besieged. The Spoil there taken was great, for besides the rich Merchandise brought thither from far, was found great store of Gold, Silver, and precious Stones. The Christians thus enriched, and the City made clean, raised there more than a year after, as in a Colony where they had been willing to dwell, forgetful of their own Country. In the beginning of these Wars, the Princes of the Army had with one consent agreed, That whatsoever City or Territory should by them be taken from the Turks or Infidels, should be given unto the King of Jerusalem, whom after the departure of the King of Hungary, they had made General of the whole Army. But now that the City was taken, Pelagius the Legate, pretending, That by the virtue of his Legation, it belonged unto him to dispose of all things taken in that sacred War, (as a man not unmindful of his Master) adjudged the City from thenceforth to belong unto the See of Rome. With which indignity and wrong, the King inwardly discontented, (and yet for the Authority of the Legate, dissembling the matter) withdrew himself, and so retired to Prolemais.

The year following, Pelagius weary to see the Affairs of the Christians to corrupt with rust, and nothing doing, considering the desire and hope he had utterly to have ruined the Infidels, together with their Superstition, commanded, That every man should again take up Arms for the prosecuting of this War against the Sultan, and the besieging of Caire. But for all that, when he had commanded what he would, or could, the Soldiers little regarding his command with one voice cryed out, that they would not be commanded by any, but by the King of Jerusalem only. So that the Legate, enforced by the Soldiers, was glad to send unto the King, to request him again to return to Damietta, and to take upon him the charge for the managing of that War, taken in hand for the defence of the Christian Religion; who for all that excused himself from doing, one while by his own particular Affairs, another while by his own indisposition; yet in fine, pressed and overcome with the prayers and requests of the other Latine Princes, he returned to Damietta, at the self same time, that the Duke of Bevaria arrived there with a goodly company of brave men, brought thither out of his own Country, after he had been now from thence ten months absent.

The Legate desirous of the prosecution of this War, requested and urged the King, with the rest of the Princes and great Commanders, without delay to take the Field, telling them, that the Enterprise of the holy War was grown old, and cold, and that long delay and protracting of the time; and that the which kept Wars so far from home, ought to make halt to force the Enemy, to take all occasions, to lose no time, but ever to be doing; and to prove all things for the annoying of the Enemy; and that that was the way, whereby the Worthies of ancient times, both Kings and Emperors, had gained unto themselves Empire, Glory, Greatness, and Wealth; That it was for them that were invaded and assailed, upon whose lives depended the safety of their Country, their Wives, their Children, and Goods, to delay and prolong the time as they might to delude the Enemy, to frustrate his designs, to defeat his Attempts, and with delays to dally him off, until that having thereby weakened his Forces, he should together with his courage lose also his hope; Caire (he said) to be indeed a great City, but yet the greatest Cities that ever were, had by the Wars become great Defiants, forced by the power of their puissant and speedy Enemies; and that great Empires, as were those of the Sultans, ought not to be invaded or assailed by any foreign force, if they were not at the first onset, overthrown, or at least so weakened, as that they could not afterwards lift up their Heads or recover themselves; for otherwise, that they which had prepared a destruction for others, should fall into the same themselves: That it behooved either not to have attempted or assailed Egypt at all, or else now, after it had been once assailed, not to give it over before it were conquered. The King of Jerusalem, whether it were that he was pricked with the grief, that being called the King of the Holy Land, he could not have the City Damietta (under the leading and conduct won by the Christians come to the sacred War) given unto him by the Legate; or that he had before proved that the higher Country of Egypt was not without great and manifest danger to be attempted; said, that he would not in any case go; alledging that honourable and sacred War to have been taken in hand, only for the recovery of the Holy Land, and not for the winning of Alexandria, Belusius, or Thebes in Egypt; which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their Fidelity, or Allegiance, and could not possibly be kept by force; whereas Syria, by Godfrey Duke of Bulbin and the other great Princes his Associates, entered into, conquered and possessed; and since his time, by divers other Christian Kings and Princes holden, was right their own; and that therefore he greatly commended the forwardness, the diligence, the courage, the desire, and whatsoever thing El Pelagus commended; but that he ought to employ the same in Syria, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawn or expected. Nevertheless the Legate wedded to his own opinion, by the power of his Authority, commanded the King of Jerusalem, the Duke of Barbaria, with the rest of the great Commanders and Captains, to take up their Arms, to get them into the Field upon the Expedition by him appointed against the Sultan; threatening the pain of the high sentence of Excommunication against him or them, that would shew themselves backward or unwilling to do what he had commanded. So as it were enforced by the Legate, they began with evil Will and worse Speed, to set forward in August, in the very hottest time of the year. At which time the Sultan beholding the great Army of the Christians, in number about seventy thousand, retired as a man afraid, into such places as he thought best, farther off; which the Legate seeing (as one not acquainted with the fears of War) rejoiced greatly, as if the Victory had been already more than half gained; commending to the Heavens them that he saw courageously marching forward, saying, That fortune always favours the Valiant, and that unto Cowards all things fall still out to the worst. By the way the Christians seized upon a Bridge, which the Enemy had made over the Nile, and cut in pieces fish Companies as were left for the keeping thereof; so marching on they drew nearer to Caire, and there plain of that great and rich City encompassed where running up and down, the more to terrify them of the City, provoked them to Battle, upbraiding unto them their Laziness, their Cowardice and Sloth, braving them, (if they were men) to come out; Yet for all that they would not so do, but keeping themselves close and covert within the City, let them alone to brag and boast of their own pleasure. This Siege continued long, of purpose protracted till from day to day by them of the City; and the great opinion the Christians had of their own valour, with the small regard they had of their Enemies, made them so proud and careless, that they remembered no more to take good care of the War, of their Duty, their Watch, or their Sentinels; their confidence was in their own Valour and good Fortune, not considering or remembering that they were come into Egypt, and that they had put themselves within the Trenches, Salices, Channels and Cuts of a deceitful River, which not only brought Victuals unto their Enemies, but also fortified them; who by how much they were the less valiant, and less understood of the Art of War, the more they used of Craft and Subtlety for the preserving of themselves; so the crafty Enemies drew the Christians out at length, abusing them with many delays and deccits; making semblance of great fear, to make themselves the less to be feared; and more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the Passages and Straights of the Country, and reserving themselves unto the occasions and advantages both of the time, and of their Enemies, might circumvent them and entrap them at such time as they least feared any such matter. At length, at all adventure had encompassed themselves in a low ground, within the Trenches and Causes of that Fenny Country, under the covert thereof, thinking themselves safe as in their Trenches, against all sudden Salices or Attempts of their Enemies; but these places wherein they lay were soft and dirty, for so much as the Country People used at their pleasure to water them by Channels and Sluices out of the River of Nile; which now plucked up and opened, the River began to rise and overflow all. There were those that perceived themselves thus as in a Grin, without power to defend themselves, or to make any resistance, or by any other means to shew their Valour. So the River fill arising and overflowing gave unto the Turks and Egyptians good hope of their Wars, and of a Victory more desired than had for over a warlike and victorious People. All the ground where the Christians lay encompassed, was covered with Water, so high that their Victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to stand or lie dry in.

Now at the same time the Egyptians had taken the high places, with the passages upon the Walls and Banks in that drowned Country, to the intent that the Christians should not be able to retire or to save themselves out of the Bogs and Marshes covered over with Water. So was their rash Valour and presumptuous Confidence in themselves, exposed unto the Enemies shot and Fury; and when they would by force have defended themselves, their hardiness was overcome by the crafty Subtlety of the weak Enemy. Then began every man to cry out against Pelagus the Legat, accusing, condemning, and railing at him; the King himself they blamed not, for that he had done his duty, in diffusing this expedition, and was contrary to his good liking himself drawn into this War, the charge whereof he had not without great inreasy taken upon him; neither might he with his credit well complain of this misfortune, left in so doing, he might seem to have had no comfort in himself. But as for the Legate, what Counsel could he then take for himself? They of Venice, Pisa, and Genoa, left at Damietta, were indeed strong at Sea, but how could they come to relieve him at Caire? And how, or by what Forces could the Christians break out of the Banks and Sluices of the Cuts and Channels; which winding in and out with a thousand inextricable turnings inclosed them, beset also on every side with the victorious Enemy? After they had been thus cought up, and environed with the Waters three days, you might have seen the poor Soldiers in every place fall down dead for want of Food and Sleep, and so perish in the Water; the like miserable kind of death, the rest were also in short time apt to expect; whether help there was none, but to yield unto necessity, and to accept of such conditions as they should please the proud Enemy to propound. Now the Sultan desired not so much their lives, as the Liberty of his Country; and therefore required to have the City Damietta again restored unto him, and all things else in such sort as were before the besieging thereof; and so the Christians without more ado to depart his Country. Hard Conditions if any man respected the hope which was upon the Christians had undertaken this War, and were to come into Egypt, with the toil there by them endured; but unto him that will but enter into consideration of mens affairs, and especially in Martial matters, it will seem but an accident to be yielded unto, the like whereof hath oftentimes happened unto the greatest men in the World. These Conditions (such as they were) were by the distressed Christians accepted of. But when they were brought to Damietta, for the there propounded to the Christians there left, a great contention began to arise among them; some said they would not accept of them, or surrender the Town, which being kept would be a stay for all the affairs of the Christians in the East, and a most commodious place for them to have recourse unto; but being restored and lost, carried away with it all the hope of the Christians, and therefore all were better to endure all extremities, than to receive such dishonourable and hurtful a peace. Others of the contrary opinion said, That they ought not to forsake them that were in danger before Caire, nor to expose them to the butchery, but to have a Christian compassion of so many thousands of Souls as there lay distressed, seeing they might be saved by the surrender of that one Town; Towns (they said) consisted of the number of men, and not Men of the Inclosures of Walls and Ditches. They that were of this opinion, for the delivering up of the Town, seeing the other obstinately set down to the contrary, withdrawing themselves from the Council, presently took up Arms, and by force entered the Houses of them that were of the contrary opinion, and took from them their Weapons, by that means and perforce to constrain them to yield to their desires. As soon as they that lay before Caire (almost drowned in the Waters) understood of this diffention at Damietta about the delivery of the Town, they sent word, that if they would not yield the Town to the Sultan, they would forthwith send to Ptolemais, which would not fail to do what should be commanded, to have it instead of Damietta surrendered to the Egyptians. So was Damietta again yielded to the Infidels, and so great labours of the Christians taken at the Siege and winning thereof, all lost. That which made this indignity more tolerable, was that Sultan Atladin, having without bloodshed gained for great a Victory, did neither by word or deed any thing in delight or reproach of the Christians, but used them with all courtesie, relieving them also with Victual and such other things as they wanted, and by faithful Guides conducting them in safety out of the Country.

In like manner also, Cosadin his Brother, Sultan of Damascus, made truce with the Latines for eight years. Whereupon the King of Jerusalem went over into Italy, and there by the persuasion of Honorius the Pope, his Wife being now dead, gave his Daughter Tuland (now crowned Queen of Jerusalem in the right of her Mother) in marriage to Frederick King of Sicilia, and Emperor of the Latines, the rather thereby to stir him up for the taking in hand of the sacred War. Ever since which time, he and the Kings of Sicilia his Successors have been called Kings of Jerusalem, albeit that they have ever professed that their pretended Right and Title, as still busied in more prophane Wars against other Christian Princes. King John afterwards departing from Rome for France, was by the way honourably entertained at Pisa; but arriving at the French Court, he found Philip the French King desperately sick, who by his last Will and Testament gave unto the late King the Hospitaliers and Templars, sixty thousand Crowns for the maintenance of his Wars against the Infidels; which Money was to their use afterward paid unto King John. Who shortly to discharge himself of a Vow he had made, to visit the Pilgrimage at Compostelle, going into Spain, by the way married Beregeria, the King of Castile his Daughter; and there staying a great while, returned again into France, where he lay long expecting the setting forward of the Emperor Frederick his Son-in-Law, for the recovery of his Wives Right to the Kingdom of Jerusalem; which although he solemnly vowed at such time as he with all Princely Magnificence married the said Lady at Rome, yet otherwise lured with troubles nearer home, performed not the same, until almost seven years after; at which time the Christians in Syria enjoying the fruit of the late concluded Peace for eight years, lived in great rest and quietness; where so leaving them, until the arising of new troubles, let us in the mean time return again unto the troubled affairs of the Turks, Greeks, and Latines, at Constantinople, and in the lesser Asia.

Henry the Second Emperor of the Latines at Constantinople, after he had (as is aforesaid) with much ado, repressed the Fury of the Bulgarians and Scythians, his barbarous Enemies, and given peace to the miserable Country of Thracia, died, having reigned a most troublesome Reign about the space of eleven years. After whom succeeded Peter, Count of Aulferre, his Son-in-Law, third Emperor of the Latines in Constantinople; who in the beginning of his Empire, willing to gratify the Venetians, and to revenge himself of Theodorus Angelus, a great Prince of Epirus, Competitor of his Empire, bestowed him in Dirrachion; which strong City, the said Theodorus had but a little before surprized, belonging unto the Venetian Seigniority. At which Siege, Peter the Emperor lying, was so cunningly by the willie Greek used, that a Peace was upon most honourable conditions betwixt them concluded, and a familiar kind of Friendship joined. Inasmuch that the Emperor at the request, not well advised, came unto him as his Guest; who now of his Enemy became his

Holt, entertaining him with all the formalities that feigned friendship could devise. But having him now in his power, and fearing no harm regarding neither the Laws of Fidelity or Hospitality, he most traitorously slew him, as he was yet in the midst of his Banquet. Of whose end, some others yet otherwise report, as that he should by the fame Theodorus have been intercepted about the pleasant Woods of Tempe in Thessalia, as he was travelling from Rome to Constantinople, and afterwards to have been by him cruelly put to death. Of whose misfortune, Terminus Governour of Constantinople understanding, for the more safety of the State in that vacancy of the Greek Empire, made peace with Theodorus for five years, and the Turks for two. Shortly after came Robert (the Son of the aforesaid unfortunate Emperor Peter) with his Mother to Constantinople, and there in his Fathers stead was solemnly saluted Emperor; but not with much better luck than was his gravity before him; for shortly after his coming he took to Wife a fair young Lady, the Daughter of a great rich and noble Matron of the City, but before betrothed unto a gallant Gentleman, a Burgundian born; with whom the old Lady broke her promise, and more careful of her Daughters preferment, than fidelity, gave her in marriage unto the new Emperor. The joy of which to great an Honour was in short time converted into most deadly heaviness, but even into death it self; for the young Burgundian, more enraged with the wrong done him than discouraged with the greatness and power of the Emperor, comforted himself with a company of lusty tall Souldiers, acquainted with his purpose, and awaiting his time when the Emperor was absent, by night entered the Court with his desperate Followers, and first meeting with the beautiful young Empress, cut off her Nose and her Ears, and afterward threw her old Mother into the Sea, and so fled out of the City into the Woods and Mountains, with those desperate cut-throats the ministers of his barbarous cruelty. The Emperor pierced to the heart with this so great a disgrace, shortly after went to Rome, to what purpose was not certainly known; but in returning back again through Achaia, he there died, leaving behind him his young Son Baldwin, but a Child, begotten by his first Wife, to succeed him in the Empire; who by the name of Baldwin the Second, was crowned the fifth and last Emperor of the Latines in Constantinople. And for because he was as yet but young and unfit for the Government, he was by the consent of the Nobility affianced, and afterward married unto Martha the younger Daughter of John Brenne King of Jerusalem, worthily old Captain, (but as then Governour of Ravenna, which City, he being certain years before sent for out of France for that purpose, by Honorius the Pope, he notably defended against the Emperor Frederick his Son-in-Law, but that affinity was before broken off by the death of the said Emperors Wife) who now sent for out of Italy unto Constantinople, had committed to his charge and protection, both the Person and Empire of the young Emperor Baldwin, and now his Son-in-Law, which great and heavy charge he for certain years after worthily and faithfully discharged, until such time as that Baldwin was himself grown able to take upon him the government. Now although the Imperial City of Constantinople, with the Countries of Thracia, Thessalia, Macedonia, Achaia, Peloponnesus, and the rest of the Provinces of Greece, were all or for the most part under the Government of Baldwin the Emperor, the Venetians, or other the inferior Latine Princes;

yet were the oppressed Greeks, the natural Inhabitants thereof, in heart so desirous, as abhorring nothing more than that their foreign government; but wholly devoted to their own natural Princes, Theodorus Lascaris and Alexius Comnenus, the one reigning at Nice in Bithynia, the other at Trapezand in Pontus, both called by the Greeks, Emperors, and so of them generally reputed. Lascaris of the two the better beloved, and by far of greatest power, had during the time of his Government fought many an hard battle, (as in part before declared) and strongly fortified his chief Cities against the invasion of his Enemies, as well the Turks as the Latines; and so having as yet erected a new Empire in Asia, and there reigned eighteen years, died, leaving behind him one John Ducas Batatzis, that had married the fair Lady Irene his Daughter and Heir, to succeed him in the Greek Empire in Asia. This John was a man of a great Wit and Spirit, and of his reign in very short time having set all things in good order, greatly augmented his Legions, and shooting at a fairer mark than the Empire he held, even the Imperial City it self, and the recovery of all Thracia and Grecia out of the hands of the Eatinies, which could not be done without a Fleet at Sea, built a great number of Gallies in the Ports of the lesser Asia. And so having rigged up and manned a strong Fleet, and scouring the Seas, in one Summer he made the Islands of the Ægeum, namely Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Icaria, Cos, with the famous Island of the Rhodes, and many others also. And not so contented, to have increased his Empire, the next Spring crossing the Hellefpos, and landing his Forces, first invaded Chersonesus; and afterward to terrify the Latines, forgoing the Country far and near, even to the Gates of Constantinople, no man daring to oppose himself against him. At which time also he took many Cities and strong Towns along the Sea-coast, as Callipolis, Sebastia, and Cardia, with divers others thereabout, some by force, some by composition, the Greeks almost in every place yielding themselves, where they were not so oppressed by the Latines, as that they could not help him. Now by these proceedings of the Greek Emperor in Europe, was plainly to be seen again the ruine of the Greek Empire in the East, all things prospering in his hand according to his hearty desire. Asslan the Bulgarian King (no small terror both unto the Latines and the Greeks) moved with the fame hereof, by his Embassadors sent of purpose unto John the Greek Emperor, offered his Daughter Helen in marriage with young Theodore his Son; of which offer the Emperor gladly accepted. For being bidden in his great Affairs, he was loath to have so great a King was Asslan, his Enemy, able at his pleasure to call in the Scythians; who with their multitude, as a great flood breaking over the Banks, had oftentimes carried away whole Countries before them. Wherefore the match agreed upon, the two great Princes by appointment met together about Chersonesus, where Helen King Asslan's Daughter, being then about ten years old, was with great Joy and Triumph solemnly married unto young Theodore the Emperors Son, much of the same age. long after, Embassadors were also sent unto the Emperor from the Sultan of Iconium, to confirm and prolong the League betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to have driven the Turks out of Perfia and the far Eastern-Countries, began now also to cut them short in their Provinces in the lesser Asia. Wherefore the Sultan of Iconium, fearing lest whiles he had his hands full of those his most dreadful Enemies, of themselves too strong for him, he should behind be set upon by the Greek Emperor, and so thrust out of all; sent these his Embassadors unto him for Peace; which he for many causes easily granted. First, for that he foresaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintain a War at once both in Asia against the Turks, and in Europe against the Latines; then by this War-like Nation, as by a most sure Bulwark, to keep his own Countries safe from the Invasion of the barbarous Tartars, unto whose fury he should himself lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both sufficient Reasons for the Emperor to yield unto the Sultan, which he did; so was the Peace concluded, and the Embassadors dispatched. This Peace exceedingly comforted, and afterwards enriched the Emperors Countries; for now the people generally delivered of the fear and misery of continual War, began on all hands to fall to their fruitful Labours of Peace. Yea the Emperor himself, to the stirring up of others to the like good Husbandry, caused so much Land to be ploughed up for Corn, and so many Vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully suffice his own house, and such poor as he daily relieved; with a great overflow, which he caused to be carefully laid up in store; he kept also great Herds of Cattel, Flocks of Sheep, and Fowls of all sorts without number. The like he caused his Kinsmen and other of the Nobility to do, to the intent that every great Man having sufficient for his own spending at home, should not take any thing from the poor Country men, that so every man contenting himself with his own, might live in peace without the grievance of others. By which means in a few years every Barn and Granary was full of Corn, every Cellar full of Wines, every Stable full of Cattel, every Store-house full of Victuals; the Fields were covered with Corn and Cattel, and in every mans Yard were to be seen all kinds of tame Fowls, without number. About which time also there fortun'd a great Famine among the Turks, inasmuch as that they were enforced to fetch their greatest Relief from out of the Christian Countries. Thus might you have seen every way full of Turks, Men, Women, and Children, travelling to and fro into the Emperors Countries for Victuals; their Gold, their Silver, their other rich Commodities, they gave unto the Christians for Food; a little Corn was worth a good Commodity, every Bird, Sheep, and Kid, was sold at a great rate; by which means the Country-mens houses were full of the Turks wealth, and the Emperors coffers stored with their Treasure. The greatness of the profit arising of this plenty of the Christians, and penury of the Turks, may hereby easily be gathered, for that of Eggs daily sold, so much Money was in short time gathered, as made the Emperors an Imperial Crown of Gold, richly set with most orient Pearl and precious Stones of great price; which the Emperor called Ovata, for that it was bought with Egg-money. Thus flourish'd the Greek Empire in the lesser Asia, under the good Emperor John Ducas; the Turks at the same time declining as fast, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and consumed with Famine at home.

Frederick the German Emperor had of long time vowed to take upon him an Expedition into the Holy Land; for performance whereof he was hardly called upon, first by Honorius quartus the Pope, and afterward for his long delay communicated by Gregory the Ninth; not so much for the sake of the Holy Land, as to be much for the sake of the Emperor at war in Wars abroad, which he in the mean time, to increase their own power, drew from him some one part or other of his Empire; which he not without cause fearing, from day to day, and year to year, delayed the performance of his Vow, so much urged by the Pope; by his Prefence and Power fill disappointing all the fly designs of the Popes, conceived or put in practice against him. But now at length moved, or more truly to say, incited with the Thundering and Lightning of force Gregory, he resolved to set forward, in the year, 1227. About which time, Salerno, or Island his Wife, the King of Jerusalem his Daughter, died in Child-bed, being before delivered of a fair Son. Now were met together at Brundisium an exceeding great number of courageous and devout Souldiers out of all parts of Christendom, especially out of Germany, under the Leading of Ludwick Landgrave of Thuring, and Syphrid Bishop of Angoula; all stirred up with the fame of so notable an Expedition. But whilst they there stayed somewhat long, the Plague arose among the Germans, whereof in short time after, both the Landgrave and the Bishop died, with many of the other best Souldiers. The Emperor himself was upon his way as far Malice, upon the further side of Peloponnesus, where falling despitefully of a Burning-Fever, and put back with contrary Winds, he returned again to Brundisium, and there stayed a great while after. Then began the Pope again to fret and fume, and to call out his Excommunications against the Emperor, as if it had been Thunder and Lightning, accusing him of Perjury, Infidelity, and many other grievous Crimes; of all which the Emperor was ready to have cleared himself in an open Assembly of the Princes of Germany to have been holden at Ravenna, had it not been by the Pope and the Troubles of Lombardy disturbed. Nevertheless, he by open Prorestitutions and Writings, fully answered all the Popes unjust Accusations, wherewith he had been so, hardly charged; and yet desirous to perform the Expedition by him taken in hand, having set all things in good Order, and put himself again in a readines, he set forward from Brundisium in August, in the year, 1228, leaving the Charge of his Territories in Italy under the care of Reynold Duke of Spoleto. The Pope displeased, for that the Emperor at his departure had neither reconciled himself, nor taken his leave of him, and deeming therein his Excommunications and Fulminations to be contented and for at naught, fell into such a rage and cholera, that he forbade all the Christian Forces that were in Syria, to follow him, or to yield to him their Obedience; and wrote Letters also unto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the Emperor, or to yield unto him any part of the Holy Land, which Letters the Sultan afterwards sent unto the Emperor. Neither yet so contented, immediately after his departure, ran upon his Kingdom of Naples, and so filled all Italy with Troubles. Nevertheless the Emperor happily arriving at Prolemais, was there honourably received of the Assa, under the good standing the Pope Urban and Carlings. Of whose arrival Sultan Melekin having Intelligence, and loth to draw so mighty an Enemy as was the Emperor, upon him, by his Embassadors offered him him most honourable Conditions of Peace; which before he would accept of; he by convenient Messengers sent unto the Pope, to have his consent and approbation. But such was his rage, as that he would not suffer the Messengers to come into his presence, or vouchsafe to read the Emperors Letters, being brought unto him, but like a mad man presently rent them in pieces. All which Indignities the Emperor nevertheless took in good part, and concluded a Peace with the Turks for ten years, upon these conditions: First, That he should be anointed and accounted King of Jerusalem; then, That the holy City, with all the Land of Palestine should be delivered unto him; thirdly, That he might at his pleasure fortify the Cities of Nazareth and Joppa; fourthly, That all such places as were sometime in the Power of Baldwin the fourth King of Jerusalem, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, should be restored; and last of all, That all Prisoners on both sides should be set at liberty without Ransom. So the Peace concluded, the Emperor with his Army came to the desolate City of Jerusalem, and there upon Easter-day with great Solemnity was Crowned King thereof, in the year, 1229. And to having repaired the Walls of the City, with certain Churches, fortified Nazareth and Joppa, and furnished them with strong Garrisons, and appointed Reynald Duke of Bavaria, his Lieutenant in Syria, he with two Gallies only returned into Italy. Ever since which time the Kings of Sicily have been also called Kings of Jerusalem, and have oftentimes borne the Arms of both Kingdoms.

Frederick the Emperor crowned King of Jerusalem.

1230. The unfortunate Expedition of the King of Navarre into the Holy Land.

The next year Pope Gregory, in despite of the Emperor Frederick, more than for any Zeal to the Christian Religion, did by the Dominicans and Franciscans (two Orders of Friars but then lately erected) as by his Trumpeters, stir up a wonderful number of zealous and devout Christians, almost in every part of Christendom, to take upon them the Cross (as they termed it) the cognizance of such as had by Vow bound themselves to take up Arms against the Turks and Sarafins, for the Recovery or Defence of the Holy Land. These devout men met together in great number, under the leading of Theobald King of Navarre, Amiceus, Count of Montfort, Henry Count of Champagne, and others too long to rehearse, (of purpose stirred up to trouble the Peace before concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Turks in Syria) set forward, and after long travel passing the Strait of Bosphorus, not far from Constantinople into Bithynia, came to the River Sangarins, and there stayed a while to refresh themselves. Afterwards passing through Galatia, and so from Country to Country through the lesser Asia, they came at length unto the Straits of the Mountain Anconus (a part of the Mountain Taurus) which they found before taken by the Turks; and the Sultan of Iconium himself not far off accompanied with a strong Army. Nevertheless the valiant Count of Montfort, which had the leading of the Vanguard, courageously marching forward, by plain force opened the passage of the Mountain, having slain or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof; the King of Navarre in the mean time (though in vain) assailing the Sultan in his Camp, who fearing the great Power of the Christians, kept himself within his own strength, and would not fight. Wherefore the King being it to no purpose there longer to stay, dividing his Army into three parts, left the Sultan, and followed after the Count, placing his Baggage in the middle, and the best of his Soldiers in the rearward. But whilst they thus march up the great Mountain, the Turks better acquainted with these passages, were still at hand, assailing them sometime behind, sometime on the one side, sometime on the other, as they saw occasion; and at length taking them at an advantage in a great Plain, set upon them, now before almost spent with hunger and travel, and there slew of them an exceeding great number. But by the coming on of the night the battle was broken off, and the Christians repairing unto their Ensigns, passed the Straits, and so at length arrived at Amis, having lost by the way the greatest part of the Army with all their Wealth, their Victuals, and most part of their Horses; the remnant yet left, having a little refreshed themselves, were by Sea transported to Ptolemais; from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to Gaza, where they lay, and of the spoil of the Country greatly enriched themselves. As for any other great matters they were not able of themselves to take in hand; and help of such Forces as the Emperor had before left at Jerusalem, and other places, they could have none; having express charge from the Emperor himself, not to do any thing against the Enemy, tending to the breach of the ten years League; which the Turks well perceiving, and that they had to do but with these new come Guests, and some few others their partakers; having gathered together their Forces, lay in ambush for them in every corner, to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that these of Gaza going far into the Country, and returning laden with spoil, were set upon by the Turks; whom they casting away the spoil they had before taken, violently repulsed and put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a far greater number of Turks than before; which now putting on, charged the Christians, who all that night stood watching in their camp, and for yoked with them a most cruel battle; wherein the Christians shewed so much valour as was possible for men to do; but wearied with the long fight, and oppressed with the multitudes of their Enemies, they were overcome and slain almost every Mothers Son. Amongst the rest, the two Counts, Amiceus and Henry fell; the King of Navarre himself hardly escaped by the exceeding swiftness of his Horse, and by uncertain ways wandering up and down the Country, not knowing well which way to take, after two days came by good fortune to Joppa; some few others escaped by flight to Ptolemais, the heavy Messengers of the misfortune of their Fellows. The King afterwards visiting the holy places at Jerusalem, returned home into his Country, with some few of his Followers, having performed nothing of that the World expected.

About four years after, Reynald Duke of Bavaria, whom Frederick the Emperor had left his Lieutenant in Jerusalem, died; having by the space of five years peaceably governed that bruised Kingdom. After whose death, the Templars (who, he yet living, would oftentimes have broken the League, but that they were by his wisdom restrained) now took occasion to stir up the people to take Arms against the Turks, and of our respect unto the League yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to ensue. Whereof the Egyptian Sultan hearing, raised a great Army, sending also for the Chorgins, a War-like Nation then lying near unto Babylon, to come unto his Aid. Thus become very strong, he first laid siege to Gaza, but a little before repaired and fortified by the King of Navarre and the Templars, which he at length took by force, and put to Sword all that were therein, as well the Citizens, 1234. Jerusalem taken and retaken by the Turks.

Citizens, as the Garrison Soldiers; in like manner he dealt also with them of Afulon and other places as he went. To repress this his fury, the Templars and Hospitallars had assembled the whole strength of that weak Kingdom, and near unto Tyberias came to have given him battle. Who upon their approach hastily retired, as if he had for fear shunned battle. But whilst the Christians as Victors the night following lay negligently incamped along the River side, he returning back again with his Army, came upon them before they were well aware, half-sleeping, half-waking, but altogether unarmed, with a most horrible Out-cry. The Christians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the suddenness of the matter, hastily and disorderly (as must needs be in great confusion) took up their Weapons, such as came first to hand, and so courageously opposed themselves against their Enemies. There was fought a most terrible and doubtful battle, and that also for a long space the Christians still encouraging one another to do their last devoir; but the Turks still keeping their Order against the disordered Christians, and far more also than they in number, prevailed, and there overthrew them with a great slaughter, but not without the loss of many thousands also of their own men, which there lay dead upon the ground. Most part of the best Commanders, both of the Templars and Hospitallars were there slain, such as escaped fled to Tyre.

The Sultan incouraged by great a Victory, marched forthwith to Jerusalem, which he took without resistance, and there put to Sword all that he found therein, Men, Women, and Children, without respect of Sex or Age; and afterwards having razed the same, rased it down to the ground, burning the Buildings, and overthrowing the Walls, not long before repaired by the Emperor Frederick, and much beautified by Lieutenant Reynald. And carried with an infernal fury, defaced and most shamefully polluted the Sepulchre of our blessed Saviour, never before then violated or defiled, but of all Nations untouched and revered; which for all that may seem to have been done not so much for the hatred unto the Christian Religion, as for that it was the place of all others most desired of the Christians; and for the gaining whereof they had undertaken so many hard Adventures, and so much troubled the Sarafins and Turks.

Thus by the unfaithful breaking of the League, the most ancient and famous City of Jerusalem, sometime the universal Seat of the most High, and glory of the World, fell again into the Power of the Turks and Infidels. In the year, 1234. in whose hands it hath ever since remained even until this day; now a poor ruinous City governed by one of the Turks Sackzaks, and for nothing now more famous, than for the Sepulchre of our blessed Saviour, again repaired and most visited by the devout Christians, and not unreverenced by the Turks themselves.

The loss of this so famous a City, together with the dangerous State of the Christians in Syria, West, especially Frederick the Emperor, by whom it had been but a few years before gained. Howbeit he could not now remedy the matter according to his desire, being himself grievously entangled with the endless Troubles which Pope Gregory had as it were by tradition left unto the other Popes his Successors, for the troubling of his State, until at length he had deprived him of his Empire, and not long after of his life also. Amongst other the great Princes, careful for the poor Christians in Syria, was Lewis the Ninth, the French King, a Prince of great Power, but of all others that of more profit famous for his Zeal unto the Christian Religion, and for his devout manner of life; who abounding in wealth, and all things else of a great Prince to be desired, and withall oftentimes considering the notable Expeditions many Christian Princes had (to their Immortal Glory) made, some into Syria, some into Egypt, against the Enemies of Christ, and for the Relief of the oppressed Christians, felt the like. But in these his devout motions, before he could resolve unto to great an Enterprize, he fell dangerously sick, inasmuch that for certain days he lay speechless, devoid of sense and motion, without any sign of life, but that he did a little faintly breathe; when coming a little unto himself (which moved by devotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weak brain, is uncertain) the first thing he asked for was the Cross (the Cognizance of such as vowed themselves unto the Sacred War) which he solemnly received at the hands of the Bishop of Paris. At which time also his three Brethren, Alphonse Count of Poitiers, Charles Count of Anjou, and Robert Count of Artois, with Hugh Duke of Burgundy, William Earl of Flanders, Hugh Count of Saint Paul, and afterwards most of the Nobility of France, to accompany the King, took upon them the same charge. Nevertheless it was not by and by taken in hand, but some few years lay past in the consultation and preparation for so great an Enterprize; many in the mean time discharging their Vows, by dying before at home in peace in their own Countries. At length the devout King still resolute in his former determination, having taken order with Blanch his Mother for his affairs at home, and put all things in readiness for his Journey, came to Limas to take his leave of Pope Innocent, the Fourth, who for fear of the Emperor Frederick, then lay there for his more safety) and from thence to Marpessus; where imbarquing himself with his Army the five and twentieth day of August, in the year, 1248. he the twentieth day of September following arrived in safety in the Island of Cyprus, and was there royally entertained by Guy Lusignan then King of that Country.

Now was the French King desirous to have gone directly for Egypt, without longer stay in Cyprus, had he not been otherwise persuaded, both for that his whole Fleet was not yet come, and the time of the year began to grow unreasonable, and the Weather tempestuous. But whilst he there stayed, passing the Winter, the League (one of the ready Attendants of great Armies) began to arise in the Camp, which daily increasing, had in short time taken away the great number of men, and those not of the meanest sort. Amongst whom were Robert Bishop of Beauvais, John Count of Montfort, the Counts of Vendôme and Dreux, Archibald Lord of Barbon, with divers other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of 240. so that by force of the infectious Contagion, the King was constrained to divide his Army into divers places of the Island, attending until the Infection should cease. In the mean time the Templars having in support both the French and the Turks, (the Turks, for fear they should overrun all; the French, left having gotten the Victory, they should take all into their own hands, and so diminish their Power and Authority wherewith they tyrannized over the other poor Christians) sent Embassadors secretly unto Melchun Sultan of Egypt, to persuade him to come to some good

King Lewis first forward toward the Holy Land.

About the same time also sickness daily increasing in the French Camp, the King purposing to march forward to Caire, sent a great number of Sick and Weak People down the River of Nilus to Damietta; of whose going the Sultan understanding, caused a great number of small Boats to be carried in Carts by Land unto the River side, which well manned, and meeting them by the way, fer upon them, and burnt or drowned them every Mothers Son, saving only one Englishman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in five places of his body, escaped yet into the French Camp, reporting there what had happened unto this sort.

Now had the Sultan also got intelligence of the compact betwixt the Governour of Caire and the King, for the betraying of the City; and thereupon had caused him to be suddenly apprehended and put in safe keeping, until he were at better leisure to understand farther of the matter: which no less troubled the French King, than did the former misfortune; all his hope for the yielding up of the City, being thereby cut off. Thus his hopes together with his strength daily decreasing, he would have gladly accepted of the Conditions which he before refused, which the Sultan, now grown very strong, would by no means hear of, but in stead thereof, by way of derision, sent to know of him, what was become of all his Mattocks, Forks, Rakes, Sythes, Plows, and Harrows, which he had brought over with him; and why he set them not to work, but left them like an evil husband to rot and rust beside him. All which, with much more, the good King was glad to put up; for now his Forces greatly diminished, as well by sickness, as by the former losses, finding himself far too weak, he would fain have retired back again to Damietta; which the Sultan foreseeing, got to betwixt him and home, that now there was no remedy, but either to fight it out, or yield. The King himself had been often before incensed by his Nobility, whilst the River was yet unimpeded by the Enemy, to have conveyed himself by Water to Damietta, for that in the safety of his Person consisted (as they said) the safety of his Kingdom, whatsoever became of him; whereunto he could never be persuaded, saying, that he would never forsake his People, because he would not be forsaken of them; but was resolved to endure with them whatsoever it should please God to lay upon him; so passing the River by the same Force, where by his Brother had not long before unfortunately passed, and coming to the place where the Battle was fought, he might see the dead bodies of the Christians pitifully mangled, with their Heads and Hands cut off; for the Sultan, the more to encourage his Soldiers, had before the Battle proclaimed, that whosoever should bring him the Head or Hand of a Christian, should have a great reward for his labour; in hope whereof, they had so discombed them. But long he had not there staid, but that the Sultan began suddenly to appear, with a most huge great Army, as if he would even with the fight thereof have discouraged the Christians; against whom for all that, the Frenchmen in good order opposed themselves, and for the space of three hours made great resistance; but what could one do against ten, and he also fainting for sickness and food? the hard plight wherein the greatest part of the French army then was. In conclusion, oppressed with the multitude of their Enemies, and no way left to fly, they were all overthrown and slain, except some few, saved in hope of great ranfome. The King himself, with his two Brethren, Alphonfus and Charles, and some few others, were taken prisoners, and brought unto the Sultan; who demanding of him what he would move him to make War against him? was answered by the King, that it was for Religion, and the defence of the name of his God. In this unfortunate Battle, fought the fifth of April, in the year 1250, besides the Common Soldiers, were slain most of the Nobility of France, and all their Tents taken.

The Sultan presently upon this overthrow, sent of his own Soldiers the like number that the French were of, with French Ensigns, and disguised in the Attire of the slain Frenchmen, to Damietta, where the Duke of Burgundy, the French Queen, and the Popes Legates lay; in hope to have been so let in for Frenchmen; but they were not so well masked, but that they were by them of the City discovered for Enemies, and so kept out and deceived of their purpose.

The Christians thus overthrown, and the French King taken Prisoner, Melch-jala the Sultan taking compassion upon him, and yet minding of his life to make his own gain; cheering him up with comfortable speeches, began to talk with him of his deliverance, and of a good agreement to be made betwixt them. The Conditions whereof were propounded by the Sultan were, That the King should forthwith deliver again unto him the City of Damietta, and moreover pay unto him for the ransom of himself and his, and for the charges of the War, eight thousand pound of Gold; That all Prisoners should on both sides be frankly let at liberty, and for a Peace to be taken for ten years. For the more assurance whereof, the Sultan offered to swear; That if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce his Mother; requiring also of the King to swear, If he failed in any thing that he had promised, to deny his Christ to be God; which prophane Oath the King detested, wishing rather to die than to give the same; the Sultan wondering at his constancy, took his word without any Oath at all, and so published the League. But whilst they were coming together to Damietta, Melch-jala now in the pride of this Victory, fearing nothing less than the sudden change of Fortune, or the mischief hanging over his head, was in the presence of a number of his Noblemen suddenly slain by two desperate Mamelukes; and one Turquinus a sturdy Slave of their own order and vocation (by whose procurement it was supposed to have been done) by the consent of the whole Army, created Sultan in his stead; who revoking the League before concluded by Melch-jala, made another in his own name with the King, much upon the same Conditions that the other was; which after he had received Damietta, he caused openly to be proclaimed. Nevertheless after that King Lewis had paid his ransom, and was with the remnant of his Army by the Genowais transported from Damietta to Ptolemais, the false mercenary performer, not the half of that he had promised, of twelve thousand Christian Captives that should have been set free, scarce enlarging four thousand; and killing all the sick Soldiers whom by his promise he ought to have relieved, neither suffering any Christian to carry any of his goods with him out of Egypt, which by the League he ought to have done also.

The French King coming to Ptolemais, and purposing to have returned home, was intercepted by the Master of the Templars and Hospitallers, and other the Nobility of the Christians, to stay, which he did almost by the space of four years; in which time he repaired the Cities of Cafarea and Toppa, and fortified many strong places for the Defence of the Christians against the Infidels; and so commending the protection thereof unto the Knights of the sacred War, and sending his Brethren away before him, followed after himself, greatly lamented for by all the Christians in Syria, and so arrived in France the sixth year from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and unfortunate expedition of Lewis the French King, wherein as some write, were eighty thousand Christians lost: Howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating this loss, loss, report, of two and thirty thousand French, six thousand to have returned again into France. The City of Damietta in the space of a few years twice won, and twice lost by the Christians, was shortly after the delivering up thereof, by the Sultan raised down to the ground, because it should no more serve the Christians for an entrance into his Kingdom.

The late Egyptian Sultans thus oftentimes invaded by the Christian Princes, and reposing no great assurance in the Power of the effeminate Egyptians, a People fitter for Merchandize and other base occupations than for Chivalry and War, had for the strengthening of their Kingdom, bought an infinite number of Slaves, especially of the poor and hardy Circassians, called in ancient time Gata and Zimbi, near unto Colchis and the Euxine Sea, brought unto Alexandria and other Ports of Egypt out of those bare cold Countries, by Merchants, and from thence transported to Caire and other Cities of Egypt; of which poor Slaves, the late Egyptian Sultans taking their choice, and culling out from the rest such as were like to be of the greatest Spirit and Ability of Body, delivered them unto most skilful and expert Teachers; by whom they were carefully taught to run, to leap, to vault, to floor, to ride, with all other feats of activity, and widal cunningly to handle all manner of Weapons, as well on horseback as on foot, and so instructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their Schools into pay, and inrolled together as the Sultans choice Horsemen, were commonly by the name of Mamelukes. In whose good service the late Sultans finding great use, feared for no cost, both for their maintenance and increasing of their number; daily erecting new Nurseries stored with the young Fry, which growing up and ready, was fill journey to the other. It is wonderful to tell, unto what a Strength and Glory this order of the Mamelukes was in short time grown, by the care of the Egyptian Kings; by them they managed their greatest affairs, specially in time of Wars; and by their Valour, not only defended their Country, but gained many a fair Victory against their Enemies, as they did now against the French; but as too much power in such mens hands, seldom or never wanteth danger, so fell it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melch-jala, and those Mameluk Mameluke Slaves; who proud of their Preference, and forgetful of their duty, and seeing the greatest Strength of the Kingdom in their Hands, traitorously slew Melch-jala their chief Founder, setting up in his place (as aforesaid) one Turquinus, a base Slave, one of their own order and servile vocation, but indeed otherwise a man of a great Spirit and Valour. This Melch-jala murdered by the Mamelukes, was the last of the freeborn Kings of Egypt; in whom the Turks Kingdom in Egypt, erected by Saracum and the great Sultan Saladin (as is before said) and in his Stock and Family ever since continued, took end, as did also all the power of the Turks in that great and rich Kingdom. For the proud Mamelukes having now got the Sovereignty into their Hands, and exalted a Sultan out of themselves, imperiously commanded as great Lords over the rest of the People, not suffering them to have the use either of Horse or Armour, or to bear any way in the Common-Weal; but keeping them under with most heavy impositions, and fill preferring their own Slave (wherever the Country of Egypt now swarmed) made the natural Country People, of all others most miserable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than Merchandize, their Husbandry, or other their base Mechanical Occupations; whereof the greatest profit still came unto the Mamelukes, who as Lords of all, with great infolency, at their pleasure took it from them as their own. As for the great Sultan, they still chose him from among themselves, not suffering any the Sultans Children to succeed their Fathers in the Kingdom; for fear lest they in process of time, proud of their Ancestors and Parentage, should reckon of them as their Slaves (as indeed they were) and so at length bring in another more free kind of Government.

Against which they provided also, not only by this restraint of their Sultans Children, but of their own also; taking order and establishing it as an immutable Law, That though the Sons of the Mamelukes might inherit their Fathers Lands and Wealth after their death, yet that it should not be lawful for them in any case to take upon them the name or honour of a Mameluke; so debarring them from all government in the Common-Wealth, to the intent it might still rest with the Mamelukes. Neither was it lawful for any born of Mahometan Parents (which could not be Slaves) or of the race of the Jews, to be admitted into that order; but only such as being born Christians and become Slaves, had from the birth their Captivity been instructed in the Mahometan Superstition; or else being men grown, and coming thither, had abjured the Christian Religion (as many Reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right strange it is to consider, unto what Honour and Glory this slavish Empire in short time grew; many of these poor Slaves by rare Fortune or secret divine Power, exalted out of the dust unto the highest degree of Honour, proving most excellent and renowned Princes, of such strength and power, as was dreadful even unto the greatest Princes of the World. In which great glory, this servile Empire (to the Worlds wonder) flourished from this time amongst the greatest by the space of 267 years; until that having run the appointed race, it was with a great destruction by Selimus the victorious Emperor of the Turks, overthrown in the year 1517, and the Kingdom of Egypt, with all Syria and the Land of Palestine, brought into the form of Provinces, united unto the Turks Empire, as they are at this day, and as in the course of this History shall in due time and place (God willing) at large appear.

But leaving the Kingdom of the Turks thus overthrown in Egypt, and the Mamelukes there triumphing, the French King returned into France, and the Christians in peace into Syria; let us again return into the lesser Asia, and to the Imperial City of Constantinople, whither the affairs both of the Turks and of the Christians now call us. All this while the Greek Empire (for so the Greeks will have it called) flourished both in peace and plenty in the lesser Asia, under their Emperor John Batatzes; the power of the Latines in the mean time declining as fast as at Constantinople, under the Government of the Latine Emperor Baldwin the Second. As for the Turks whom we left grievously troubled both with Famine and the often incursions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet also, enough and more than enough to do to withstand the same Enemy. At length it fortuned that John Duas the Greek Emperor died, being at the time of his death about threescore years of age, and he had happily reigned three and thirty; by whose good and discreet Government, the Greek Empire before brought low and almost to nought by the Latines, began again to gather strength and to flourish both in Asia and some little part of Europe also. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpose I could willingly pass over, were I not by the worthy remembrance of one of them flaid a while by the way.

This noble and famous Emperor having long lamented the death of the fair Empress Irene his first Wife, at last married another young Lady, the Sister of Married King of Sicily, called Marcella, with whom amongst other honourable and beautiful Dames, sent by the King her Brother for the accompanying of her to Constantinople, was one Marcellina, a rare Paragon, of such a Feature as if Nature had in her meant to bestow her greatest skill: From whose Mouth always flowed a fountain of most figured Words, and out of her Eyes issued (as it were) Nets to tangle the Amorous in. Upon this fair an object, the Emperor not fearing further harm, took pleasure oftentimes to feed his Eyes, until that at length caught with her Looks, he had lost his liberty, and was of a great Emperor become her thrall, in such sort, as that in comparison of her he seemed little or nothing to regard the young Empress his Wife; but so far doated upon her, that he suffered her to be attired and honoured with the same Attire and Honour that the Empress was her self; whom the now so far exceeded both in Grace and Favour with the Emperor, and Honour of the People, as that the almost alone enjoyed the same without regard of her unto whom it was of more right due. Whilst the thus alone triumphed, at length it fortune that he in all her glory, attended upon with most of the Gallants of the Court, and some of the Emperors Guard, would needs go (whether for her Devotion or for her Recreation, I know not) to visit the Monastery and fair Church, which Blennydes (a Noble Man of great Renown, both for his Integrity of Life, and Learning) had of his own costs and charges but lately built in the Country, where he together with his Monks, as men weary of the World, lived a devout and solitary contemplative life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the People in general.

This Blennydes was afterward for his upright life and profound Learning, chosen Patriarch of Constantinople; which great honour, next unto the Emperor himself, he refused, contenting himself with his Cell. Marcellina coming thither in great Pomp, and thinking to have entered the Church, had the doors shut against her by the Monks, before commended to do so by Blennydes their Founder; and so was to her great disgrace kept out. For that devout man deemed it a great impiety, to suffer that so wicked and shameless a Woman, against whom he had most sharply both spoken and written, with her prophane and wicked sect should tread upon the sacred pavement of his Church. She enraged with this indignity, hardly by so proud a Woman to be with patience digested, and prick forward by her flattering Followers also, returning to the Court, grievously complained thereof to the Emperor, stirring him up by all means he could to revenge the same, perswading him to have been therein himself disgraced. Whereunto were joined also the hard speeches of her pickthank Favourites, who to curry Favour, spared not as it were to put oyl unto the fire, for the stirring up of the Emperor to Revenge. Who with so great a complaint nothing moved unto Wrath, but struck as it were to the heart with a sense of Conscience, and oppressed with heaviness, with tears running down his Cheeks, and fetching a deep sigh, said, Why provoke you me to punish I just a man? Whereas if I would my self have lived without reproach and infamy, I should have kept my Imperial Majesty unpolluted or stained. But now sith I my self have been the cause both of mine own disgrace and of the Emperors; I may thank mine own defects, if of such evil seed as I have sown, I now reap also an evil harvest.

After the death of this good Emperor, Theodor his Son, born the first year of his Fathers Reign, being then about three and thirty years old, was by the general consent of the People, chosen Emperor in his stead; who in the beginning of his Empire renewed the League which his Father had made with Jathabates the Turkish Sultan. And so having provided for the security of his affairs in Asia, he with a puissant Army passed over the Straight of Hellepontus into Europe, to appease the troubles there raised in Macedonia and Thracia, by the King of Bulgaria his Brother-in-Law, and Michael Angelus the Despot of Thessaly; who upon the death of the old Emperor began to spoil those Countries, not without hope as length to have joynted them unto their own; by whose coming they were for all that disappointed of their purpose, and glad to sue to him for peace. But whilst he was there busied, he was advertised by Letters from Nice, that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left there Governor in his absence, was secretly fled unto the Turks; with which news he was not a little troubled. The cause of whose flight, as Paleologus himself gave it out, was, for that he perceived himself divers ways by many of his Enemies brought into disgrace, and the Emperors Ears so filled with their odious complaints, so cunningly framed against him, as that they were not easily or in short time to be refuted; and therefore fearing in the Emperors heavy displeasure to be suddenly taken away, to have willingly gone into exile, if so happily he might save his life from the malice of them that sought after it.

At his coming to Iconium, he found Jathabates the Sultan making great preparation against the Tartars; who having driven the Turks out of Persia and other the far Eastern Countries, (as is before declared) and running still on, did with their continual incursions spoil a great part of their Territories in the lesser Asia also; and now lay at Adara, a Town not far off from Iconium; against whom the Sultan now making the greatest preparation he could, gladly welcomed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthy Captain, commending to his charge the leading of certain Bands of Greeks, whom he had retained to serve him in those Wars, as he had others of the Latines, under the conduct of Benjamin a thing a Nobleman of Venice; and so having put all things in readiness, and strengthened with these foreign Supplies of the Greeks and Latines, set forward against his Enemies the Tartars; who at the first sight of the strange Ensigns and Souldiers were much dismayed, fearing some greater force had been come to the aid of the Turks; nevertheless, joyning with them in Battle, had with them, at the first a most terrible and bloody conflict, wherein that part of the Army that stood against Paleologus and his Greeks, was put to the worke, to the great discomfiture of the Tartars, being even upon the point to have fled, had not one of the greatest Commanders in the Turks Army, and a high Kinsman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare unto the Sultan, with all his Regiment, in the heat of the Battle revolted unto the Tartars; whereby the fortune of the Battle was in a moment as it were quite altered, they which but now were about to have fled, fighting like Lions; and they that were Victors now glad to turn their Backs and flee; in which Flight a great number of Turks fell, the fierce Tartars most eagerly pursuing them. Paleologus, with the General of the Turks, hardly chased by the Tartars, and glad every how to make a stand, and so fight for their lives, with much aid, after many days flight recovered a Castle of the Generals, near unto Castamona, and so saved themselves. The Tartars after this great a Victory (wherein they had broken the whole Strength of the Turks, and brought in hazard the whole State of their Kingdom) without resistance foraged all the Countries and Provinces subject unto the Turkish Sultan, making Spoil of whatsoever they light upon; infomuch that the Sultan discouraged, and having now no Strength left to oppose against them, fled unto the Greek Emperor Theodor for aid; who most honourably entertained him, with all his Train, and comforted him with such final aid as he thought good then to spare him; which for his more safety he sent home with him, under the leading of Isaacus Ducas, firmament Murysso, a man in great credit with him. In recognition of which kindness, the Sultan gave unto the Emperor the City of Ladicea, whereto he presently put a strong Garrison; Nevertheless, it was not long before it fell again into the Hands of the Turks, being a place not to be holden by the Greeks. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himself still to weak to withstand the continual invasions of the Tartars, and weary of the harms he daily sustained, by the advice of his chief Counsellors made a League with them, yielding to pay them a certain yearly Tribute, thereby to redeem his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks as of their Tributaries and Vassals.

Not long after this, Michael Paleologus was by the Emperors kind and gracious Letters called home, with his faithful promise also before given for his security, who before his return and himself also by solemn Oath, to be unto the Emperor and his Son always loyal, and from thenceforth never to seek after the Empire, or give cause of new suspicion for such matters as he had been before charged with; but for ever to yield unto the Emperor, his Son, or other his Successors in the Empire, his dutiful Obedience and Fidelity. Upon which conditions he was again made great Constable, and so received into the Emperors Favour, and lived the rest of his Reign in great honour and credit with him.

of Theodor

Now Theodor the Emperor having reigned three years, fell sick and died, leaving behind him his Son John, then but a Child of six years old, to succeed him in the Empire; whom he upon his death bed, together with the Empire, commended to Armenius the Patriarch, and one Gregory Muscalo his faithful Counsellor, as to his trusty Affairs, to see him safely brought up, and the Empire well and peaceably governed. This Muscalo was a man of mean Parentage, but for his familiar Acquaintance and civil Behaviour, of a Child brought up in the Court with the Emperor as his play fellow; with whom he growing up, so framed himself to his manners and disposition, that he alone was unto him instead of all, still at hand, ready to say or do whatsoever might be unto the Emperor gracious or pleasing. And as the elder they grew, so increased their mutual affection and love also; in such sort, that which him now Emperor, he was of all others in greatest Favour and Authority; a wary observer of his delights, a ready minister of his Affairs, and faithful partaker of his Secrets; for which he was in short time promoted unto the greatest honours of the Court, and honourably married unto one of the Emperors high Kinwomen; and now at his death, by his last Will, with the reverend Patriarch appointed Tutor to the young Emperor and his two young Sisters. And for the more assurance thereof, a solemn Oath of Obedience to the young Prince, as Emperor, and unto them as his Tutors, was exacted of all sorts of men, both high and low, of what vocation soever; and that not once, but first a little before the Emperors death, and again after he was now dead; for many of the Nobility honourably defended, seeing the sudden change of Muscalo's fortune, among themselves murmured thereat, as grieving at his pretermitt, seeing there were many among them, unto whom the constitution of the young Emperor, and administration of the Empire, of better right appertained; infomuch as they were both neerer of kin unto the Emperor, and fitter (as they thought) for so great a charge than was Muscalo; whom (as they said) they had many causes both to condemn and hate: For, beside that he was not honourably born, and had served the late Emperor Theodor, as the minister of his wrath against some of the Nobility, chiefly sufficient of the Peoples hatred; if he should now also in so great Authority affect the Empire, it was by his malicious Enemies vainly doubted, that he would not spare to commit any manner of Villany for the effecting of his inordinate desire. Of all which Muscalo was not ignorant, a man at all other times of a most quick apprehension for such matters, but as then especially, his Wife being awaked with these so great motives and dangers. Wherefore speedily calling together all the Nobility into the Court, he welcomed them one by one, and curiously discoursing with them, offered to discharge himself both of the administration of the Empire, and tuition of the young Emperor, and willingly to yield the same to any one of them, whom the rest should think fittest for so great a charge; which, though they all with one voice refused, saying, that he was of all others to be preferred, unto whom the Emperor, Lord both of the Empire and the Child, had committed the same; yet Muscalo earnestly requested them to the contrary, and softly withstood their desire, wishing indeed rather to have led a quiet private life in security, than to have been so overcharged; not so much for doubt of the Envy then arising, as for fear of some great danger thereof to ensue. But would he, would he not, remedy there was none; but that as the late Emperor had appointed, so must he take the charge upon him. And now was every one, as well of the Nobility, as of the inferior sort, again with greater solemnity than before, the third time sworn, to the utmost of their power to defend the young Emperor in his Empire, and Muscalo in the tuition of him, and administration of the Affairs of the State, and faithfully to yield unto them both all due honour and obedience; which if they should fail religiously to perform, they wished to themselves every man, and to all theirs, a shameful end and destruction. Yet notwithstanding all this solemn swearing, mixt most times with much forswearing, there was not fully nine days past, but that certain of the chief Nobility, forgetful, or else careless of their Oath, and of Envy, seldom faultering but with blood, conspired the unworthy death of Muscalo the Protector both of the Emperor and the Empire. The ninth day appointed for the funeral of the Emperor, was now come; at which time were met together at Sofandra (an Abbey by himself built in the honour of the Virgin Mary at Magnesia) many great Ladies and grave Matrons, to mourn as the manner was; all of the Nobility, and among them the Conspirators also; thither repaired also a number of Souldiers prepared for the

the slaughter, with an infinite number of the Common People, as at such Solemnities is usual. But what needs many words? while the Hymns were yet in singing, and the Obsequies performing, the Souldiers as they were before instructed, suddenly breaking into the Church, with their drawn Swords in their Hands, flew Musale (then fled to the Altar for refuge) with his two Brethren Andronicus and Theodorus, both men of great account, and divers others appointed to the Massacre. So the Matrons and the rest of the multitude breaking off their Mourning, and for fear thronging on one another's Neck, fell as fast as they could, some one way, some another, as they thought for their best safety; but the Priests and Monks thinking to have done the like, were by the imperious Souldiers, whether they would or not, again enforced into the Church; where tumbling one over another, as thronging in with great force and violence, and scarce able to stand by reason of the slippery steps of the blood there shed upon the pavement, they in great fear made an end of those bloody Obsequies. This outrage appeared, Armenius the Patriarch, and only Tutor of the young Emperor now left, was therewith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the person of the young Prince, and to the quietness of the State; but what good counsellor to take therein he could not tell; for as he was a man for his Learning and Integrity of Life not inferior to the best, so in matters of State he was as far to seek; as it commonly hapneth, the contemplative man buried in his meditations, to be unfit for temporal Government; whereas he that should perform both, must to his rare virtues add great learning join a civil conversation, with great experience in worldly affairs, not to be learned but by great and long practise. This reverend Father (of no great reach, yet wishing all well) calling together the Nobility, consulted with them what were best to be done for the Government both of the young Emperor and the Empire, now that Musale was dead; not confiding in the mean time, who they were with whom he consulted, or that Council grounded upon no wife foresight, or approved experience, was more dangerous unto him whom he would have provided for, than all the Enemies murdering Swords, as shortly after appeared.

Amongst others of the Nobility called to Council, was Michael Palaeologus (of whom we have before spoken) much superior to the rest, as descended of the Imperial House of the Comneni, a man of a cheerful countenance, courteous and curious, and withal exceeding bountiful and liberal, whereby he easily won the Hearts of all men in general, but especially of the Colonels, Captains, and other Martial Men, Commanders in the Army; of whose aspiring to the Empire, many piques and common rumors (not always vain) had in former time passed also, to the moving of many; yet the Patriarch himself not confiding his haughty and aspiring nature, made no less account of him than did the rest, but upon an especial favour, committed to his only trust the keys of the common Treasure, at such time as Monys was to be delivered out for the payment of the Armies, or other like great occasions of the State; the most effectual means for the furtherance of his secret practices, and the readiest way for the effecting of that he had so long before plotted; for having in his fingering such a mass of Treasure, as he might well have wished, but never reasonably hoped for, he poured it out as it were by buckets, amongst the Nobility and Martial Men, and such others as he thought were able to do mischief to the People; amongst whom were many of the Clergy also; of which his Favourites were made many meetings, and by them was the Patriarch continually solicited, but yet in general terms, without date (according to the necessity of the time) to take order for the good Government of the State, which now as a great Ship in the middle of the Sea without a Master, was (as they said) in danger to perish, and being once lost, was not to be again recovered. At which time also the name of Palaeologus was in every man's mouth, as the only man for his Wisdom and experience fit to take upon him the charge and government of the Empire, until the young Emperor were come to age. Unto which common good liking, the Patriarch also (feeling no more, or peradventure not so much as the rest) gave his consent; and so without longer stay, to the great contentment both of the Nobility and People in general, made him Governor of the Empire, and Tutor to the young Emperor, wanting now nothing of an Emperor himself, more than the Title and Imperial Ornaments. This was the first step whereby the aspiring man (twice before in disgrace with the two late Emperors, John Ducas, and his Son Theodorus) mounted at last unto the Empire.

It was not many days after, but that his Favourites held another Council, wherein it was alleged, That it was not seemly for him that was Tutor unto the Emperor, Governour of the State and Empire, and to give audience unto the Embassadors of foreign Nations, to want the honour next unto the Emperor, as well for the magnificence of the State, as for the credit of the Prince; whereupon he was both by the Patriarch and the young Emperor honoured with the title of the Despot, another step unto the Empire. But what contentment find the ambitious even in the greatest honours, so long as there is one above them? Little sure, or none at all more than that it forceth them to step at next up to the highest; as did this new made Despot, who shortly after, was by certain of the Nobility his great Favourites, near unto Magnesia, with the great applause of the People, hoisted up and flattered Emperor. Whereof Armenius the Patriarch hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the young Child, the right Heir of the Empire. And first he was about to have communicated as well him that was made Emperor, as them that had so made him; but afterward changing his purpose, for fear of greater troubles, he thought it better by solemn Oath to bind both him and the rest, that they should not seek after the life of the Child, or by any force or colour go about to deprive him of the Empire; which was so done. Yet it was not full a month after, but that even he that had so great a care of the young Child, and so provided for his safety, (perwaded by them of the Nobility and Clergy) with his own Hands, and all the accustomed Ceremonies, for the Imperial Crown upon this Ufurper Head; yet not as upon him that should still enjoy the Empire, but as upon a man according to the present necessity of the time and State, thought himself for so great a charge, until the young Child came to age; unto whom then he was to give place, and to resign to him the Empire. All which being by more solemn Oath than before, confirmed, good news (as the certain signs of his fortunate Government) were brought unto him of a great Victory obtained by his Captains, against Michael Angelus Despot of Aetolia and Epirus; who having married the late Emperors Daughter, and being of his death, with the troubles in Afia, aided by the King of Sicilia, and the Princes of Peloponnesus and Acchia, his his Sons in Law, had thought in that hurl and perturbation of the State to have taken to himself the greatest part of the Emperors Territories in Macedonia and Thracia; and for the same purpose was with a great Army entred into them, burning and spoiling the Country before him; whereof Michael Palaeologus (then but newly made Despot) having intelligence, sent his Brother John, and some other his best Captains, with a great Army against him, by whom he with his complices were put to the worse, and not without great loss enforced to retire; the joyful news whereof he received even as he was crowned. Which was shortly after confirmed by the coming of the great Emperors themselves, bringing with them the Prince of Peloponnesus and Acchia, by them taken Prisoner; who for his Ranfome was afterward glad to give unto the Emperor Palaeologus, Monembasia, Maine and Sparta, three of the best Cities of Peloponnesus; whereinto he put strong Garrisons under the command of Constantinus his Brother, by the Mothers side, a right valiant Captain. By whose good service and the commodious situation of the places, he gained divers other Towns and Cities, and at length the greatest part of Peloponnesus, out of the hands of the Latines; for the utter rooting out of whom, he shortly after with a great Army passed over into Thracia (his purpose (as was thought) to have besieged Constantinople; but finding it to be a matter of more difficulty than was before supposed, he left that, and laid siege to the Castle of Pera over against it on the other side of the Haven, in hope by winning of that Castle, to have become Master also of the Town; where he was notably repulsed, and enforced with loss to retire. So rising with his Army, he fortified divers Castles and strong Holds in the Country about Constantinople, and putting into them strong Garrisons, charging them with continual incursions to trouble the Constantinopolitans, and to cut them to short, if it were possible, as that they should not dare to look out at the Gates of their City. Which they so well performed, that in short time the Latines in the City were driven to such extremity, that for want of Wood they were fain to burn many of the fairest Houses in the City, in stead of Fuel. Which done, he returned again to the chief seat of the Greek Emperors, ever since that Constantinople was taken by the Latines.

Now reigned in Constantinople the Latine Emperor Baldwin the Second (as is before declared) a man of small courage, and less power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greeks or Latines; who for the maintenance of his State, was glad to sell away the publick Ornaments of the City, and to pawn his Son unto the Bruges Merchants for money; by whom he was pawned unto the Venetians.

About this time Alans, the great Cham of Tartary, stirred by Atimius the Armenian King, by whose perfidious he had also received the Christian Religion, sent his Brother Hasan with an exceeding great Army against the Turks and Saracens in Syria and the Land of Palestine. This Hasan (converted also unto the Christian Faith by his Wife) setting forward with a world of People following him, in the space of six months overran all Perfia, with the Countries adjoining, excepting one strong place in the Mountains, (which some say was Samarcanda, afterward the Royal Seat of the great terror of the world, the mighty Tamerlane) which besieged by ten thousand Horsemen, by him appointed for that purpose, and so continued by the space of seven or twenty years after, was then at length (as Atim himself writeth) yielded by the Defendants, only for want of Cloaths to cover their nakedness. Hasan (in whose Army those ten thousand left behind were not misfitted) marching on, and as a violent Tempest bearing all down before him, entred at length into Affrica, then the Seat of the great City of Babylon, Mahometan Princes honoured above all others, as the true Successor of their great Prophet Mahomet, and received from his mouth the interpretation of their Law as most divine Oracles. Which great found therein, Men, Women, and Children, with all the Spoil thereof, and the rich Treasures of the Caliph, enriched his Souldiers. The Caliph himself (reserved for that purpose) he commanded to be set in the middle of the infinite Treasure which he and his Predecessors had most covetously stacked up together, and that he should of that Gold, Silver, and precious Stones take what it pleased him to eat, faying (by way of derision) That so gainful a Quest should by good reason be fed with nothing but things of greatest price, whereof he willed him to make no spare; in which order the covetous Wretch kept for certain days, miserably died with hunger, in the middle of those things whereof he thought he should never have had enough; which though they were in value great, and with great care laid together, yet served they him not now to suffice Nature, but contented with a little. Babylon thus sacked, and almost rased, the Tartar marching on through Mesopotamia, by the way took the City Rhodes, where Atim the Armenian King, and Author of this the Tartars expedition, came to him with twelve thousand Horsemen, and forty thousand Foot, as reporteth Atim the Armenian Kings Nephew, then there present. So entering into Syria, in a few days took Aleppo, which he sacked and rased Aleppo in the year of our Lord 1260, with divers other rased by the Tartars Kingdom of Antioch. Then was one Malacensis Sultan of Damascus, commanding over all Syria and the Land of Palestine; who terrified with the loss of his Cities, and the fear of farther danger, with his Wife and Children came and begged himself before the Tartar Prince, in hope so to have of him some favour, and to have part of his Kingdom. Wherein he was much deceived, being (as some say) carried away far off into exile, because he should not hinder the Tartars proceedings; or as others report, (and haply with more probability) being by him detained as his Prisoner, and afterwards to the error of his Son, cut in pieces in his sight under the Walls of Damascus, after that he had in vain been twice assailed by the Tartars, which strong City for all that he afterwards took by strong hand, and sacked it, and by the perurbation of his Wife overthrew all the Mahometan Temples, as he had before in every place where he came. But purposing to have gone on forward to Jerusalem, and to have conquered the whole Land of Palestine, news was brought him of the death of his Brother Mange, the great Cham; whereupon he staid his journey, and returned back again, in hope of that great Empire; having in this expedition spent almost six years.

Thus by the Tartars was the Kingdom of the Turks at Damascus overthrowen. At which time the broken affairs of the Christians in Syria and the Land of Palestine, might easily have been repaired and those two goodly Kingdoms again restored.

restored to the Christian Common-Weal, had the Christian Princes of the West then in time put their helping hand on the one side, as did the Tartars on the other; but they then as did the Tartars on the other; and buffed with their cord among themselves, and buffed with their Wars at home, lest they should find an opportunity, the like whereof they seldom or never had since. Hasan the Tartar Prince, in token of his good Will toward the Christians and their Affairs, at his departure from Damascus left his Son Abdullah there with twenty thousand Horsemen (as was then in their Wars, if they should come (as was expected) for the recovery of the Holy Land; who having there staid some while, and hearing of his Father's troubles at home, followed himself after him; but yet left behind him Gurbacha a valiant Captain, with ten thousand of his Horsemen; to like purpose that his Father had him; men, to like purpose that his Father had him; who by the fidelity of certain Christian Soldiers in Garrison about Sidon, was of a Friend, together with his Tartars made a Foe. These Garrison Soldiers having by chance fell in some booty out of the Tartars Territory, not only refused to restore the same again, but also cruelly entreated such as the Tartar had sent for the demanding thereof. Whereupon further quarrels arising, it fortuned a Nephew of Gurbacha, a valiant young Gentleman, to be slain; in revenge whereof he besieged Sidon, and having taken it, sacked it, and burnt it down to the ground. After which time, he and his Tartars became utter Enemies unto the Christians, doing them all the harm they could devise.

This discord betwixt the Tartars and the Christians, gave occasion unto Melech the Egyptian Sultan, now jealous of the Tartars nearness, with a great Army of his Mamelukes and others to enter into Syria, and to spoil the Country of Damascus; against whom Gurbacha with his Tartars, although both in Strength and Number far inferior, went out. But joining Battle with him at too much odds, and the Victory inclining unto that side where most Strength was, he there valiantly fighting was slain, with most part of his Tartars; which as escaped fled into Armenia unto the friendly King. By this Victory, all Syria, with the Land of Palatine, excepting some few places helden by the Christians, fell again into the hands of the Egyptian Sultans; as did some of them shortly after also for Bahadour, succeeding Melech in the Mameluke Kingdom, coming into Syria with a great Army, took Antioch from the Christians, and with it most of the places before by them defended. The City he burnt, and raised the Cattle down to the ground, and afterward entering into Armenia; did there great harm also.

Willitt the Turks Kingdom thus goeth to wreck in Syria, ruined by the Tartars, but possessed by the Mamelukes; their affairs in the lesser Asia, now the whole hope of that Nation, went not at that time much better; for Taishime the Turks Sultan, then invaded by the Tartars, and having lost Iscion his Regal City, fled some coming in large Empire, where he might in safety rest with his Wife and Children, and other Followers, whom with much Wealth he had brought with him in great number. The Emperor on every side himself incumbered with Wars, thought it not good in so great newness of his Empire, to diminish his own Forces; and to assign unto him any place to inhabit, deemed no less dangerous; for that he having once a great Prince, and commanding over many great Countries, and brought up in all Princely Royalty; beside that, his Nobility, then dispersed by the Tartars, were like enough in great numbers to resort unto him, as unto their Head, so foot as they should once hear that he were feared in any place; and unkindly to call him off; that had nobly used him in like extremity, the Emperor was loath. And therefore feeding him up with fair Words, and fording him on from time to time with delays, he held him a great while as a man in suspense, between hope and despair. At length in the absence of the Emperor (though happily not without his Privy) he was commanded with all his Train, in number about twelve hundred, to get him to Amu a City of Thracia, standing upon the Sea-coast; where he most discontented, lived like an honourable Prisoner at large; but with the watchful Eyes of so many upon him, as that he could by no means (as he desired) escape. In which case we will for a while leave him, to feed upon his own melancholy thoughts.

Now had Michael Paleologus the Emperor reigned at Nice two years, when new troubles began again to arise in the West part of his Empire in Europe side, by the treachery of Michael Angelus Despot of Epirus. For the speedy redressing whereof, he sent one Alexius Strategopoulos, a worthy Captain, and a man of great Nobility (whom for his good service against the said Despot, he had in the beginning of his Reign made Cesar) with little above eight hundred Bythinian Soldiers; and Commission for the taking up of so many more as he should for that service need, in Macedonia and Thracia; commanding him when he had passed the Streight, with those Soldiers to take his ways through the Suburbs of Constantinople, to terrify the Latines, whom he was loath to suffer too long to live in rest and quiet, or to stir too far out of the Gates, but to keep them as Prisoners cought up within the Walls of the City. This warlike Captain with this handful of men, passing over Propontis, encamped at Regium, not far from Constantinople; where by chance lighting upon certain poor labouring men, Greeks born in the City, and there dwelling, he diligently inquired of them the state thereof, and of what Strength the Latines were, with many other things which he was desirous to know; who not only told him that the Strength of the Latines was but small, but also that the greatest part thereof was gone to the Siege of Daphnusia, a Town not far off, upon the side of the Euxine Sea; and withal (as Greeks ever affected to the Government of the Latines, and desirous of the liberty of their Country) offered of themselves to flow him. These poor men dwell within the City, close by one of the Gates, near whereunto by an old ruinous Mine almost swarved up, was a secret undiscovered way into the City, not known to any but to themselves; by this blind hole they promised him by night to receive in fifty of his best Soldiers; and dispatching them out of the way, might presently break open the Gate, and so let in the rest of the Army; whereunto they promised themselves with their Friends to put to their helping hands, assuring him of the good success thereof. This Plot for the betraying of the City thus laid and agreed upon, Alexius and Cesar well rewarding the men, and filling them with greater Promises promises sent them away; who as if they had been about their Country work, were after their wonted manner received into the City, without suspicion at all. And within a few days after according to their promise, at an appointed hour received in by night the aforesaid fifty Soldiers; who aided by them, presently flew the Watch, and brake open the Gate, whereby Alexius entering a little before day, in convenient place put his men in order of Battle, and afterward to the greater terror of the Latines, caused the City to be set on fire in four places, which increasing with the Wind, burnt in most terrible manner, and was in short time come almost unto the Emperors Palace. Who farthest waked, and seeing the City all on a fire about his Ears, and the Enemy coming on, was about as the first with those few Latines that he had (for Greeks he had none) to have made head against them. But better advised, and perceiving it to be now to no purpose, he (the last of the Latine Emperors that ever reigned in Constantinople) with John his Latine Patriarch, and some other of his Friends, fled by Sea into Euboea, and so from thence afterwards to Venice, and afterwards to Lewis the French King, in hope to have been by him and the Venetians relieved. After whom fled also all the rest of the Latines. Thus the Imperial City of Constantinople by great fortune fell again into the hands of the Greeks, in the year 1261. after that it had been in possession of the Latines about 58 years.

The joyful news of the recovery of the Imperial City, was in short time carried unto Michael Paleologus the Greek Emperor at Nice; who at the first believed it not, as thinking it scarce possible, so strong a City to have been by so weak a power surprised, whereas he himself not long before was not able with a right puissant Army, and much other like provision, to win the Castle of Galata over against it. But afterwards assured of the truth thereof, with his Hands and Eyes cast up towards Heaven, gave most hearty thanks to God therefore, causing Hymns and Psalms of Thanksgiving to be solemnly sung in every Church, with all the other signs of Joy and Triumph that could be devised. So tending all other things apart, he wholly busied himself in making preparation for his going unto Constantinople, now once again the seat of the Greek Empire; wherein, and in travelling having spent many days, he at length with the Empress his Wife and Andronicus his Son, then but two years old, as if it had been in solemn Procession, from that entered into the City, by the Gate called the Golden Gate; and after Prayers and Thanks given, went to the Palace prepared for him near unto the Tilt-yard; for the other Imperial Palaces of greater beaury (sometime the stately dwellings of the greatest Emperors of the Greeks) had now of long, during the Reign of the Latines, lieth in ruins, or altogether demolished. And shortly after, because virtue and true desert should not want their due honour, he caused Alexius Cesar (by whose means the City was recovered) in solemn Triumph in his Robes of Honour, with a Crown upon his Head, not much inferior unto the Imperial Crown, with great Pomp to be carried through all the City; and farther commanded, that his name for one year next following, in all solemn Prayers and Hymns of Thanksgiving, should be joined with the name of the Emperor himself. And yet not thinking to have done him honour enough, caused his lively Image toward the most reverently made, and as a Trophy to be set upon a fair marble Pillar, before the great Church of the Holy Apostles, in perpetual remembrance of him, and what he had done for the delivery of his Country; which shortly after overthrowen by an Earthquake, was by his Son again restored. Now was this great and famous City, sometime the Beauty of the World, by these strange and fatal mutations, wonderfully defaced, and brought to great defolation; in every place to be seen great Heaps, or rather (to say the truth) great Hills of Rubbish, the eternal Witnesses of the ruin thereof; the Houses stood some quite fallen down, some ready to follow after, and some other great and stately buildings, now the small reliques of great Cities; for the great beaury thereof was before, at such time as the Latines took it, most defaced by Fire; who all the time that they had it, ceased no night any day to destroy some part or other of it, as if they had known they should not long keep it; neither did this last Fire raised by the Greeks themselves to terrify the Latines, a little deform it; for which cause the Emperors chief care now was to cleanse the City, and in the best sort he could to reform to great a confusion of things not to be all at once amended; first beginning with the Churches, which ruinous or ready to fall, he repaired; and next to that filled the empty houses with new Inhabitants. And albeit that the chief of the Latines were together with the Emperor fled and gone, yet was most part of the Artificers and Tradesmen of the City, Venetians and of them of Pisa, mingled together; unto whom also to join the Genovais, and so to fill the City with Latines, he thought it not altogether safe, although that by them he reaped great profit; wherefore he assigned unto them the City of Galatia now called Pera, on the other side of the Haven, for them to inhabit; granting them great Privileges, and every of those Companies to be governed by a Consul or Postelate of their own. As for the Imperial City it self, he stored it, (as near as he could) with Natural Greeks born. Now although all things went as Paleologus the Emperor could himself have wished; yet could he not rest so contented, for fear lest those which now did eat their own Hearts, and with great grief smouldered their anger, should at length as the rightful Heirs of the Empire by him usurped, break out into open force, and so breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps work his confusion. For such is the tormenting state of usurping Tyrants, never to think themselves safe so long as any one liveth, whom they may suspect. Wherefore at once to rid himself of this fear, he thought it best to divide of the Children of the late Emperor Theodore Lascaris, as thus he should not need of them to stand in doubt; to take them out of the way, besides that it was a thing odious, he saw it like to be unto him dangerous; Mary and Theodora (two of the eldest Daughters) being before by their Father married unto two great Princes, one the Despot of Epirus, and the other Prince of Bulgaria (with whom he had much before to do, and of them yet stood in some doubt; but these were safe enough out of his reach. Other two young Sisters there were in his custody, Theodora and Irene, with their Brother John, the only Heir of the Empire; Theodora he married unto one Balsara a Gentleman of Peloponnesus, and Irene to one Viginimilio of Genoa; both Latines, men of no great Birth or Power, such as he needed not to stand in doubt of. These two Ladies, the Daughters of a great Emperor as was Theodora, thus basely bestowed; remained only their Brother John, the only Heir of the Empire, then but ten years old, whom Paleologus long before ever in the beginning of his Reign, had sent unto Mag-nifher there to be safely kept off from the Court, for fear lest in his right and quarrel some discontented persons desirous of innovation, should now begin some new fits dangerous unto his Estate.

Which indignity done unto the young Prince,
Asfamin the Patriarch (put in trust by his Father for the bringing of him up) took in so evil part, that he forsook the Court with all his Ecclesiastical dignity, and as a man weary of the World, retired himself unto a little Monastery of Palestus in the Country, there to spend the rest of his days. From whence for all that he was after the taking of Constantinople from the Latins, almost against his Emperor's will, and by Pale-ologus the Emperor, and made Patriarch thereof, there together with so great an honour to find his greater discontent. For Paleologus the Usurper, altogether unmindful of his Faith folemnly before given, for the safety of the young Prince, and the restoring unto him of his Empire; and now fully resolved to establish unto him and his Posterity the Sovereignty of so great an Empire, howsoever it was got, caused the young Princes Eyes to be most cruelly put out; the usual practice of the Tyrants of the East, upon such as they are loath or fear to kill, and yet would make them unfit for Government.
Of which outrageous cruelty, his Sister Theodora (married to Constantine Prince of Bulgaria) hearing, could not with tears and prayers and all other womanly persuasions, to stir up her Husband in revenge thereof; whereunto also Jaksime the Turks Sultan, gave no little furtherance; who weary of Exile, and to be so in a corner confined as into a Prison from whence he might not flatter, by secret Messengers treated the Bulgarian Prince to make War upon the usurping Emperor; promising him a great sum of Money, if by his help he might recover his former Liberty. Wherewith he the latter moved, with a great power of his own, and above twenty thousand Tartars which then lay by the River
Heber, suddenly brake into the Emperors Territories, and in shorter time than was to have been thought, overran all the Country of Thra-cia, even unto the Sea side, leaving neither man nor beast in all that Country as he went; in good hope also to have by the way surprised the Emperor himself, even then returning from his Wars against the Despot in Thessaly; who hearing of his speedy coming, being got unto the Sea side, and (having no way left to have escaped by Land) shipped himself into a Galley of the Latines, which with another, her confort bound for Constantinople, by good hap put in there for to water, and so in two days arrived safe at the Imperial City. Thus disappointed of the Emperor, all his care was for the delivery of the Turks Sultan. Wherefore marching in haste to Anam, he so terrified the Citizens with his coming, that they without farther delay delivered him into his hands, to redeem their own Peace. In his return you might have seen the Souldiers, especially the Tartars, driving before them infinite numbers both of Men and Cattel, in such sort, as that in the open Country of Thracia for a Peace, was hardly to be seen either Countryman or Beast, it was so clean swept both of Inhabitants, and likewise of Cattel.

Jahannes
died in Exile.

Jahannes the Sultan by the Tartars carried over Heber, and so by them set at liberty, shortly after died. In whose Kingdom succeeded not his Son Melike (as some write) but two others (as the Turks themselves report) the one called Mesur, the Son of Rei-Cahad, and the other

Rei-Cahad, the Son of Feremine, born also of the Selaccian Family, as were all the Turks; Sultans, but how near of blood unto the late Sultan: Jahannes, they say not. Betwixt which two, as his Vassals, Gaza the great Tartar Cham (by whom they were so preferred) For the payment of a yearly Tribute, divided the Turk Kingdom; appointing unto Mesur the Cities of Amid (in ancient time called Amisus), and Aminsur in Galatia, Alutia otherwise called Alutia in the latter Armenia, Sivastie, in ancient time Sebastia, and Harbarie, before Satrabia, both in Cap-padoxia, with all the Country about them. And unto Rei-Cahad, Iscumia, the ancient seat of the Turkish Sultans, with all Rumelia, Affrica, or the Countries of the lesser Asia along the Sea-coast;
which these two Princes held as the Tartars Tributaries, as had the late Sultan Jahannes before them, until such time as he was by the late Tartars again expelled. So that the Turks Kingdom, which had of long time flourished in the Selaccian Family in Persia, in Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, there quite overthrowen by the Mamelukes and Tartars (as is before declared) and now brought underfoot in the lesser Asia also, where only remained all the hope of that Nation, was now at a low Ebb, divided betwixt two weak Princes, reigning but at the devotion of the Tartar. In which confusion of the Turkish Empire, so rent, not only divers men of greater Power and Authority amongst them, flared unto themselves, some one corner of the declining Kingdom, and some another; but many of the obscure and basest People also, bearing with them nothing but their Bows and Arrows, took the straight passages of the Mountains, and from thence with their day-ly Incursions, did much harm in the Countries of the Christians joyning upon them; which was no great matter for them to do, the Garisons which were wont to defend the same, being for want of pay quite disbanded, and the Castles upon the Frontiers by them abandoned; which at the first, as a thing of small importance neglected, was at length unto the Greeks a great cause of the ruin and decay of the greatest part of their estate in Asia. These mischief unguarded, grew daily more and more, the Turks still gaining upon the Greeks what they lost unto the Tartars. Whose invasions (the Glory of their Kingdom only excepted) was no so hurtful unto them, as the cause of their much greater felicity afterwards. At length it fortuned, that a great power of these adventurous Turks meeting together in Epiphania, were about to have invaded the Territories of the Christians; against whom Michael Paleologus the Emperor sent out a strong and puissant Army to their further coming on, led breaking in that way, they should without resistance at their pleasure forage the Country before them. Which Army conducted by unskilful Captains, encountering with the Turks, was by them in a great Battle overthrown and utterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude escaping; for whilst the Greeks unadvisedly pursued the Turks, retiring of purpose before them, they were by them drawn into the danger of a greater Power lying in ambush for them, and so entrapped, were slain with an exceeding great Slaughter.
After which so great a Victory (the beginning of the misery of the Christians in the lesser Asia) the Turks without let or stay overran all the Country, unto the River Sagarius; upon the Banks whereof the Greek Empire was glad to forfeit divers Towns and Forts to keep them out of Bithynia. Nevertheless, they in short time after subdued all the Countries, from Pontus and Galatia, unto the Lycian and Carian Sea, and the River Euxynus, which they divided amongst them into divers Toparchies; little or nothing acknowledging the Sovereignty either of Mesur, or Rei-Cahad.

Whilst the Turks in the lesser Asia thus win from the Christians on the one side, and lose to the Tartars on the other, many an hard conflict in the meantime raised betwixt the Emperor and the Sultans with their Mamelukes, and the Tartars, for the Sovereignty of Syria. The poor remainder of the Christians all that while there, in doubt both of the one and of the other; from whom and from the Armenians (then also much infested with the Mamelukes) divers Embassidors were sent unto the Pope and the Christian Princes of the West, to crave their aid and help in that their hard Estate; whose prayers little prevailing with the rest, yet so moved Lewis the French King, and Henry the Third, then reigning in England, that they both promised them aid. Whereupon Lewis and from thence embarking on, and always forward in that service against the Infidels, took upon him the Cross, the cognizance of the sacred War; causing his three Sons, Philip that succeeded him in the Kingdom, firmated the Fair, Peter Count of Alencon, and Jehan Count of Nevers (firmated Tristan, for that his Mother was at that great leaving of him, the taking of her Husband, delivered of him in Egypt) and most of the Nobility of France to do the like; unto whom also Theobald King of Na-var his Son-in-Law, Alphonse his Brother, and Guy Earl of Flanders, joyned themselves. And so having put all things in readines, took his way to Marseilles, and from thence embarking himself with his Army in the Gemousy, he hired for that purpose, set forward the first of March, in the year 1270. But being at Sea, he was by force of Weather constrained to land in Sardinia, and there to stay a while; departing thence, he at length arrived at Carthage, the place by him desired; where in the entrance of the Haven he surprised certain of the Enemies Ships;
but landing his men, and assaulting the Town, he was there notably repulsed. This is not that ancient, great, and famous City, which sometime mightily trove with the proud Mistress of the World for Sovereignty, but another built long after in the ruins, and at the place where the same was the same. In the besieging whereof, the Frenchmen found fith resistance, as well put them in remembrance of the ancient glory of the Carthaginians. One day it fortuned as the King thus lay at the Siege, that the Defendants made a great and fierce Sally upon the Frenchmen, who before commanded so to do, by little and little retired, to draw their Enemies further on; betwixt whom and the City, the Confitable with a great power coming in and charging them behind, and they which before retired, now standing close unto them, they were on both sides hardly best; who for all that, as became valiant men, doorly defended themselves, and made there great fight, though not without extreme peril;
which they in the City beholding, gave out a most hideous and piteous cry, a certain sign of their hard estate within; alonging with the suddenness thereof, both their Friends and Enemies.
But whilst they of the Town betwixt hope and despair stood thus beholding the fight at Land, the Frenchmen by Sea approaching a Bulwark on that side of the Town, took it without resistance; which so dismayed them without, that they began forthwith to flee, of whom the greatest part calling away their Weapons, were by the

the Third.

Kings commandment taken to mercy; and they likewise of the Town upon promise of their lives, yielded the same unto the King. Carthage thus won, the King laid Siege to Tunis, the chief City of that Kingdom, being not far off; where by the way he was encountered by the King of the Country, who having there lost ten thousand of his Moors, betook himself to flight with the rest.
Who thus overthrowen, resolved no more to tempt Fortune, but to keep themselves safe within the Walls of the City, if happily so he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his Enemies by lying still and protracting the time, than by open Force and Valour. Which their purpose King Lewis perceiving, resolved not to stir from thence until that he were become Master of the City; which as he feared, could he not hold out for want of Victuals, considering the multitude of People that were got into it. Nevertheless thus besieged both by Sea and Land, and so faithfully hemmed in on every side, as that no relief could possibly be brought unto it; yet held it out by the space of six Months. After which time Wans daily more and more increasing amongst the besieged, Embassadors were sent out to the King, to intreat with him of peace.
But whilst these Embassadors go to and fro, and reason upon the capitulations of the desired peace, behold a great and furious Plague arose in the French Camp, which began to cut them down by heaps; there died Philip the Count of Nevers, the Kings youngest Son, born in the first expedition that the said King his Father made into the Holy Land, even at such time as he was taken Prisoner; which Tristan died the five and twentieth day of August in the year of our Lord 1270. The good King having yet scarcely performed the Obligation of his Son, fell sick of the bloody Flux, whereof he there shortly after died also. About which time arrived there also Charles King of Sicily, the French Kings Brother, with a great number of fresh Souldiers; whose coming lightened somewhat the Frenchmans hearts heavy for the death of their King) and daunted the Moors, before they of the same. Shortly after whom arrived there also Prince Edward, King Henry the Third his Eldest Son, who travelling through France, and taking shipping at Aquino, not far from Marseilles, was now in ten days with a brave Company of Englishmen come to Tunis; and thereof the other Christian Princes, namely of Philip the French King (his Father Lewis being now dead) of Charles King of Sicily, and of the two Kings of Navar and Aragon, joyfully received. But these Princes had a little before his arrival concluded a Peace with the Moors King, and the Infidels, upon condition that he should pay a yearly Tribute of forty thousand Crowns unto the King of Sicily; and to suffer the Christian Religion to be freely preached in his Dominions, by such devout persons as should be there left for that purpose; and that unto such as should by their preaching be converted unto the Faith in Christ Jesus, it should be lawful for them to be baptized, and to profess the Christian Religion. Of which Peace, Prince Edward understanding, did what he might to have dissuaded them from the same; saying, that the War was by them all taken in hand against the Infidels, as Enemies to the Cross of Christ, with whom they were not to have Peace; and for the recovery of the Holy City. But they say what he would, and do what he could, the Peace (to his great discontentment) was now concluded, which they might not (as they said) again break; and thereupon with the first fair Wind hoisted sail, and returned towards Sicilia, with purpose the next Spring to have gone into Syria; which their determination was shortly after by the hand of God disappointed. For being come upon the Coast of the Island no far from Drepanum, most of the great Princes and other Nobles, in their long Boats went on Land, the rest of the Fleet lying at Anker about a League off; for that being for the most part Ships of great burthen they were not able to put into the Harbor. But as they lay, by force of a sudden and violent Tempest then arising, forces were eaten up by the rough Sea; and their falling foot, and their Boats were perished together; others driven upon the Main, were there beaten in pieces; so that of that great Fleet before the Storm ceased, perished about an hundred and twenty Sail, with all the People, as well Mariners as Souldiers left in them; and great flocks both of Armor and Munition. In such fort that most of the common Souldiers and Mariners which had escaped the Plague at Tunes, there upon the Coast of Sicilia perished by Shipwrack. Only Prince Edwards Fleet, being in number but thirteen Ships, escaped free without loss either of Ship or Man. Neither were they that were got to Land at Drepanum in much better case, the Plague still following them; whereof died Theobald King of Navarre, and Isabel his Wife, King Lewis his Daughter, Elizabeth the French Queen, with a wonderful number of noble Gentlemen, and other common Souldiers; in such fort that Philip the French King did rage with the greatness of the mortality, and the miserable loss at Sea, resolved there to make an end of the intended War, and so returned into France, as did the rest that were left, every Man into his own Country. Only Prince Edwards having passed that Winter in Sicilia, with the first of the next Spring set forward again on his Voyage, and in 15 days after arrived with his Fleet at Ptolemais: where after he had by the space of a Month rested himself and his Souldiers after their long travel, and fully inquired of the State of the Country, he with six or seven thousand Souldiers marching from Ptolemais about twenty Miles into the Land, took Nazareth, and put to Sword all them he found therein, and so again returned. After whom the Enemies following, in hope to have taken him at some advantage, he understanding thereof, turned back upon them, and killing a great number of them, put the rest to flight. And after that about Midsummer, understanding that the Sarafins were again making Head at a place called Cakhou, about forty Miles off, he set forwards towards them; and coming upon them early in the Morning before they were aware, flew about a Thousand others and dispersed the rest. Aided also by the Nobility of Cyprus, he with like success as before, made a third Expedition against the Turks and Infidels: infomuch that his Fame began to grow great amongst them, and they to stand of him in no little dread. But whilst he thus prevailed, he was by foul Treachery almost out of the way. The Admiral of Toppa seeking himself desirous to become a Christian, and willing to further the Princes proceedings, had by a secret Messenger and Letters fild times Intelligence with him, as well concerning his own good Entertainments, as the manner of that which he had promised. This Messenger by the Admiral thus employed, was (though to the Prince unknown) one of the Assines, a company of most desperate and dangerous Men among the Mahometans, who strongly deluded with the blind zeal of their Superstition, and accounting it meritorious, by any means to kill any great Enemy of their Religion; for the performance thereof, as Men prodigal of their Lives, desperately adventure themselves into all kind of dangers. To now this Messenger, being resolved to die, coming the fifth time to the Prince, and being searched for having any Weapon about him, as the manner was, had access unto him, then lying in his Chamber upon his Bed, in his Jerkin, bare Headed, because of the heat of the Weather, where after due reverence done, he pulled out this Messenger, and his Lord unto the Prince, which he read with great delight, as penned of purpose for to please. But as he was further questioning with him of many matters, and all the company voided, the desperate Messenger making as though he would have pulled out some other secret Letters, suddenly plucked out an envenomed Knife, which he had secretly hidden about him, thinking to have struck him into the belly as he lay; for the avoiding of which stroke, the Prince lifting up his Arm, was therein grievously wounded. But as the Villain was about to have doubled the stroke or Men. The Princes servants being not far off, and he fled him to the ground, and with the starting up, caught him by the hand, where in struggling with him for the knife, and wresting it out of his hand, he hurt himself therewith in the Forehead; but getting it from him, presently thrust it into the Murderers Belly and so flew him. The Princes servants, being not far off, and hearing the bustling, came running in; where finding the Messenger dead on the floor, one of them with a stool beat out his brains; whereas the Prince took some displeasure, for so striking a dead man. This danger of the Princes much troubled and grieved all the Christians in Syria; and the more, for that the wound in his Arm, after it had been certain days well dressed by the skilful Surgeons and Physicians, began to mortify and grow black, infomuch, that they and others about him began to mutter among themselves, and to look heavily upon the matter, as not without danger. Which he perceiving, said unto them, Why whisper you this amongst your selves? What see you in me? Can I not be healed? Tell me the truth and fear not. Whereunto one of them answered; And like your Highness, we doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painful for you to suffer. If suffering (said he) may again restore my health, I commit my self unto you, work on me your skill, and spare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poysoned flesh out of his Arm, and in fifteen days after perfectly cured his wound, to the great rejoicing of all his People. The great Sultan to clear himself of this dishonourable treachery, sent three of his Noble men unto the Prince, calling to witness his false Prophet. That the same was done neither by him nor his consent. Which Embassadors the Prince honourably used, but suffered them not to come nigh him. So having received eight Madrasas at Ptolemais, and no ayd coming from the other Christian Princes, as was expected, he took Shipping, and returning homeward, landed first in Sicilia, and from thence crossing over into Apulia, and to travelling to Rome, was there honourably entertained by Gregory the Tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way he arrived in England, where he was shortly after crowned King, in the year 1272. His Father the old King, Henry the Third, being a little before his return dead.

1273. Rodolph the English was taken upon his flight.

The year following, Gregory the Tenth, not ignorant of the hard estate of the Christians in Syria, (as having there been of late himself with Prince Edward, at which time he was in his absence elected Pope) and now desirous to procure them some relief, ratified the election of Rodolph of Hapsburg unto the Empire, upon this condition, That he should promise to take upon himself the Cross, and to give them relief; for the performance whereof he offered unto the Emperor two hundred thousand Crowns, with the Tenth parts of the Clergy and Temporality for six years; and many goodly blessings were in his name also, by the Preachers of that time, promised unto all such as should with him take upon them that sacred War. Whereupon the Emperor, with all his Family took upon them the Cross, the sign of the sacred expedition intended; as did also the Duke of Lorain shortly after, with some others. Nevertheless the Emperor, otherwise busied in Wars against the Bohemians and Bavarians, and delaying still the time, as not greatly willing to take upon him so long and dangerous a journey, and the Pope still threatening his high sentence of Excommunication, the time passed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Until that at length the Emperor, having happily finished his Wars in Bohemia, and finding himself at some good leisure in some part to discharge his Vow, and to satisfy the expectation the World had long conceived of him, sent Henry Prince of Mecklenburg, or as the Germans call it, Stettelburg, with a strong Power into Syria, to perform what himself had promised. Who coming to Ptolemais, made many notable incursions into the Country about Damascus, with Fire and Sword destroying all before him as he went; and carrying thence many great and rich booties; until that at length he was by the Mamelukes circumvented and taken Prisoner, and so carried unto the Sultan at Caire, where he remained in strait prison six and twenty years after, until that by chance one of the Mamelukes (a renegade German) being chosen Sultan, caused him to be brought before him, and at his coming demanded of him, If it would not do him good to celebrate the remembrance of the Nativity of his Christ with his Friends in Germany? (for now that time of the year was at hand) And I know (said the Sultan) that thou art so addicted unto thy Superstition, that thou respectest the same more than thy Liberty. Truth (said Henry) mighty Prince, for Liberty would avail me nothing, if Christ by his most mild Mercies had not taken me away our Captivity; and therefore how much all men owe unto the reverend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, O King, didst also understand; which as I most heartily wish, so I would I could thereof persuade thee. God forbid (said the Sultan) for I remember that when I was chief Engineer unto thy Father at Konstanz in Livonia, and there did him good service, I was altogether of the Christian persuasion; but now having left that common Error, have therewith also changed my private Fortune. But as having concerning thy Liberty; wouldst thou therefore gladly be free, and so return home to thy Friends? That Nature craveth (said Henry) although my fortune gaineth, which yet dependeth on your pleasure; I desire indeed to return home, which if you should deny me, I must bid (said the Sultan) what I can need part; alluring my with my Wife Anna, with my beloved Sons, Henry, Leo and John, having long since celebrated my Funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceived, (said the Sultan) for I am sure that they know thou yet livest, and pray most heartily for thy return. Truly I owe much unto the remembrance of thy Father, and therefore this day give thee thy Liberty. And having so laid, furnished him with all things necessary, and gave him leave to depart with one Martin his Secretary, who taken with him, had born him company all the long time of his Captivity. So taking his leave of the Sultan, he came to Ptolemais; but shipping himself for Cyprus, he was by the way by certain Pyrates taken at Sea, and as a fugitive Captive brought back again unto the Sultan; who pitying his hard fortune, set him again at liberty, and by a ship let out for that purpose, transported him into Syria, where he was by the Queen of that Island his Aunt (as some say) honourably entertained, and so furnished of all things fit for his Estate. Departing thence he came to Marsilles, where after he had some few days refreshed himself, he from thence travelled by Land home into his own Country; where at the first he was not known of his own Children and Friends, as being grown old in prison, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at last found again, and by them known, he was of his Children joyfully received as their Father, and of his Subjects as their Prince. Howbeit he shortly after died, and was honourably buried in the Monastery of Delvany.

Thus in the whole course of this History it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions even the greatest Christian Princes of the West, to their immortal glory, from time to time undertook against the Enemies of Christ, and his most sacred Word, and for the relief of the poor distressed Christians in Syria and in the Land of Palestine; whereof as divers of them had right glorious success, unto the great profit of the Christian Common-wealth; so some of them answered not with like Event, as undertaken with too small strength, or otherwise overthrown by the difford or malice of the Christians themselves, rather than by the Enemies Force. Which nevertheless how unfortunately forever they fell out in the hands of such worthy men as undertook them, yet have they this glory, commendation, and comfort. That they were taken in hand for the honour of the Son of God, Christ Jesus, and the defence of his Verity, against the false Prophet Mahomet, and his most blasphemous Doctrine; so honourable and just a quarrel as might well become the greatness of the greatest Prince, yea of all the Princes of Christendom. Yet could not the worthiness thereof, even in those more zealous times, or the dangerous Estate of that part of the Christian, or the dangerous Estate of that part of the Christian, as an Common-Weal, even then like to perish, (as some others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poor oppressed Christians, crying out unto their Christian Brethren for aid, any whit move the Christian Princes of that time, with their combined Forces to reach unto them their helping hands, or to yield unto them any succor or relief; for they little feeling those harms so far off, and more regarding their own hereditary quarrels, employed those Forces one against another, unto the effusion of so much Christian blood, as might have sufficed not for relief of the distressed Christians in Syria only, but also to have regained whatsoever had been before from them taken by the Turks or Sarafins. The German Princes were fill at a jar about the choice of their Emperors; the French agreed not with the English, or them of the Low-Countries; neither the English with the Scots; the Arragonians were at odds with the French; and in Italy were almost as many deadly Factions as Provinces. Of which difford of the Christians (the greatest occasion of their ruin and decay.) Melchares the Egyptian Sultan underfanding by his Efpials, raised a great Army of the Mamelukes and others, with a full purpofe to have utterly rooted out all the remainders of the Chriftians in Syria and the Land of Paleftine, and fo to have entirely joyned thofe two great Countries unto his own Kingdom. But when he had fo maliciously devifed, he lived not to bring to pafs, being in the midft of thofe his great defigns taken away by fudden death. After whom Alphis (or as fome call him, Elpis) fucceeding him in the Kingdom, and with a puiffant Army entering into Syria, laid Siege to Tripolis, which he at length took by undermining it, and put to the Sword all the Chriftians therein (except fuch as by fpeedy flight had in time got themfelves out of the danger) and rafed the City down to the ground; which calamity befetted unto the Chriftians the ninth of April, in the year 1289. Prefently after, he had the ftrong Caftle of Nefefie yielded unto him, whereupon he put a ftrong Garrifon, to hinder the Chriftians from building again the late destroyed City. In like manner alfo he took the Cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he facked, and laid them flat with the ground. And after that, he removed to Tyre, which after three months Siege, was by the Citizens (now out of all hope of relief) yielded unto him, upon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in fafety depart. With like good Fortune he in good time, and as it were without refiftance, took all the reft of the ftrong Towns and Caftles which the Chriftians yet held in Syria and the Land of Paleftine, excepting only the City of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poor Chriftians fled as unto a Sanctuary, to be there defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hofpitales. Nothing now left unto them more than that ftrong City, the Sultan of his own accord made a Peace with them for the fpace of five years, fearing (as was them for) to have drawn upon him all the Chriftian Princes of the Welt, if he fhould at once have then utterly rooted out all the Chriftians in thofe Countries together.

The Chriftian Affairs thus brought to the laft caft in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the late obtained Peace; Peter Pelufie Master of the Templars, with the grand Master of the Knights Hofpitales, fuddenly paffed over (as Embaffadors from the reft) into Europe, unto Nicolaus quartus then Pope, craving his fatherly aid. Who moved with fo great miferies of the poor afflicted Chriftians, folicted the other Chriftian Princes to have fent them relief; efpecially Rodolph the German Emperour, who then ruled over the affairs of the Empire, and his Troubles nearer home, (as were the other Chriftian Princes alfo) gave good words, but no help at all. Yet fome of them under the colour thereof, got from their Subjects great fums of Money, which they implored to other worfe ufe; only the Pope fent fifteen hundred men at Arms, whom with devout perfuafion, and much earnest Preaching, he had induced to take upon them that fared Expedition, and entertained them of his own charge; unto whom alfo many others out of divers Countries, upon a Religious Zeal, joyned themfelves as voluntary men; who meeting together at Brudenburgh, and thence embarked with the two grand Masters of the Templars and Hofpitales, in fafety at length arrived at Ptolemais. There was then in the City a great number of People of all forts; of able men there was about fifty thoufand, and about forty thoufand of the weaker fort; amongst whom, divers Murders, Felonies, Rapes, and fuch other shameful Outrages; (all haftning the dreadful judgments of God) were daily committed, and let pafs unregarded, more than of them that were injured. For all the chief Commanders were then at variance among themfelves, every one of them laying claim (not worth a ruff) unto the vain Title of the Kingdom of Jerufalem. Henry King of Cyprus coming thither with a great Fleet, charged the Templars to deliver him the Crown of that Kingdom, which they had (as he faid) wrongfully taken from Americus and Guy his Ancestors. And Charles King of Sicily, who his Embaffadors laid claim unto the Title of that Kingdom. Thus unto the Kings of that Ifland; and underftanding it to be given unto Henry King of Cyprus, caufed all the Revenues of the Templars within his Dominion, to be brought into his Treafuries, and their Lands and Houfes to be fpoiled. Hugh alfo, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and nail, to defend the overborn Right that his Father and Grandfather had won that loft Kingdom. And the Count of Tripolis laid in for himfelf; That he was defended from Raymond of Telous; and that befide himfelf, remained no Prince of the ancient Nobility, which had won that Kingdom out of the hands of the Sarafins, and that without that regal Dignity did not of better right appear unto any other than unto himfelf. Neither did thefe four Princes more thrive for the Title of the loft Kingdom, than for the prefent Government of the City, ftraightway about to periff. The Pope Legate pretending the unto a right alfo; for that King John dreamed had himfelf fubjected it unto the See of Rome. As for the claim unto the City of Ptolemais, the Patriarch of Jerufalem challenged unto himfelf the Preheminence, for that the Metropolitane City of Tyre (under which the City of Ptolemais was the third Epifcopal Seat) was under his jurifdiction, given by the Decree of the Welt Church. The Templars alfo, and the Knights Hofpitales, whofe power in the City was at that time far the greateft, pretended the Government thereof of belt right to belong unto them, as the juft reward of their blood, already and afterward to be fpent in the defence thereof; promiffing great matters if it might be wholly referred unto them. Neither fpared the French King, or the King of England, by their Meffengers to claim the Sovereignty of the City, by their Predeceffors fometimes won. And they of Pifa having filly a Confil taken therein, by open Marriages with the natural Inhabitants, grown into great affinity with them, what they might to get the Government into their Hands. The Venetians alfo by their Authority and great Wealth, laboured to gain the good Will of the People; fparing therein no Coft. And they of Genoa, no lefs cunning than the reft, fupplanted the ftrongeft Factions, by giving aid both aptly and covertly unto the weaker; that fo having weaker fteps to many Competitors, to find a mean fteps up above the reft. But the greateft part of the People for all that were moft inclined unto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their nearnefs and power moft like of all other to ftand them in ftead. All thefe aimed at one mark, which was the Government and Command of the City; and moft of them had in view the fubverting proper Laws and Customs, to decide their Caufes and Controversies in. Whereby it came to pafs, that every man might without check or controulment

ment almoft do what he list, the offenders from one Court to another, removing their fuits as beft ferved their turns. Thus were murders (as is before faid) daily committed in the Streets, men abufed, houfes robbed, thops broken up, and many other outrages done; fo that judging of the wrath of God, and grief of all good men.

Division and diffention (the ruin of all Common-Weals) thus reigning in the City, the Souldiers of late fent thither, or in zeal come of themfelves, for the defence thereof, gave occasion for the more fpeedy destruction of the fame. Such is the power of the Ambiguity, in his wrath and judgments for fin, even by thofe things wherein we moft trust and joy, to work our utter ruine and destruction. Thefe Souldiers, for want of fuch pay as was promiffed them, were enforced to feek abroad; and therefore contrary to the League before made with the Egyptian Sultans, offendments went out in great parties into the Frontiers of his Territories, taking the fpoil of fuch things as they light upon. Whereof the Sultan underftanding, demanded by his Embaffadors, That reftitution might be made, and the offenders delivered unto him to be punifhed, according unto the League. But in that fo feck a late as dying Common-Weal, neither was reftitution made as reafon would, nor yet the Embaffadors courteoufly heard. With which Infoleny the Sultan provoked, fent Emilech Arapfus a notable Captain, (and as fome fay, his Son) with an hundred and fifty thoufand men, to befiege the City; who coming thither, and having made his approaches, had by a Mine in fhort time overthrowed a piece of the Wall; but in feeking to have entered by the breach, he found fuch ftrong refiftance, that he was glad with lofs to retire. Whilst Arapfus thus lay at the Siege of Ptolemais, Alphir the Sultan died at Damafcus; in whole ftead the Mamelukes made choice of this Arpufus for their Sultan; who more defirous of nothing, than of the glory of the utter rooting up of the Chriftians in Syria, was fo far from raifing of his Siege, (either for the death of the Sultan, or the news of his Kingdom) that he more ftraightly beleit the City than he had in the three months fpace that he had there lie before. Now had they in the City choften Peter the Master of the Templars, their Governor; a man of great experience and valour; unto whom, and the reft of the Nobility, the Sultan offered great rewards, and unto the Souldiers their pay, with free liberty to depart, fo that they might without any other aid unto him the City, which they could not long hold. Which his offer the Master rejected, and flatly told him, That he had not learned of his Ancestors, to fell for Money unto the Infidels a City bought with fo much Chriftian blood; either did fo much regard his vain threats, as therefore to forget his fervice due unto his Souldiers, Chrift and the Chriftian Common-Weal. Which arfter the Tyrant enraged, the next day with all his Forces affaulted the City, and therein fuch depofate and furious manner, as if he would even then have carried it; having before filled the ditch, and promiffed the Spoil unto his Souldiers, the more to encourage them. Yet having done what he could, and loft a number of his men, flain both in the affault, and in a Sally which the Chriftians made out at the fame time, he was enforced to retire back again into his Trenches. In this fo terrible an affault, not repulled without fome lofs alfo of the Chriftians, was the grand Master and Governor of the City wounded with a poyfoned Dart, whereof he died in three days after died: with whom the courage of the Defendants fainted alfo, no man being left like unto him to undertake fo great a charge, although many there were, that overweening themfelves defired the fame. In the beginning of this Siege the Chriftians had fent away all their aged and weak People, unfit for fervice, into Cyprus, where they in fafety arrived. But now many of the better fort, both Captains and others, discouraged, one after another conveyed thence away out of the City; of whom a great number in paffing thence to Cyprus, were upon the coast of the Ifland, together with the Patriarch drowned. In the City remained only twelve thoufand, which were thought fufficient for the defence thereof; who afterwards, as some report, fled alfo by Sea after their Fellows, and fo left the City empty unto the barbarous Enemy; fome others reporting of them more honourably, as that they fhould right valiantly defend the City againft the Affault of their Enemies, until fuch time as that moft of them being flain or wounded, and the reft by force driven from the Walls into the Market place, and there for a while notably defending themfelves, in flying thence unto the Ships, were by the way all cut in funder, or elfe drowned. But howsoever it was, the Sultan entering the City (by the Chriftians abandoned, or by force taken) gave the fpoil thereof unto his Souldiers; who after that had rifed every Corner thereof, by his Commandment fet it on fire and burnt it down to the ground; and digging up the very foundations of the Walls, Churches, and other publick or private buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no sign of any City at all; but purging the place even of the very heaps of the ftones and rubbidge left of the rafed City, made it a fit place for Husbandmen to plow and fow Corn in; which he did both there, at Sidon, Berytus, and other Towns along the Sea-coaft, becaufe they fhould never more ferve for a refuge unto thofe Chriftians, or give them footing again into thofe Countries. Thus together with Ptolemais was the name of the Chriftians utterly rooted out of Syria, and the Land of Paleftine, in the year 1291, about 192 years after the winning of Jerufalem by Godfrey of Bullion and the other Chriftian Princes his Confederates.

This lofs, attending to the great difgrace of the Chriftians in general, moved not a little even the greateft of the Chriftian Princes; wronged all or moft part of them in the perfons of the Templars or Knights Hofpitales, their Subjects, fo shamefully now quite cut out of Syria and the Land of Paleftine; howbeit, troubled with their own turbulent Affairs at home or with their neighbour Princes not at all, none of them once thirfted for the redrefs or revenge thereof. Only Calixtus the great Tartar Prince, having of late fubdued the Perfians, and married the Daughter of the Armenian King (a Lady of great perfection, and of a Mahometan become Chriftian) by the request of his Wife and his Father-in-Law, took the matter in hand. And for that purpofe having raifed a moft puiffant Army of two hundred thoufand fighting men, and aided by the Armenians and Georgians, paffing over the Mountain Annus into Syria, not far from the City Hama met with Melchamul, the Egyptian Sultan Lion, as with a mighty Army, whom he overthrowed in a great and mortal Batel, wherein forty thoufand of the Egyptians are reported to have been flain, and fo drove him quite out of Syria; fending Abais, one of his Captains, with part of his Army to purfue him, who never left him until he had chafed him over the defart Sands into Egypt. Thence the victorious Tartar after this Batel took the City of Hama, where lying upon the great Treafures of the Sultan, Sultan, he bountifully divided it, together with the Spoil, amongst his Soldiers, relieving nothing thereof unto himself, more than a Sarc and a Casker full of secret Letters. The Egyptians thus put to flight; he without resistance took in most of the Cities of Syria, with the City of Jerusalem also; which in many places by the Turks and Egyptians defaced, he again repaired; and together with the Temple, more than a Sarc and to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Christians, repairing thither out of Cyprus, Crete, and other places, to inhabit. And having himself honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his Army to Damascus, which was forthwith delivered unto him. But lying there, with purpose in Autumn following to march into Egypt, and to have utterly destroyed that Kingdom, he was certified of new troubles arising in Perfia, and some other parts of his Empire; for repressing whereof, he with the greatest part of his Army returned himself into Perfia, leaving one Casparus Governor of Damascus, who after the overthrow of the Sultan's Army had revolted unto him; and Molau (of whom we have before spoken) Governor of Jerusalem; commanding them at his departure to re-edifice the City of Tyre, and to send Embassadors unto the Christian Princes of the West, to join in League with them, for the more sure holding of those new gained Countries. And so Tyre was indeed repaired as he had commanded, and delivered to the Christians, with a convenient Garrison for the keeping thereof; but the Embassadors coming to the proud Bishop Boniface the Eighth, then Pope, whom of all others it seemed to have furthered their business, they could of him obtain nothing, but returned as he came. For he at the same time fallen out with Philip the French King, thundering out his Excommunications, discharging his Subjects of their Loyalty, and so much as in him was, depriving him of his Kingdom, had given the same unto Albertus Duke of Austria, whom he had declared Emperor; whereof arose great troubles. Besides that, he being of the Guelphs Faction was not in any thing more careful, than of the utter extinguishing of the contrary Faction of the Gibelines, especially of the most honourable Family of the Colonnas, of whom some he had slain, some he had deprived of their honours, some he had imprisoned, and driven other some into exile; so that this wickedly buffed for the maintenance of his own proud Estate, he had no leisure to further the good of the Christian Common-Weal; which his intolerable pride, and forgetfulness of duty long escaped not the revenging hand of God; being when he thought least, suddenly taken prisoner at his Fathers house in the City of Anagnin (where he was born) by Sara Columella his mortal Enemy; whom but lately before redeemed out of a Pirats Gally, the French King had sent for that purpose, with one Lougaris (or as some call him, Negars) a French Knight; by whom the proud Prelat brought to Rome, in the Castle of S. Angelo within five and thirty days after most miserably died in his madnes (as some report) renting himself with his Teeth, and devouring his own Fingers. This worthy Tartar Prince Casim (by whom the Christian Common-Weal might have again riden Syria and the Land of Palestine, had not the pride of the great Bishop, and the diffidence of the Christian Princes hindered the same) was (as Aldonus writeth, who was present in this War, following his Uncle the Armenian King) a man of a very short stature, and exceeding hairy, but with a Valour, Bounty, and other Vertues of the Mind, plentifully recompensing what wanted in the Feature of his Body. After whose departure into Perfia, Casparus Governor of Damascus, considering that the power of the Tartars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Christian Princes of the West; to recompence his former Treason of revolting from the Sultan, with a new revolt from the Tartar, rose up into open Rebellion, drawing after him not only the City of Damascus, but the greater part of Syria also. Whereof Molau Governor of Jerusalem, understanding, was about to have gone against him with his Tartars; but advertised by his Ephials, that Casparus in this his Conspiracy had compacted with the Egyptian Sultan, also perceiving himself too weak to withstand so great a power, retired with his Tartars into Mesopotamia, there expecting new Supplies both from Casim and the King of Armenia. Of whose departure out of Syria the Egyptian Sultan understanding, came directly with his Army to Jerusalem, which he took (being forsaken of the Inhabitants) and prophaned the Temple, sparing only the Sepulchre of our Saviour; at the humble request of the Religious, making there a greater shew of Devotion, than of Cruelty. After that, he won all the other lesser Towns, which the Tartars had either kept for themselves, or given to the other Christians, and utterly rased all the Forts of the Hospitallers and Templars, which valiant men, without other help, for the space of almost a year, held out against the Tyrant, in which time most of them were honourably slain; the rest that were left alive being taken by the Enemy, had nevertheless leave given with bag and baggage in safety to depart, having before by solemn Oath for ever abjured the Country of Syria; and these were other help, the great ornaments of the Christian Common-Weal, the Hospitallers and Templars, which to the utmost of their power had by the space of three hundred years right worthily defended both the Christians and the Christian Religion, against the Infidels in Syria, and the Holy Land, were now for ever driven out thence about the year of our Lord 1300, to the great dishonour of all Christendom.

Wherefore with them now taking our leave of Syria, and the Holy Land, leaving the same in the possession of the Egyptian Sultan and the Mamluks, although it were shortly after like enough to have been again recovered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar Prince Casim, and their domesticall troubles letted; we will again return to the troubled Affairs of the Turks in the lesser Asia, whither the course of the time had somewhat before called us, with the accidents thereof, more proper to our purpose, and the argument we have in hand, but that all cannot be at once told; and for the better understanding of the devious Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to break off the course of the aforesaid History, drawing to near to an end, but to make him partaker of the heaviness thereof.

Now had the Turks no Kingdom left in the lesser Asia, and that also at the pleasure of Gazan and the great Tartar Cham divided betwixt Moset and Casubades, as his Vassals, bound unto him by a yearly Tribute, as is aforesaid; who both kept in awe by the greatness of the Tartar, did nothing worth the remembrance, but as they lived, so also died, almost buried in obscurity. Of these two, Moset died without issue; but Casubades departing left behind him his Son Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the Second succeeding in the Kingdom united again the same before divided, yet paying him Tribute unto the Tartar his Sovereign, as had his Father with the other late Sultans of the Turks before him. Much it was not that this

Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time began to decline, and not to lie so heavy upon the Turks as before. He was a man of a quiet Spirit, and therefore much delighted in Peace; a great Friend to Orkhan the first founder of the glorious and mighty Orkhan Empire, as in his life shall appear. But this Aladin, the last of the Turks Sultans of the Seleucian Family, dying without issue; one Sabiz his Vicer-Azemes, or chief Counsellor, and a man of great Authority, aspired unto the Kingdom, which he had for the most part himself swayed all the Reign of the late Sultan his Master; which usurped Sovereignty, no way unto him due, he could neither himself long hold, or deliver unto his Posterity; for that many others of the Nobility, men of great Power, and born of greater Families than he, envying at his honour, and disdaining to be governed by him, or any other no greater than themselves, laid hold, some upon one Country or Province, some upon another, where they were able to do most, erecting unto themselves greater or lesser Satrapies, according to the measure of their own Strength and Power, without respect of any Superiority one should have over another, but every one of them absolutely commanding over so much as he was able by strong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, that the great Monarchies destitute of their lawful heirs, in his time, or all become rich Preys unto such as could first lay strong hand upon them, even so fell it now out in the great Kingdom of the Turks, every one of their great Princes, measuring the greatness of his Territory, not by the measure of his right, but by the strength of his own power. Wherein they shared so well for themselves, that Sabiz lay in possession of all, was in short time thrust quite out of all; and so the great Kingdom of the Turks in the lesser Asia, brought unto a meer Anarchie; no King now left among them, the whole Kingdom being divided into divers Satrapies, or other lesser Territories. The greatest of these Princes that thus shared the Turks Kingdom amongst them, was one Caraman Alfrinus; who as strong, took unto him the City of Ikonium, the Regal seat of the Turkish Sultans, with all the great Country of Cilicia, and some part of the Frontiers of the Countries of Lyconia, Pamphilia, Caria, and the greater Phrygia, as far as Voladephia, and the City of Antioch upon the River Mander. All which large Territory, was of him afterward called Caramania, and by the same name is commonly at this day known, and by our late Geographers described. Of this Caraman also descended the Caramanian Kings, who of long time after unfortunately strove with the Orkhanian Sultans for the Sovereignty of their Empires; until that at length they, with their Kingdom, and all the rest of these Turkish Satrapies, were in the fatal greatness of the Orkhan Empire, swallowed up and devoured, as in the process of this History shall (if God so will) in due time and place be declared. Next Neighbour unto him was Saruchan, of the Greeks called Sarban, of whom the Country of Ionnia Mavritima was and yet is called Saru-Chan-Li, and Saruchania, thas to say, Saruchan Country. The greatest part of Lydia, with some part also of the greater Mysia, Troas, and Phrygia, fell to Calamus and his Son Carafus, of whom it is called Carafus, or Caraf-Li, (or as we might say) Carafus his Country. The greatest part of the ancient Mysia, with some part of Lydia, was possessed by Aidin, and was of him called Adimia, or Aidin-Li, as his Country. Some part of a City in the Country of Pontus, with the Cities of Heraclea, Parica, Calymna, Synope, and others near unto the Euxine, and the Country of Ephlogenia, fell into the hands of the Sons of Ormer, or as the Greeks call him, Amur; of whom that Country took not its name, as did the others, of such Princes as possessed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a City in that Country by the Turks so named. As was also Mendefia, or as some call it Mendefia, a Country in the lesser Asia, so by the Turks called of Alender or Myndus, a City in Caria. There were beside these, divers other places and Toparchies in the lesser Asia, which in the naming of this great Kingdom, from the Turks received names, before unto the world unknown; all which to prosecute were tedious. Let it suffice us, for the manifesting of the Turks Anarchie, and the ruin of their Kingdom in the lesser Asia, as in part also for the more evidence of the heavy History following, to have remembered these as the chiefest, especially such as took their names of such great Princes or Captains as in that so great a confusion of the Turks Kingdom, by strong hand first seized upon them, and so left them to their posterity, of whom much is to be said hereafter. These Princes one and all that thus shared the late Aladinian Kingdom, were descended of the better sort of the Turks, which with the Seleucian and Aladinian Sultans driven out of Perfia by the Tartars, had under them feared themselves in the lesser Asia, as is before at large declared. Now amongst these great men that thus divided the Turks Kingdom, most of them that wrote of the Turks Affairs, both Greeks and Latines, reckon up Orkhan (the raiser of his House and Family) for one, who indeed in the later time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flourish, and was of him for his Valour extraordinarily favoured (as in this History shall appear); but of his Kingdom held no more than one poor Lordship, called Sagura in Bithynia, not being from the Mountain Olympos, (long before given unto his Father Ertoghras, for his good service) with such other small holds thereabouts, as he had himself gained from the weak Christians his Neighbours. For although he were a Turk born, yet was he not of the Seleucian Family, as were the rest, but of another House and Tribe, and therefore not of them favoured or thought to have so good right to any of the late Sultans Provinces or Territories, as they had, who being of his House, and holden with the prescription of time, envied at the sudden rising of the Orkhanian Turk, being to them as it were a moor stranger; whose fortune for all that (I know not by what secret foreknowledge) they seemed to fear, as in time to grow dangerous unto them and their Posterity; wherein they were no whit deceived. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be said hereafter; leave we him now therefore with the rest unto their fortunes in this the Turks Anarchie, and so conclude this part of our General History: Glad when I look back to have waded thus far, yet fearing to be drowned before I get over; such a Sea of Matter and World of Troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toil, and that in long time to be passed through.

By things
change*

WHAT small assurance there is in mens Affairs, and how subject unto change even those things are wherein we for the most part repose our greatest felicity and bliss, (beside that the whole course of mans frail life, by many notable Examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainly manifest the same, than the heavy Events and woful Destructions of the greatest Kingdoms and Empires; which founded upon great Fortunes, increased with perpetual Success, exalted by exceeding Power, established with most puissant Armies, wholefome Laws, and deep Counsels; have yet grown old, and in time come to nought: So that even as men, all things else belonging unto man, are subject unto the inevitable course of Destiny, or more truly to say, unto the fatal doom of the molt High, prefixing unto every thing that in time begun, a time also wherein to take end, being himself without time the great Commander thereof, and of all things else done therein. The Fame of the first Assyrian Monarchy, is very ancient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it nevertheless found an end; and the more to put us in remembrance of our infirmity, was never with so much glory and valour by Ninus erected, as it was with shame and cowardise by Sardanapalus subverted. With like necessity fell the great Empire of the Medes and Persians, the time thereof being come: And after them the Macedonians also. Neither hath the great Roman Empire, or the proud City of Rome it self (sometime the Mistress of the World) herein found any exemption, but run the same course with the rest; which grown great with continual Triumphs, and so strong as that it was not with foreign Power to be shaken; converted the Forces of it self upon it self, to the overthrow of the ancient liberty thereof, together with the utter subversion of the State. After which time that mighty Monarchy (of all that ever yet were, the greatest) under the Roman Emperors felt many an hard and perilous storm, and by little and little still declining (though sometimes like a sick aged body, by the valour or vertue of some one or other her worthy Emperors, a little relieved, and by and by again cast down by the folly or negligence of some others succeeding) it became at length a Prey unto a foolish, rude and barbarous Nation, which it had before oftentimes overcome, and over which many the Roman Captains had triumphed, and thereof taken their glorious Surnames; which now again without compassion, burning and sucking it, caused it to flop, and to yield unto the servile yoke which it had in former time proudly imposed upon the Necks of others; wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then sitting at the Helm (although that may also much help the matter as a mean) but the instability of worldly things, never permanent, but always changeable, and the sooner for their height; and that so forcibly, as that no man knoweth how to remedy the same; or if he did, were able to perform it; the greatest means that men could possibly devise for the stay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater Power from above, converted unto the more speedily effecting of that, against the which they were by mans wisdom provided. The like might be said of the Athenians, Athenians, the Lacedemonians, the Thebanes, and of whom not? What marvel then, if the ancient Kingdoms of the Turks likewise in Perſia, and the leſſer Aſia, in Syria, Paleſtine, and Egypt, having run their appointed times, mightily impugned by the Chriſtians, oppreſſed on the one ſide by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themſelves rent in ſunder (their Deſtiny fo requiring) loſt at laſt their wonted Maſteſty, and to fell into a moſt Anarchie, as in the former part of this Hiſtory is at large declared? Yet in this far more than any other People fortunate. That after the ruin of their former Kingdoms, ſtraight way out of themſelves ariſe another, namely this Othoman Monarchy, the chief object of this Hiſtory; which at the firſt fearce of the World perceived, or of themſelves regarded, in ſhort time ſo proſpered, as that the Power and Glory thereof obſcured not their former Kingdoms only (nothing, in compariſon of this) but even the greateſt Monarchies of the World; over a great part of which, it now ſo proudly triumpheth, as if it ſhould never have and, and the Beauty whereof the World wondreth, and at the Power thereof quake; within the greateſtneſs whereof are contained ſo many portions of Aſia, Europe and Africa, but even the moſt famous and fruitful Kingdoms thereof; no part of the World left untouched but America only; not more fortunate with rich Mines than that is ſo far from being great and dangerous an Enemy. The foundation of this ſo great a Kingdom (and now ſo mighty an Empire, as holdeth the World in awe) was firſt laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turks call him, Osman: not defended of the Seleucian Family, as were all the former Turks Sultans, but of the Oguzian Tribe and Kindred; in whoſe line this glorious Empire hath ever ſince, to the attainment of the World, wonderfully flouriſhed. But ſo far as both his greateſtneſs, and the greateſtneſs of the reſt of the Othoman Kings and Emperors his Progenitors, took their beginning from this worthy and warlike Othoman, with whoſe Life and Doings we purpoſe to begin this part of our Hiſtory, it ſhall not be amiſs both for the continuation of that we have in hand, with that we have already written, and for the more manifiſtation of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fetch his Race and Deſcent aloft; not meaning with a long and ſeigned Pedegree to ſet him out of Noah his Ark, (which continual Succeſſion of Princes, no Nation of the World, be it never ſo ancient, the Jews only excepted, and they alſo by Writings and Hiſtories as much as was poſſible eternized, could truly and juſtly challenge) but only to ſo far as it ſhall be pertinent unto our purpoſe, and by the authority of good Hiſtorians to be aſſured.

At ſuch time as the Turks Kingdom founded by Tamgrolipix in Perſia, flouriſhed in the Seleucian Princes his Succeſſors, there was alſo another Kingdom of theirs at the City of Machan, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other, either in Glory or Power. In this City, and over this ſmall Kingdom, reigned one Solyman, by his Subjects honoured alſo with the name of a Sultan or King; at the ſame time that the Tartars under the leading of old Zingis their great Captain, leaving their own Country, and bearing down the World before them, having conquered the fartheſt parts of the Eaſt, and there ſeated their Kingdom, turned their Forces into Perſia, and there overthrew the Turks Kingdom at Balch, in Coraſan, and drove the Turks with Curmeſes their laſt King, out of the Country; after that they had there from the time of Tamgrolipix reigned about an hundred and ſeventy two years.

This Solyman of whom we ſpeak, then reigning at Machan, was not of the Seleucian Family (as were all the other Turks Sultans, the Succeſſors of Tamgrolipix, but of the Oguzian Tribe, a Family famous alſo amongst the Turks; who ſprung from the Seleucian Sultan Curmeſes (or as ſome call him, Cuſmeſes); his Countryman, bearing his Kingdom by the Tartar, and his Country over-run, and the great Chalf of Babylon alſo overthrown; thought it not good longer to ſtay in that Country which he could not hold, but by ſpeedy flight betimes to provide for the ſafety of himſelf and of ſuch his Subjects as would follow him; and hearing that Aladin the Son Ker-Huſien, or as the Greeks call him, Cai-Capſes (a great man of the Seleucian Family, and near of kin unto the late Sultan Curmeſes) who for fear of the Tartars but lately come into Romania, Aſiatica, had there by force of Arms moſt honourably ſeated himſelf and the Turks his followers, amongst the Chriſtians, in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeal towards his Superſtition (accounting all well gotten that was gained from the Chriſtians) took his way after him, with ſuch of his Kinſmen and Subjects as would accompany him in his new adventures. And coming to Arceps, a City in the borders of Armenia, he ſet himſelf to the ſiege of the year ſeated himſelf with his followers, being in number many; who with their Wives and Children, after the manner of the Tartar Nomades their Anceſtors, in poor Tents and Carcs covered with a courſe kind of Cloth, had followed him; being indeed nothing elſe but a very rude and rough kind of ſturdy Herdſmen, not wedded to any place, but ſtill removing with their Tents and Carcs up and down, as beſt ſerved for their purpoſe and the feeding of their Cattle, as do the Turcoman Nation, the true deſcent of the Turks, in many places of Aſia at this day; and were therefore not only called Nomades, that is to ſay, Herdſmen, (by which name the proud Fanizaries will oftentimes in contempt call even the greateſt of the natural Turks) but Hamaſephoretes, and Hamaſebis, that is to ſay, people carried or living in Carcs. Solyman having ſaid a while about Erzerum, removing thence came to Anaſia; and there ſpying the Country, then inhabited by the Chriſtians, did them much harm, oftentimes encountering them in the plain field, and ſometimes ſeizing upon their Towns and Cities, until he had ſubdued unto himſelf a right large Territory; yea at length having in ſo many Battles by him fought and Cities by him beſieged, loſt a great number of his People, and ſo wearied the reſt as they were not willing farther to follow him; and fearing alſo with ſuch ſmall power as he had left, to be able to defend and keep the Country by him already gotten, in the midſt of ſo many Enemies, thought it beſt to ſeek thence, and to ſeek his better fortune elſewhere. At the ſame time it was richly reported, that the affairs of Perſia, after ſo long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow again to ſome good quiet, the fury of the Tartars being now well abated, and that ſtorm overblown; wherefore Solyman reſolved now to return home again, and to viſit his Native Country, of him and his people above all others deſired. So paſſing thorough Syria, (for that was now his way) near Aleppo he ſetled upon a Cattle called Ziaber-Cala, and there ſtaid a ſpace for the reſtoring of his people. Afterward ſetting forward again, he came at length to the great great and famous River Euphrates, over which he muſt needs paſs; but finding there neither Bridge nor Ford, or other means to get over, he ſtood ſtill as a man diffaid, not knowing what to do. Stay there he would not, and go further he could not; his deſire bid him go, but the great River ſaid no. In this perplexity Solyman himſelf with his Horſe offered to ſwim the River, in hope to have found ſome paſſage; but finding none, adventuring too far, was with the force of the ſtream carried away, and ſo together with his Horſe drowned. His body after long ſeeking being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his People buried near unto the Cattle Ziaber, not long before by him taken; whereof they ſay the place is now in their Tongue called Meſeri-Zarue, (viz.) the Turks Grave. Some of theſe Oguzian Turks, after the death of their Sultan, weary of their long travel, ſeated themſelves in the Country thereabouts, unto whom the Turks that now do hold that Caſtle do refer their beginning. The reſt of that great Tribe and Family diversly divided, went unto divers places as their fortunes led them; ſome of them into the waſt ground and deſerts of Arabia and Syria, and are at this day called the Damaſceni Turcomans; other ſome returned back again into Romania, the way that they came; of whom ſome are deſcended the Zirgians, who dwell in Armenia; who yet with their Wives and Children, as Herdſmen in great companies wander up and down the Country, after the manner of their Anceſtors.

Solyman thus loſt, left four Sons, Secur-Telen, Tamgrolis, Ertegrol, and the ſecond Ordoſtol (the Father of this Othoman Founder of the Turks Empire that now is) and Dunder. With theſe four Brethren, moſt part of theſe Oguzian Turks that were left, returning into Romania (as is aforeſaid) after they had there reſtored themſelves a while, marching up along the River Euphrates, came to a place called Palm-Oraſi, about ten miles above Artemis, where Ertegrol and his Brother Dunder, with four hundred Families, not willing to go any farther, ſtayed with their Tents and Carcs, their beſt Dwelling. Secur and Tamgrolis their other two Brethren, in the mean time paſſing the River, returned with the reſt into Perſia; whom there leave unto their unknown fortunes. In this place Ertegrol with his Brother and his three Sons ſtaid a while, and had divers conflicts with the Country People thereabout, until that at length he thought it beſt to return again into Romania. So ſetting forward he came to Anaſia, and from thence unto the black Mountains, and ſo to a plain called of the Turks Sultan Ughi, about 75 miles Eaſtward from the City of Nice in Bithynia, where he had many skirmiſhes with the Chriſtians.

Now a great while before that, Aladin the Elder (of whom we have before ſpoken in the former part of this Hiſtory) ſed out of Perſia, had ſubdued divers great Provinces and Cities in Romania Aſiatica, or the leſſer Aſia, for ſo it is more truly called; ſo that he was of all the People thereabouts accounted for a great Prince, and of the Turks themſelves honoured with the name of their Ulu Padſchabek, that is to ſay, their great King or Emperor. Having placed his Regal Seat firſt at Sabaſia, and afterward at Icomium; which two Cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein reigned, as did ſome few of his Poſterity after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertegrol ignorant of the Honour, Glory and Power of this great Sultan; but having three Sons, namely Tamgrol, Sergatin, and Ordoſtol, ſent Sergatin his ſecond Son (a bold well ſpoken man) unto him, to requeſt him in that his ſo large a Kingdom, as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to grant unto them his poor called Countrymen, of long time oppreſſed with divers fortunes, ſome ſmall corner for them, with their Families and Cattle to reſt in. Which his requeſt, the Sultan not forgetful of his own diſtreſs ſome-time in like caſe, graciously heard, and with great careſſe uſed the Meſſengers, and now for furtherance of his ſuit it ſortuned, that this Sultan before driven out of Perſia by the Tartars, and by them alſo much troubled in theſe his new gotten Countries in the leſſer Aſia, had with them divers hot ſkirmiſhes and ſharp conflicts; in one of which it ſortuned the Sultan himſelf, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beaten by his Enemies, and in danger to have loſt the day; when as Ertegrol, but newly come into the Country, and willing to do the Sultan ſervice, and awaiting alſo opportunities for the commendation of himſelf and his followers; upon the ſudden unlooked for, with four hundred men came upon the backs of the Tartars, then almoſt in poſſeſſion of a great Victory, and ſo forcibly charged them, that unable to endure the charge, and to maintain the fight againſt the Sultan, (whoſe men encouraged by this unexpected aid, as by ſuccor from Heaven, began now to fight with greater courage) being beaten before and behind hardly beſet by the men in poſſeſſion of the Victory they had before aſſured themſelves of, turned their backs and fled. After which good ſervice, the Sultan honourably welcomed this new come Turk, giving him his Hand to kiſs, as the manner of the Nation is; and highly commending his Valour, and ſome hundred men came to be caſt upon him (amongſt thoſe Eaſtern Nations a great honour) and all his Souldiers to be boundly rewarded; and preſently after gave unto Ertegrol and his Turks a Country Village called Suguta, betwixt the Cattle Bilezuga and the Mountain Imolus in the greater Phrygia; in which Village they might live in Winter, and upon the aforeſaid Mountain, and the Mountain Ormenius, betwixt the Rivers Sangarius and Licus, ſed their Cattel in Summer. And yet not ſo contented thus to have honoured him, in whom he ſaw ſuch approved Valour, committed to his protection that ſide of the Country wherein he dwelt, being in the very frontiers of his Kingdom; which he charged he ſo well looked unto, that all the Country thereabout, before much infeſted with the often incursions of the Enemy, was by his vigilant care and proweſs well ſecured.

Thus is Ertegrol the Oguzian Turk, with his homely Herdſmen, become a perry Lord of a Country Village, and in good favour with the Sultan; whole followers, as ſturdy Herdſmen with their Families, lived in Winter with him in Suguta; but in Summer in Tents, with their Cattel upon the Mountains. Having thus lived certain years, and brought great Peace unto his Neighbours, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks, before much troubled with the invasion of the Tartars, it ſortuned that the Chriſtians of Cara-Chiſar (a Caſtle thereby, called by the ancient Greeks, Melanoprogen, and of later time, Maurocannon, that is to ſay, the black Tower or Caſtle) weary of their own eaſe, and of the Peace they had by his care enjoyed, fell out with him, and evil entreated both him and his People. Which by their ingratitude he taking in evil part, thereof, and of the wrongs by them done unto the Turks, ſo grievouſly complained unto the Sultan, that he therewith moved, raiſed a great Army, and to himſelf in perſon came and beſieged the Caſtle. But lying there at the Siege, news was brought him, him, that the Tartars with a great Army under the leading of one Bainan, were entered into Caria, and there spoiling the Country, had taken Heraclea. For the relieving of whom, the Sultan was glad to rise with his Army; yet leaving a sufficient strength behind him for the continuing of the Siege, under the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for so the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountering with the Tartars at Bage, overthrew them in a great Battle. Whilst Ertogrul in the mean space hardly besieged Caracifer, wherein fortune so much favoured him, that at length he took the Castle; the Spoil whereof he gave unto the Souldiers, reserving only the fifth part thereof, as due unto the Sultan; which he sent him for a Present, together with the Captains of the Castle, who he had taken alive; which Captain the Sultan afterward enlarged, and restored again to him his Castle, for the payment of a yearly Tribute, which he truly paid during the life of the Sultan; but he dying about two years after, he refused any more to pay it, and so revolted from the Turks.

Small things in time of trouble yield unto the will great content.

Sultan Aladin, Founder of the Aladinian Kingdom (for so the Turks call it) being dead at Iconium, after him succeeded Asanin his Eldest Son, and after him Tahsin his younger Brother; who slain by Theodoros Lascaris the Greek Emperor, (as is before declared) after him succeeded in that Kingdom another Tahsin, the Son of that Prince, who was by the Tartars expelled, and his Kingdom subdued, as in the former part of this History it appeareth. After which time the Seluzian Family there also by the Tartars in the latter Asia depopulated, retained scarce the name and shadow of their former Majesty and Glory. In which troublesome times, and when the State of Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the World, kept himself close in his house at Suguta, as well contented therewith as with a Kingdom; seeking by all means to keep Peace on every side with his Neighbours, as well Christians as others. In which quiet kind of life he sweetly passed over the troublesome times of Myfon the Son of Re-Oubates, and of Re-Oubates the Son of Re-Oubates, both Sultans, but the great Tartars Tributaries, and reigning but at their pleasure, until the time of the Second Aladin, the sole and last Heir of the Iconian Kingdom, before by the Tartars divided, which was no few years. All which time Ertogrul lived quiet at Suguta, as one amongst many other of the Iconian Sultans Subjects, wisely considering the fall of the Seluzian Sultans, both in Perfia and at Iconium, as also the ruin of his own House and Family, both from Royal State brought almost unto nothing; and therefore with patience taking the World as it came, and making a virtue of necessity, contenting himself with a little, bare himself kindly towards all men. In which contented kind of life he grew to great years, with his three Sons, greatly beloved and honoured of their Neighbours, as well Christians as Turks; and no less favoured by the second Aladin than Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him; whom the young men his Sons after the manner of their Nation (forbidding them with empty hands to salute their Princes) oftentimes visited with one Present or other. In all which his Sons were many good parts to be seen, yet so, as that in Othoman was easily to be seen a greater Courage and Spirit than in the other two his Brethren; which was the cause that he was more by them of his Tribe regarded, but especially of the youthful and warlike sort, which commonly resorted unto him when he went to hawk or hunt, or to other delights of the Field

(the counterfeits of War) and was of them commonly called Othman Gaziz, that is to say, Othman the Warlike.

In this frontier Country near unto Suguta, the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin divers Lieutenants and Captains, Governors of his Castles and strong Holds upon those frontiers, with whom Othoman was well acquainted, and unto whom he for Friendship sake oftentimes resorted; but especially unto the Captain of In-Ungi, for that he knew himself to be of him well beloved, and therefore unto him very welcome. So it happened upon a time, that as Othoman, being yet but young, was going to make merry with the Governor of Eski-Chifur, a Castle about four and twenty miles off, called of the Greeks, Palaeofaron by the way as he went, at a place called Iburne (a Town in Phrygia) chanced there to see, and afterwards to fall in liking of a fair maiden called Malbatun; unto whom his affection daily increasing, he without his Fathers knowledge, sent a secret Friend of his to treat with her of Marriage. Which after long discourse to her made concerning Othoman's affection and request, gave him answer, that betwixt Othoman and her was great inequality, of such as wished to live a happy life in well-to-do bands; for she was (as the said friend) mostly born, and therefore was not to expect to get a match; whereas he could not want choice of other Maids of more worth, and in all respects more answerable unto himself. But among other causes why he gave him this answer, one was, for that some that withed her well, and put into her head, that Othoman meant not indeed to marry her, but under that colour to detain of her some few days pleasure, had to having dishonoured her, afterward again to cast her off; which was indeed far from his thoughts; for he the more inflamed with her modest denial, the more desired her for his Wife. In the mean time Othoman going again unto the Governor of Eski-Chifur, and courteously by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth among familiar Friends in their merriments) to fall in speech of his Love, with greater affection than discretion, commending her Beauty, her Feature, and gracious Perfections, not dissembling also, to her greater praise, the repulse by him received at hands. Whilch the Governor hearing, seemed greatly to like of his choice, saying, that she was by the Divine providence (for so the Turks religiously use to speak) appointed only for him to have. But in the mean time sorely inflamed with the immediate commendation of Othoman, without respect of Friendship, he began to grow amorous of her himself, whom he had never seen; so light is that foolish affection; and that so far, as that being otherwise a man of good discretion, he was not able to conceal or cover these new conceived flames, but that Othoman by certain conjectures and tokens perceived the fact. And yet dissembling the matter as if he had suspected nothing, being risen from the Banquet, calling unto him one of his trusty Servants, secretly sent him away unto certain of the Maids Friends, willing them in his name, as they rendered her honour, presently to send her away unto some safe place further off, for fear the were not long taken from them by a great man more amorous of her person, than respective of her honour. And by and by after taking leave of his unfaithful Friend and bidding him farewell, took his way to the Captain of In-Ungi, whom he knew to be his dear Friend. But whilst he there stayed certain days, passing the time in hawking, hunting, and

and other youthful disports, with the Captain his Friend; the Governor of Eski-Chifur, who commanded all the Country thereabout called Sultan-Ungi, sent one of his trusty Servants to Iburne, to see fair Malbatun, and how all things went there. Who coming thither, and understanding of her secret departure, and that by the advertisement from Othoman he was conveyed to certain of her Friends afar off, at his return from point to point certified his Master thereof; who exceedingly grieved with the report, and fretting above measure to see himself so deluded by Othoman, presently sent unto the Captain of In-Ungi, (being within his jurisdiction) to command him without delay to deliver Othoman unto him. But he loving of him well, as a faithful man unto his Friend, could with no threats or intreaty be persuaded so to do. Wherefore the Governor in a great rage presently raising the greatest Power he was able to make, came to the Castle of In-Ungi, requiring to have Othoman forthwith delivered unto him. Where among the Souldiers there in Garrison with the Captain, began to arise divers opinions; some wishing, for the averting of the present danger for which they were now unprovided, to have him delivered; and other some abhorring so treacherous a fact, willing rather to endure all extremities, to contend after much consultation honestly prevailed, and it was generally resolved, that he should be defended, who could not without their great infamy be delivered. But Othoman terrified with that diversity of opinions, which had even at first showed in fact, and thinking it not for his safety, to commit himself unto the trust of such wavering men, entered into a deep conceit of a matter of great adventure, which was, by a sudden fall to make himself way through the midst of his Enemies. Wherewith having made his Brother Jandus and those few his followers there present acquainted, and thereupon resolved; he secretly called out, and by plain force brake through the midst of them, and so took his way towards Suguta, still noably repelling them that were sent to pursue him. But being come into the Frontiers of his Fathers Territory, and the report of his dangers known, and that being but weakly accompanied, he was by a great number of his Enemies pursued; presently all the lusty youths and such as loved him well, took horse to come to his rescue; who meeting with the Governors Souldiers, that had Othoman in chase, in a sharp conflict slew divers of them, and put the rest to flight. Of whom some were also taken Prisoners, and amongst the rest one Michael Caffi a Christian, Captain of a little Castle in that Country, called Hirmer-Caia, or the Rock of Ormeni; Of whom Othoman taking compassion, freely pardoned him that offence. With which unexpected curtesy he was so moved, that ever after he took part with him, and did him great service in his Wars; whose Posterity hath ever since even until this our age continued, next unto the Othoman Family, most honourable and famous amongst the Turks, by the name of Michael Oghis, that is to say, the Sons or Posterity of Michael.

Ertogrul now spent with age, shortly after died, in the year of our Lord 1183, having lived 92 years, and thereof governed the Othoman Family after the death of his Father Solymen, 52. His death was of all his Tribe and Kindred generally lamented; and his body after the Turkish manner honourably buried at Suguta, where he had of long time lived.

After whose death, these plain Othoman Turks, in a general Assembly consulting whom they might chuse for their Lord and Governor in stead of old Ertogrul; casting their eyes especially upon two, flood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although most men were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and virtues as well of body as of mind, was to be preferred before the rest of his brethren the Sons of Ertogrul; yet were there some, and they also men of great gravity and experience, who had in suspect the young mans age, as of it felt slippery, and for the most part prone to vice, especially in the liberty of great power; and therefore thought it better to make choice of Dundur (Ertogrul's Brother) and Othmann Ungle a man of far greater gravity, judgment, and experience. But Dundur himself being undecide a wife man, and far from all ambition, perfwaded them in that choice not to have any regard at all unto his honour or preference, but to consider what were best for their State and Welfare in general. For he providently foresaw in what danger the Othoman State stood, exposed on one side to the mortal hatred and treacheries of the Greeks, grieved to see themselves spoiled by the Turks, and naturally hating them for the Alahmetan Religion; and on the other side not fairly back by the Sultans of Iconium, brought in thirraldom to the Tartars, and daily grown weaker and weaker; hence which inconveniences and dangers (he said) an old, weak, and overgrown body (as his was) could give no help or remedy at all, but required the help of a wife, politic, vigilant, stirring and valiant man, such as all well knew was Othoman his Brother's Son. Thus before he came unto the election, he in private declared his mind unto the chief of the Othoman Family; and afterward at their request coming to the general Assembly, all mens minds and eyes now fixed upon Othoman, he first of all (by his example to encourage the rest) for the good of the Othoman Tribe, his ancient House and Family, saluted him their great Lord and Governor, promising unto him all Loyalty, with the utmost of his service; whereunto by and by ensued the great applause of the rest of the People, as unto a Governor sent unto them by God; unto whom they joyfully wished all happy success, with long life and a prosperous Government. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great Governor of the Othoman Turks, and so became among them a great Commander, and honoured with the Title of Othman-Beg, or the Lord Othman. Yet was this his honour included in a small circuit, plain and honestly, without any great Pomp or Show, commanding amongst rough and rude Hardhearted men and Shepherds, not acquainted with the curtesy of other more civil Nations; for as yet they were the same homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perfwaded to forsake their wonted rude and uncivil manners; by long tradition received from their Ancestors, and so be agreeing with their Nature and Calling. Amongst which rude Hardhearted men, this new Governor himself, not too far exceeding the rest in civility, commanded much like unto another Romulus; of whom also the Turks report many such things as do the Romans of their Founder, which for brevity I thought good to pass over.

Now it happened that Othoman, even in the beginning of his Government felt first at odds with one Hagimichelau, or S. Nicolas (Captain of Eginio), a Castle there by; for that he had oftentimes of purpose troubled and molested these Othoman Hardhearted men, in passing to and fro with their Cattel by his Castle. For which cause Othoman was informed to request the Captain of Bilezaga (another Cattle there by, also his Neighbour and Friend) that by his people in passing that way to the Mountains, and when the Goods and Cattle, as occasion should require, take the refuge of his Cattle; which the courteous Captain (well acquainted with old Ertogruul, Othomans Father) easily granted; yet with this proviso, that none should with such Goods or Cattle have access into his Cattle, but the Turks Women only; which his courteous Othoman refused not. So was the Cattle of Bilezaga from that time forward a refuge unto the Turks Women, who passing that way, and there shrouded with their Goods and Cattle, usually preferred the Captain with some one homely Country Present or other, which afterwards was the loss of the Cattle.

Yet was not Othoman unmindful of the wrong done unto his people, by his evil Neighbour the Captain of Einegiul, but purposing to be thereof revenged, made choice of Seventy of his best and most able men, whom he appointed secretly to pass the Mountain Osmenian, and so if it were possible, to surprisè or set on fire his Enemies Cattle. Of which his designment the wary Captain having intelligence by one of his Ephials, in place convenient upon the Mountain laid a strong ambush for the cutting off of such as were by Othoman sent to have furnished his Cattle; whereof Othoman (no less wary than he) before warned by his Scouts, and augmenting the number of his men, marched directly to the place where the Enemy lay. Where betwixt them (for so small a number) was fought a right bloody and cruel Battle, and many slain on both sides; amongst whom Hecsa, Othomans Nephew was one. The Victory nevertheless fell unto Othoman; after which time his People in much more safety fed their Cattle in the Summer time on the Mountains, as the manner was, and so in quiet passed to and fro.

Shortly after, Othoman by night surprisèd the little Cattle Chalee, not far from Einegiul; and there without mercy he put to the Sword all the Christians he found therein, and so afterwards burnt the Cattle. Which outrage was the beginning, and occasion of great troubles thereof ensuing; for the Christians of the Countries adjoining, much grieved and offended at themselves together, complained unto the Captain of Cara-Chifur the greatest Commander thereabout. That these Turks, which not many years before were of meer pity received as poor Herdmen into that Country, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands upon the ancient Lands and Possessions of the Christians; which iniquity (as they said) if it were longer winked at and suffered by him, and other such men of account and authority as were to reform the same; they would no doubt in short time drive both them and all the rest of the Christians out of their native Countries; wherefore it was thought high time, and more than necessary for him, and all the rest, to awake (as it were) out of the dead sleep wherein they had long time drowsily slept; and joining their Forces together, to expulse those unthankful, incroaching, and merciless strangers out of their Countries; the mischief (they said) being now so great, far therefore needed speedy remedy; and that repentance would come too late when it was past cure. The Captain moved with the indignity of the late fact, and just complaint of the poor Country People, sent with all speed a strong company of Souldiers, under the leading of Calanus his Brother; with commandment that they should march unto the Cattle of Einegiul, and there to joyn with the rest of the Christian Forces.

Othoman understanding of this preparation made against him, gathering his Souldiers together, marched to a place called Officium, near unto Mount Timulus in Phrygia; where between him and the Christians was fought a sharp Battle, wherein he lost his Brother Sargatun (whom the Turks account for a Saint or Martyr at this day) with many other of his Souldiers. In this Battle was also Calanus slain, whose Belly Othoman caused to be ripped, and his Entrails to be pulled out, naming the place where he was buried, Mefari-Repes, that is to say, The Dog-Grave, by which name the place is at this day known. The Body of his Brother Sargatun he carried to Saguna, and there honourably buried it near to the Body of his Father Ertogruul. Aladin Sultan of Iscionium understanding of this conflict, was very sorry for the loss happened unto Othoman, being a Mahometan of his own Religion; wherefore in token of his good Will and Favour, he gave unto him the City of Paleopolis, with all the Territory thereunto belonging, giving unto him also leave to besedge, take or spoil the Seignior and Cattle of Cara-Chifur; for accomplishment whereof he sent unto him both Souldiers and Munition. Othoman encouraged with this great bounty of the Sultans, straightway besegged the Cattle of Cara-Chifur, which at last he won, and slew all the Christians therein; the Captain he took alive, whom he cruelly executed; the Spoil of the Cattle he gave unto his Souldiers, reserving only the fifth part thereof, which he sent for a Present to the Sultan. All this happened in the year of our Lord 1290. This Cattle of Cara-Chifur, with the rest of Einegiul, Bilezaga, Chalee, and others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned, were all situate in the borders of the greater Phrygia, or else near thereunto in the Confinnes of Bithynia and Mysia; In which pleasant Countries (but lately part of the Constantinopolitan Empire) the Christians the ancient inhabitants thereof, as yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks at the rising of the Othoman Empire; which whom they lived at continual jars, until that at length they were by them altogether utterly oppressed and extinguished.

Othoman encouraged with this good success, and supported by the great Sultan of Iscionium, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit greater matters, for the further increase of his Honour and Territory; yet not trusting altogether to his own device, he entred into consultation with his Brother Jandus, which way was best to take to dispossess any bring in subjection his Neighbours the Christians; In which case, Jandus a man of greater courage than discretion, advised him with all celerity to urge his good fortune, and presently to invade the Christians already discouraged with the loss of Cara-Chifur. But this counsel altogether pleased not Othoman; for (said he) the Cities and Towns by us gained, must be kept with strong Garrisons, otherwise they will again be recovered by the Enemy; which Garrisons cannot be maintained and kept, if we spoyl or dispossess the Countries adjoining upon us; for in so doing we shall (as it were) with our own hands cut our own Throats; for (said he) I think it best, that we enter into a League of Amity and Friendship with the Christians round about us; which League we will keep with some and break with others, as shall serve best for our purpose. And according to this resolution, he made Peace indeed with all the Christians; but especially with Michael Cuffi, Captain of Hirmen-Cia Cattle, of whom we have before spoken, who who afterward served him to great use in the managing of his Wars, and became also a Renegat of the Mahometan Religion. All this Othoman did the rather, because he was then at great advantage with one Gentem-Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selvacian Family) who envying at the rising of Othoman, fought by all means possible to hinder his greatness, as did also the others, his quietness; which discord the Christians liked well, as a mean for them to live in more rest by.

In the mean time, Othoman derivèd with all carefulness to beautifie and strengthen his new Common-weal; and for the greater concourse of People, built a fair Temple in Cara-Chifur for the exercise of the Mahometan Religion; appointed Markets to be kept in all peaceable manner, in his great Towns, granting great privileges to such as resorted thither, as well Christians as Turks; using therein full Justice, that, all flows of People without fear, in hope of gain resorting thither, furnished his Country and Towns with all things necessary; yet this care of civil policy and government, could not so withhold him, that according to his aspiring mind, he had always a greater desire and care to enlarge his Possessions and Territory. Wherefore intending to make a rode into Bithynia, he requested Michael Cuffi, the Christian Captain before mentioned, to deliver his opinion what was best to be done; who so politely directed him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great Spoil and more Honour. This road so terrified most of the Christians thereabouts, that they were loath to give Othoman any cause of offence, for fear lest they should by him be spoiled.

It fortuned about this time, that the Captain of Bilezaga and Cara-Chifur falling at odds, he of Cara-Chifur first taking up Arms fiercely invaded the Captain of Bilezaga; who thereupon sent unto Othoman, to pray his aid, which he easily granted, and so without further delay presently came unto him with certain Companies of lusty tall Souldiers. By whose coming, the Captain of Bilezaga not a little encouraged and strengthened, set upon his Enemy; where betwixt them was made a sharp conflict, and divers on both sides slain; but the Victory by the help of Othoman the Turk, at length inclining to the Bilezagian, the other vanquished Captain in a half day came to his own death. After whom Othoman following, laid siege unto the Cattle, which at length he took together with the Captain, whom he caused to be presently slain. It is strange to tell, how proud the Lord of Bilezaga was, to have revenged himself of his Enemy, and to have gained the Victory; although it were indeed gotten, not so much by his own Valour as by the Prowess of the Turk; for whom and his followers in token of his thankfulness, he caused a great Feast to be provided in the Country there, where by he honourably entertained them; and in the end of the Feast, caused Garments of great price (according to the manner of the East) to be given to Othoman, in token of his favour, and his Souldiers to be also bountifully rewarded; but this was done with such a presumptuous state and grace, as if he had been some great Prince, offering unto the common Souldiers of the Turks, in passing by them, his hand to kiss, as a great favour. With which exceeding insolency, Othoman was so much offended, that he had much ado to hold his hands from him; yet repressing his anger, he in secret imparted his discontentment unto his Cousin Dunder, his Uncle Dunder Son, grievously complaining of the intolerable pride of the Christian Captain, and of the disgrace by him done unto the Turks, in offering them his hand to kiss; requiring his opinion how he were for the same to be corrected; who but a little before, being by the said Captain made Lieutenant, frankly told his Kinsman, That as then nothing was to be attempted against him; first, for that on the one side they had Gentem-Ogli (a great man amongst the Selvacian Turks) their Enemy, and round about them besides they were environed with the Christians, whom he should have all in his neck at once if he should offer the Bilezagian Captain any wrong. By which answer, Othoman perceiving his Cousin great affection towards the Christian Captain, and doubting to have the mischief he had imagined against him, by him revealed, or at leastwile hindered; without more ado suddenly taking up his Bow in his hand, with an Arrow shot him quite through, and so flew him.

Not long after, Michael Cuffi the Captain of Hirmen-Cata, Othomans great Friend, having concluded a marriage between a Gentleman of that Country and his Daughter, invited all the Christian Captains of the Castles thereabouts, requesting them to come to the marriage; and the rather, that so they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whose power began now to grow dreadful unto them; hoping that such means might be found at that merry meeting, that all being made Friends, they might in more due security possess his own without fear of being spoiled by him. Unto this marriage came all these bidden Guests, bringing with them such Presents as they thought good to bestow upon the new married Folks, according to the manner of the Country; but Othomans Gifts far exceeded all the rest, which besides many other rich things, gave unto them whole Flocks and Drovers of Sheep and Cattel; which thing drew all the Christian Captains into no little admiration of his bounty; inasmuch that they began to lay among themselves, that Othoman Wealth and good Fortune did portend some greater matter, to their utter ruin and fall; which to prevent, they thought it best by secret means to compass his death. The execution of which device they referred to the Captain of Bilezaga, as unto one with him best acquainted. This Captain was of great Wealth, Credit, and Authority amongst the Christian Rulers of the Country; which very ill of Craft and Diffimulation; which his evil disposition, Othoman of long time well perceived; yet having occasion to use him, in subtil manner gave him (in outward show) all the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and delecting himself as plain and poor in comparison of him. But to give a beginning to this treacherous device; the Captain meeting with Othoman, in a friendly manner told him, how that he intended shortly to marry the Daughter of the Captain of Tar-Chifur, earnestly requesting him to honour that his marriage with his presence, of the time whereof, he said he would give him farther knowledge afterwards; and as was but a colour, to bring Othoman within his danger, not fearing any such Treason. Othoman understanding that the time of the marriage drew nigh, sent thither a Present of certain fair Oxen and Sheep, in the name of his Brother Jandus; for the Captains provision against this Marriage; but Othoman that Othoman himself, with his simple Rustic, would be present at the marriage, and then present him, not with such Presents as were agreeable with his Honour, yet such as his poor ability could afford. This message with the Presents, were wonderful welcome to the Captain, hoping assuredly that his devised Treachery would take such effect as he wished; and therefore calling unto him Michael Caffi, in whom he had reposed an especial trust, declared to him his whole device (whereof he was not before altogether ignorant) requesting him to take the pains to go unto Othoman to bring him to the marriage, the time being now certainly appointed and at hand; which he knew Caffi might easily do, being of his familiar acquaintance; and in token of great Friendship, he sent unto Othoman by the same Messenger, a Present of gilt Plate. Caffi took unto him this Message, which when he had delivered to Othoman, he found him very willing to go, as a man not doubting any harm. But Caffi inwardly grieving to see to brave a man, and his kind Friend, by such treacherous manner to be brought to his end, moved with compassion, discovered unto him the whole Conspiracy of the Captain against him, and of the Plot laid for his destruction, willing him to take heed unto himself; for which virtue, Othoman gave Caffi great thanks as to his Friend, for saving his life; and withal richly rewarded him, promising him greater matters if he would continue that his faithful Friendship. Now concerning the Captain of Bilescua (faith he), as you return recommend me unto him, and tell him, That I think my self much bound unto him for many curtesies, but especially for that he hath heretofore divers times in most friendly manner protected my Goods and Cattel, within the safeguard of his Castle; which his Friendship I most humbly request him to continue for one more year, and I will be bound by reason of the dangerous Wars betwixt me and the Prince German-Ogli, as he well knoweth; wherefore if it might so fland with his good pleasure, I would presently send unto his Castle such things as I make most reckoning of, requesting him once more to be the faithful keeper thereof, as he hath been before; and tell him further, that my Mother-in-Law, with her Daughter my Wife, desire nothing more than to find opportunity to be acquainted with the honorable Lady his Mother; for which cause (if it please him) I will bring them both with me to the marriage. This Othoman request, when the Captain of Bilescua understood by Michael Caffi, he sent the same Caffi back again to hasten his coming, willing him to bring with him what gifts he pleased; appointing certain time and place when and where the marriage should be solemnized. And because the Castle of Bilescua was thought to be too little conveniently to receive the multitude of People which were expected at the marriage, there was another open place of greater receptivity appointed in the Country for that purpose, about three miles distant from the Castle. The marriage day drew nigh, wherunto Othoman must repair for his promise sake; and therefore prepared with all diligence to set forward, and to put in execution what he had devised for the safety of himself, and destruction of his Enemy. Othoman had of long accustomed in dangerous times, to send by carriage the best of his things, made up in packs, to be kept in safety in the Castle of Bilescua; under the colour whereof he now made great packs in form as he was wont; but instead of his rich Household stuff, and such other things of price, he thrust in armed men, covering those packs with homely coverings, sending them by Carriages to the Castle of Bilescua, giving charge that they should not come thither before twilight. After that, he apparelled certain of his best Soldiers in Womens apparel, as if it had been his Wife and Mother-in-Law, with their Womans; so casting his journey, that he with these disguised Soldiers, and the other sent in packs, might at one instant meet at the Castle aforesaid. The Captain being now in the Country, and understanding that Othoman was coming in the Evening with a great train of Gentlemen, thought the safety of his late coming to be for that the Turkish Women use to flun the sight of Christian men by all means they can. Othoman being now come to the place in the Country where the marriage was next day to be solemnized, having done his humble reverence to the Captain, requested him to let him the honour, which when the Gentlemen were nigh at hand, might by his appointment be sent to his Castle, there to have some convenient lodging where they might alight and bestow themselves apart from others, according to the homely fashion of their Nation; left peradventure the presence of so honorable a company of Noblemen and Gentlemen, might put them out of countenance: which the Captain granted, and having fluted them a far off after the Turkish manner, commanded them to be conveyed to his Castle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the same time that these disguised Soldiers arrived at the Castle, came thither also the other Soldiers covered in packs in the carriages: which so soon as they came into the Castle, suddenly leapt out of the packs, and drawing their short Swords, with the help of their disguised Fellows slew the Wardens of the Castle, and without more ado possessed the same; the greatest part of the Captains people being then gone out of the Castle to the place of marriage. Othoman having tarried to long with the Captain, as he supposed the Castle at that time by his men surprised; so soon as the Captain had taken his Chamber, suddenly took horse, with all his Followers, accompanied also with Caffi, taking his way directly to the Castle of Bilescua; of whose sudden capture the Captain understanding, presently took horse and pursued him with all his Train, which were for the most part drunk, and overtaking him before he came to the Castle set upon him; in which conflict, he was by Othoman slain, and the rest put to flight.

The same night Othoman using great celerity, early in the Morning surprised the Castle of Jarchair, also where he took Prisoners the Captain thereof, with his fair Daughter Lulifer, (which should have been married to the Captain of Bilescua the next day) with all her Friends, as they were ready to have gone unto the marriage, which fair Lady he shortly after married unto his eldest Son Orchoman; who had by her Amerath, third King of the Turks, and Solyman Basla.

Othoman omitting no opportunity, presently sent one of his Captains called Durgh-Alper, a man of great esteem and valour, to besiege the Castle of Emegul; wherein he used such celerity, that preventing the fame of that was done at Bilescua, he suddenly environed the Castle, in such sort that none could pass in or out; until such time, as that Othoman having brought his Prisoners and Prey to the Castle of Bilescua, and there having set all things in good order, came with the rest of his men of War to Emegul; which he presently by force took, promising the Spoil thereof unto his Soldiers. The Captain called Hagio Nicholas his ancient Enemy, he caused to be cut in small pieces, and all the men to be slain; which cruelty he used, because they a little before had used the like tyranny against his Turks.

When Othoman had thus got into his subjection a great great part of the strong Castles and Forces of the greater Alger, with the Territory to them be- longing, he began with all carefulness to make good Laws, and to execute justice to all his Subjects, as well Christians as Turks; with great industry studying by all means to keep his Country in peace and quietness, and to protect his Subjects from the Spoil of others, as well Christians as Turks; whereby it came to pass, that the old Inhabitants which had for the most part forsaken the Country, by reason of the great troubles therein, repaired now again to their ancient dwellings; and not only they, but many other Strangers also, supplying the places of them whom the late Wars had consumed. By his good Government, that wasted Country in short time grew to be again very populous.

The civil Government of his Country well established, he besieged the City of Nice, in ancient time called Nicea, a City of Bithynia, famous for the general Council there holden against Arian in the time of Constantine the Great. This City he brought into great distress, by placing his men of War in Forts new built upon every passage and way leading unto the same, so that nothing could be brought out of the Country for the relief of the poor Citizens. They in this extremity, by a secret Messenger certified the Emperor of Constantinople (under whose obedience they were) of the distress the City found, and that except he sent them present relief, they must of necessity either perish with Famine, or yield themselves into the hands of their Enemies the Turks. The Emperor moved with the piteous complaint of this Messenger, with all expedition embarked certain companies of Soldiers from Constantinople to relieve his distressed City. But Othoman understanding by his Espials, where these Soldiers were appointed to land, in secret manner withdrawing most of his Forces from the Siege, lay in ambush near to the same place where the Emperors Soldiers (casting no peril) landed; who before they could put themselves in order of Battel were by Othoman and his Turks in such sort charged, that most part of them were there slain, and the rest driven unto the Sea, where they miserably perished. Othoman having thus piteously overthrown the Constantinopolitan Soldiers, returning to the Siege, continued the same in straight manner than before. The besieged Citizens, being brought to great penury, and now despairing of all help, yielded themselves with the great and rich City of Nice into the hands of Othoman, with the Spoil whereof he greatly enriched his men of War.

Aladin the great Sultan of Iconium, glad to hear of the good success of Othoman against the Christians, in token of his Favour and Love, sent unto him a fair Ensign, with certain Drums, and Trumpets, a Sword and Princely Robe, with large Charters, that whatsoever he took from the Christians should be all his own; and also that publick Prayers should be said in all the Turks Temples, in the names of Othoman, for his health and prosperous estate, which two things properly belonged to the dignity of the Sultan. These extraordinary favours gave occasion for many to think, that Sultan Aladin (having no Children) intended to make Othoman his adoptive Son and Successor in his Kingdom.

The Presents and Charters sent him, Othoman humbly accepted, sending unto Aladin the fifth part of the Spoil of Nice, taken from the Christians; but the Princely Honours due to the Sultan only, he used not during the life of Aladin, intending not long after to have gone himself in person to visit the Sultan, and so to have grown into his further Favour. But having prepared all things for so honourable a journey, at what time as he was about to set forward, he was certainly informed of the death of Aladin; and that Sabih (one of his great Counsellors) had taken upon him the dignity of the Sultan (as is before declared,) which was much discomfited the aspiring mind of this Ottoman Turk, in good hope to have succeeded him in the Kingdom, or at leastwise to have shared the greatest part thereof unto himself, whereof he was now altogether disappointed. Yet immediately after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take upon him the title of Sultan, which he was granted unto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modesty sake had forborn, Aladin yet living; wherefore he made one Drus his learned Fakir (that is to say, a man learned in the Turkish Law) Bishop and Judge of Carac-Chifur, commanding the publick Prayers which were wont to be made for the health and prosperity of the great Sultan, to be now made in his own name; which was first openly done by the said Bishop in the Pulpit of Carac-Chifur. At the same time also he began to coin Money in his own name, and to take upon him all other Honours belonging unto a Sultan or King; which was about ten years since the death of his Father Ertugul, and in the year of our Lord 1300, unto which time the beginning of the great Empire of the Turks is under the fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun.

When Othoman had thus taken upon him the Majesty of a King, he made his Son Orchoman the first Prince and Governor of the Country, his principal Followers, to be Governors of other strong Castles and Forts, divers of which places retain the name of those Captains at this day. He himself made choice of the City Neapolis, about twenty miles from Nice, to seat his Royal Palace in, where also divers of his Nobility built them Houses, and changed the name of the City, calling it Despotepe, as who should say, the City of the Lord or Prince. For all this, Othoman ceased not to devote by all means he could, to augment his Kingdom; and for that cause being accompanied with his Son Orchoman, made many rodes into the Countries adjoining upon him, inslaving many places as might best serve his purpose, for the enlargement of his Kingdom, all which in particular to rehearse were tedious.

The Christian Princes, rulers of the Countries bordering upon this new Kingdom, fearing lest the greatness of Othoman might in short time be their utter confusion, agreed to join all their Forces together, and so to commit to the Fortune of one great Battel their own Estates with his; according to which resolution, the Christian confederate Princes, which were for the most part of Myfia, and Bithynia, levying the greatest Forces they were able to make, with Fire and Sword invaded Othoman Kingdom. Who having knowledge beforehand of this great preparation made against him, had in readines all his Captains and Men of War; and hearing that his Enemies had entered his Dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with them in the Confines of Phrygia and Bithynia, fought with them a great and mortal Battel, wherein many were slain on both sides, as well Turks as Christians; and after a long Fight, obtained of them a right bloody Victory. In this Battel Cafelennus, one of the greatest Christian Captains was slain; another called Taken of the Country which he governed in Phrygia, chased by Othoman unto the Castle of Ublad, not far distant from the place where the Battle was fought, was for fear delivered unto him by the Captain of the same Castle, and was afterward by Othoman's commandment now called cut in pieces, within the view of his chief Castle; which Othoman afterwards subdued, with all the Country thereabouts. The other Christian Princes and Captains saved themselves by flying into strong holds farther off. The Prince of Bitunia the chief Author of this War, fled into the strong City of Prusa, which the Turks called Burisa, whither Othoman not long after led his Army, in hope to have won the same; but finding it not possible to be taken by force, began presently at one time to build two great and strong Castles upon the chief passages leading to the City, which Castles he with great industry finished in one year; and in the one, placed as Captain Attemur his Nephew; in the other one Balahanzack, both men of great courage and skilful in feats of War; and in this fort having blocked up the City of Prusa, so that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he subdued the most part of Bitunia; and so returned home, leaving the two Castles well manned with strong Garrisons, under the charge of the Captains before named.

Othoman returning home to Neapolis, honourably rewarded his Souldiers, according to their deserts, establishing first a quiet and pleasing Government in his Kingdom; the People in a short number retired from far into his Dominions, there to rest themselves; whereby his Kingdom became in few years exceeding populous, and he for his politic Government most famous. And so living in great quietness certain years, being now become aged and much troubled with the Gout; his old Souldiers accustomed to live by the Wars, abhorring Peace, came to him, requesting him as it were with one voice, to take some honourable War in hand for the enlargement of his Kingdom, with great cheerfulness offering to spend their lives in his service rather than to grow old in idleness; which forwardness of his men of War greatly pleased him, and so giving them thanks, for that time diffinitively, promising that he would not be long unmindful of their request. But yet thinking it good to make all things safe at home before he took any great Wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call unto him Michael Cafi, the only Christian Captain who for his great deserts he had at all times suffered to live in quiet with his Possessions, as it were in the heart of his Kingdom; and by fair means (if it might be) to persuade him to forsake the Christian Religion, and become a follower of Malomet, and so to take away all occasion of mistrust; which if he thought he could do, without forgetting all former Friendships, to make War upon him as his utter Enemy. Whereupon Cafi was sent for, being persuaded by the Messenger, that Othoman had sent for him, because he had occasion to use his wonted faithful Counsel and Service in a great exploit which he had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Cafi thinking of nothing less than of that which ensued, came accompanied with such Souldiers as he thought to use in that service; But coming unto Othoman, and understanding the very cause why he was sent for, and seeing danger eminent on every side, kissing Othoman's hand, after the manner of the Turks, requested him in courteous manner to enter him in the Principles of the Mahometan Religion, which he promised ever after to embrace; And so saying certain words after Otho-

man, he turned Turk, to the great displeasure of God, and the contentment of Othoman and his Nobility. For which his revolting, Othoman presently gave him an Ensign and a rich Robe, tokens whereby the Mahometan Sultans assure their Vassals of their Favour and the undoubted possession of such Land and Living as they then hold.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his Souldiers, invaded the Countries bordering upon him, took many strong Castles and Forts, subdued the most part of Phrygia, Misia, and Bitunia, and other great Regions, unto the Euxine Sea; and being now very aged and diseased as is aforesaid with the Gout, and thereby unable to go into the field in person himself, oftentimes sent his Son Orchanes against his Enemies; who to the imitation of his Father achieved many great enterprises, Othoman his Father yet living.

Now happily might the confidante Reader (and not without just cause) marvel, what dead sleep had overwhelmed the Greek Emperors of those times; first Michael Paleologus, and afterwards his Son Andronicus, both men of great Valour, and still resolute at Constantinople, thus to suffer the Turks (not Othoman, for he as yet bare no sway; but others the Sherars of Sultan Aladin Kingdom) to take their Cities, spoil their Countries, kill their Subjects, and dayly to in-croach upon them in the lesser Asia, and especially in Bitunia, so near unto them, and as it were even under their Noses. But yet him with me, here as in a most convenient place but breathe a little, and consider the troubled State of that declining Empire, now hasting to an end; and he shall plainly fee the causes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diseased body quite overthrown and sick to death, it became at length a Prey unto the aspiring Turk. Michael Paleologus having by great treachery obtained the Greek Empire, and by rare fortune recovered also the City of Constantinople from Baldwin the Emperor (as is in the former part of this History declared) fearing the power of the Princes of the West, but especially of Charles King of Sicilia, then a Prince of great Fame and Power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late Emperor) ceased not to solicit for the restitution of him again into his Empire, and to have also joined with him a near bond of Affinity, by marrying his Daughter unto Charles his Son; to avert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles near home, by his Embassadors offered unto Gregory the Tenth, then Bishop of Rome, to unite and conform the Greek Church unto the Latine, and to acknowledge the Bishops Supremacy in such sort as that it should be lawful for any man to appeal unto the Court of Rome, as unto the higher and more excellent; of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promising to perform what he had before requested, for the keeping of Charles otherwise baffled. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of Religion in the Greek Church should be made, Joseph the Patriarch to begin withal, gave up the place, and shortly after forsaking the City, retired himself into a Monastery near unto the Straight of Bosphorus, where he at quiet devoutly spent the rest of his life. The rest of the Clergy also discontented with this innovation, in their Sermons openly inveighed against it, persuading the People not to receive it; crying out, that now was come the time of their trial, the time of their Martyrdom, and the time wherein they were to receive the glorious Crown of their painful sufferings;

sufferings; inso-much, that great tumults were thereupon raised, and all the City and the Country in an uproar; for it was not the Clergy only, and the vulgar People by them moved, which diffided and abhorred these the Emperors proceedings, and made these fits, but many of the better sort, yea, of the chief Magistrates themselves also. So that Michael Paleologus the Emperor learning all other foreign business, was enforced to convert all his Power and Study unto the appeasing of these domestic Troubles, as deeming them of greater danger than those abroad. And first to persuade his discontented Subjects, he told them, That this alteration was made not for any good liking he had thereunto, but in respect of the dangerousness of the time; and that it was a point of wisdom, to foresee dangers hanging over our heads, and not to delay, if any thing were to be altered, for the averting thereof; for if the Enemies (as he said) should come, the City yet in many places rent, or but lately repaired, and as it were but newly raised from death to life, the present mischief would be far greater than those forepassed, and that then their Enemies would become Lords, not of their Religion and Ceremonies only, but of all at once, their Wives, their Children, and whatsoever else they had, where their Liberty changed into Bondage, they should be constrained to convert themselves not with their bodily service only, but even with their minds also, unto the Wills of the Latines their Enemies. And that so it would come to pass, that no man should be able to keep the old Customs and Manners of their Ancestors, but should see even their most sacred Rites and Ceremonies changed and quite overthrown. Which he carefully foreseeing had not (as he said) refused to yield unto necessity, and as Wisdom would, neglected a little harm in respect of a greater benefit; and in the lefts to have yielded unto his Enemies, to escape the benefit of the greater Liberty. With which the Emperors persuasion some were moved, and so held themselves contented; and some others not; against whom he was enforced to use other more severe remedies, as against his rebellious Subjects; of whom some he imprisoned, some he banished, some he tormented, some he dismembered, some he bereft of their Sight, or confiscated their Goods, using (in brief) all the means whereby the Minds of the Resolute or the Weak were to be moved. All which things, they whose zeal was grounded upon knowledge (in number fewest) with patience endured; but the greater part void of judgment, and the refuse of the People in simple Attire, ran roving abroad, some unto Peloponnesus, some unto Thracia, some unto Achaia, and some as far as Calabria, as men persecuted for their conscience, not regarding greatly whether, so it were out of the Emperors jurisdiction, and sometimes fitting their own Humors; neither conforming themselves unto the Religion then commonly by the Emperor established; neither yet agreeing among themselves, but taking unto them divers names, some as the Disciples of Armenius, some of Joseph, and some of others; some of them, themselves deceived, and deceiving others also. Thus for the avoiding of foreign danger out of the West, was the Empire at home no little endangered, and the State thereby shaken. Wherewith the Emperor was so encumbered, as that he had no leisure to provide for the tempest arising by the Turks out of the East, but was enforced wholly to employ himself, and all his endeavours to the keeping of his People and Subjects in their due obedience at home. All whose deep devices, first in aspiring to the Empire, no way unto him due, and great travels afterwards for the affluring of the same to himself and his Posterity; against all right even with the alteration of the Religion of his Fathers, yielded him in the winding up of all, not so much as credit of an honourable Sepulture; but dying in these troubles not far from Lysimachia, as he was making preparation against the Prince of Thracia, was there by his son Andronicus his commandment (for whose advancement he had strained both his Faith and Honour) obscurely buried in the Field, a good way from his Camp, as unworthy of a better Sepulture, for revolting from the ancient Religion of his Ancestors, although his Obsequies were for fashion sake afterward with some solemnity celebrated. This was the end of the great Emperor Michael Paleologus, in whose time the Turks, the Successors of Aladin, greatly incoached upon him in the lesser Asia, as is in part before declared; a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of body and mind, had he not for the advancement of himself and his Posterity, strained the same with foul Treachery and Apollacy; for which (as some say) he ever after lived in conscience troubled, and dying, was even by his own Son not thought worthy of an honourable funeral. A notable example unto all such as with greediness seek after glory, and foolishly expose themselves unto such adventures, as oftentimes overthrow their deepest devices, leaving in themselves no certainty, preferring their inordinate desires (either for themselves or their Posterity) before that which is good and virtuous. Twice wretched in so doing; first in their folly, and then in their ingratitude; who believe that they find God himself against their designs, and by his aid evidently never and purposes, they by and by evidently never with other things than what they had foreseen, contrary unto them; and so themselves offend, contrary to their expectation, call headlong into extreme misery; for so, even he of whom we now speak, otherwise a man of great Wisdom, and happy in his doing, overcame with his affection towards his Children, in desiring to leave unto them the Empire, when as he ought to have cast all the care, both of himself and of them, especially upon the Providence of God; he like a blind man following his own deep conceits, not grounded upon the fear of God, but upon Man's Wisdom only, cast himself before he was on Man's Wisdom, and became also even aware unto miserable troubles, and became also even unto his Subjects, and them also for whom he had so forgot himself. For whereas God had even from his Childhood allotted unto him the Empire (as was by many evident signs and tokens to have been gathered) if he could have moderated his untimely desires, kept his tongue from Perjury, and his hand from blood, and not turned out of the way after strange Devotions, he had by many degrees excelled even the best Emperors his Predecessors; whereas now he lieth obscurely buried, shrouded in the fumes of Despair, the report of his foul and faithless dealings far exceeding all other unrighteous varieties.

Andronicus Paleologus succeeding his Father in the Empire, and thinking by restoring again the government of the Church, together with the Rites and Customs of the Greeks, to have appeased all such troubles as were before by his Father raised, by bringing in those of the Latines; found himself therein most deceived, and his troubles no less than his Fathers; they which had before received the Latine Customs, and well liking of them, with great obstinacy defending the same; and the other of the contrary Faction now countenanced by the Emperor, without modesty or measure insulting upon them; whereof arose exceeding great riots and troubles, especially in the beginning of his Reign; so that great benefit of the inchoating Turks, who in the mean time ceased not by all means to increase their Territories in Asia; and not only there, but in the Islands of the Mediterranean Sea, also. For Andronicus by the death of Charles King of Sicily, delivered of the greatest fear for which both he and his Father before him had to their great cost and charge both built and maintained a strong Fleet of Gallies; now perwaded by fame, whose aditions and speeches were after the manner of the Court, all framed upon the Princes Appetite, (as the readiest way to thrive, without respect of the common good) to spare that needless charge (as they termed it) which yearly cost him more than any thing else; had discharged all his Mariners and Sea-men, and commanded all the Gallies to be laid up, as if he intended to come in another year, were neglected and not looked unto, they in time for the most part rotted and perished. As for the Mariners, they went some one way, some another, as their Fortunes led them; to look for their Livings in foreign Countries, even with the Emperors Enemies; and some gayd themselves to Home, thinking it better by doing something to live, than by sitting still to perish. Which good Husbandry at the first seemed to be very profitable unto the Emperor, but especially unto such as being near unto him, and courtuously given, made full reckoning of all other the most necessary defences of the Empire, in comparison of those which were up of money, until that it was afterward too late by experience found hereof to have sprung many great mischiefs, unto the great weakening of the Greek Empire. For besides that the Turks without let did great harm on the Sea; the Pirates now out of fear of the Emperors Gallies, at their pleasure took the spoil of the rich Islands in the Mediterranean, and robbed the Towns all along the Sea-coast, to the unpleasing grief of the poor Country People; and yet not so contented, came with their Gallies, sometime two, sometime three, sometime more, as it were in contempt, even close unto the imperial City. Yea the Florentines were so bold, as upon a right small displeasure to rise and afterward to set fire up on the Suburbs thereof, which they would hardly have adventured, had the Emperors Fleet been preserved and maintained in the wonted strength.

At the same time also Andronicus the Emperor (as the great hindrance of the Affairs of the Empire, and advantage of the Enemies of the same) was not a little troubled with a jealous Suspicion of his Brother Constantine (commonly called Porphyrigenius) as if he had sought to have aspired unto the Empire: seeking by all means to win unto himself the love and favour of all men, but especially of the Nobility both at home and abroad, and to lay that means unto the height of his desires: All which (as most men thought) were but meer Slanders, maliciously devised by such as envying at his Honour, and taking occasion by the Emperors Suspicion, ceased not to increase the same, until they had wrought his unworthy destruction. The first ground of this false Suspicion in the young Emperors head, was, for that this Constantine even from his Childhood, was for many causes, better beloved of the old Emperor his Father, than Andronicus, as better furnished with those gifts of Nature which beauteify a Prince, and of a more courteous Behaviour than was his Brother; inasmuch that had he not been the younger Son, then, his Father could willingly have left him his Successor in the Empire. This was one and the chiefest cause of the Emperors grudge, and the ground of his Suspicion. Yet was there another also, and that not much less than this; for that his Father in his life time had of long thought, to have separated from the Empire a good part of Thessalia and Macedonia, and to have made him absolute Prince thereof; and had haply to do done, had he not been by death prevented; which thing also much grieved Andronicus, and the more incensed him against his Brother. Which his secret hatred he for all that according to his Willom, cunningly did endeavour, not only during the time that his Father lived, but three years after his death also, making show of the great love and kindness towards him that was possible. Constantine in the mean time, of such greatest revenues as were by his Father assigned unto him, reaping great profit, most bountifully bestowed the same upon his Followers, Favourites, and others that made sure unto him, as well the manner sort as the greater, and with his sweet Behaviour won unto him the Hearts of all men; for Affability and Courtship in high degree allured mens minds, as do faire flowers in the Spring the Passengers Eyes. This was that precept of the Golden Rule, That the higher a Prince was in Dignity, and the more courteous he shewed himself unto his Inferiours, the better he should be of them beloved. He therefore that should for the two first causes blame Constantine, should do him wrong; as both proceeding not of himself, but of his Fathers too much love; but in the third thing was not altogether blameless; for if for want of experience he prodigally gave such gifts, as for the most part might have befemed the Emperor himself, he ignorantly erred, yet did he not little offend; but if he knewed, that for his prodigal bounty he could not be suspected of his Brother, and yet without regard to the publick good, he was greatly to be blamed thereof. For if nothing else might have moved him, yet he should have considered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had forced, and how many it had brought to untimely end. So although perhaps that Constantine meant no harm unto his Brother, or any way to supplant him, yet did these things not a little increase and aggravate the former Suspitions, and open the Ears of the Emperor his Brother unto such calumination as commonly attendeth upon immoderate bounty. But to return to our purpose, this honourable Constantine then lived in Lydia, but lately married, and in good hope long to live, being not past thirty years of age; but pleasantly spending the time with his Wife at Nymphæa in Lydia, at such time as he was thus secretly accused unto his Brother, the Emperor thought it good, as upon other occasions of business, to pass over into Asia himself, but indeed to a false resolution, upon the sudden to oppress his Brother, as by the proof it fell out. For at his coming over Constantine fearing nothing less, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greatest Favourites, of whom one Michael Strategopulus (sometime a man in great Authority with the Emperor his Father, and of all others, for wealth, honour, and noble acts most famous) was chief of the number, together with Constantine were first clapt into prison, where we will leave them every hour looking to die, their Lands and Goods being before confiscated. But these worthy men, especially Constantine and Strategopulus, thus laid fast; who many times in great Barrels discomfited the Turks, and notably defended the Frontiers of the Empire along the East side of the River Mæander; they now finding none to withstand them, foraged not only

only all the rich Country beyond the River, but with an infinite multitude passing the same, did there great harm also; so that there was no remedy, but that the Emperor must of necessity make choice of some other worthy Captain for the defence of those his Cities and Countries, by the Incursion of the Turks then in danger in that part of Asia.

There was then in the Emperors Court one Alexius Philanthropus, a right valiant and renowned Captain, and then in the flower of his youth; of him the Emperor thought good to make choice for defence of those Frontiers of his Empire in the lesser Asia (against the Turks) which were before, the charge of his Brother Constantine and Strategopulus; joyning to him one Libadarius, an old famous Captain, and a man of great experience also; appointing unto him the Government of the Cities of Conium and unto the other the Frontiers along the winding banks of Mæander. Where Alexius having now gotten a Charge worthy his valour, and in many great Conflicts with the Turks fill carrying away the Victory, became in short time of great fame; besides that he was exceeding bountiful and courteous unto his men; a soldier, but a ready way unto dangerous Credit and Renown. Thus at the first all things prospered in his hand according to his hearts desire; yea the Turks themselves, bordering upon him, hardly bese on the one side by the Tartars, and on the other by himself; and yet not so much feared with their Enemies behind them, as moved with his courteous, came over to him with their Wives and Children, and served themselves (many of them) in his Camp. But as they say, That in Jupiters Court no man might drink of the Tun of Bliss, but that he must taste also of the Tun of Woe; so fell it out with this great Captain, who having been tasted of the better Tun, had the worse all poured full upon his head. Libadarius feeling all to prosper with him, and somewhat envying thereat, began to fear and suspect, left he proud of his good Fortune, and now grown very frong, casting off his allegiance should aspire unto the Empire, and so first begin with him, as the nearest unto him; which thing many of the Nobility secretly affirmed also, but how truly many doubt. But this envious Plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked up in the ashes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropus, certain Companies of Cretansians, whom for their good Service and Fidelity he both honoured and trusted above others, using them also for the Guard of his own Person. These men proud of their Credit, hearing of the furnished aspiring of their General, and in hope by his advancement to raise their own Fortunes also, ceased not continually to flatter unto him high conceits of himself, and to perwade, with all speed to take the matter upon him; the very conceit whereof (as they said) would be unto him no less danger, than if he should enter into the Action it self, as he might well see by the woful Examples of the noble Constantine and Strategopulus, both in extrem peril but for the jealous conceit furnished against them. Which quick Suggestions wrought in the great mind divers, and those most contrary motions, so that he scarce knew himself what he would or would not. For they which are unto themselves in conscience guilty of any grievous Crime, if any mischief hang over their heads therefore, it happens unto them as forknowing and expecting the same even from the time that they offended, unto whom, if nothing else, yet that same very forknowledge catcheth not a little the grief and misery; whereas contrariwise, they which are with sudden mischiefs, and unlooked for, overwhelmed, not knowing any just cause why, must needs stand as men dismayed, and almost beside themselves. But at length after divers great Conflicts with himself, the evil Perwaders of Rebellion prevailed with him. Yet did he at the first forbid any mention to be made of him in the Army as Emperor; which caused the Cretansians, the chief Authors of his Rebellion, almost to force him forthwith to take upon him the Imperial Ordinances, thereby to confirm the minds of his Followers and Favourites; for that such Resolutions were (as they said) forthwith to be put into execution, neither that any thing required by joynt celerity and dexterity both of the mind and the hand; and for that longer delay would fill his Soldiers heads with doubts, and discourage them with the fear of the uncertainty of the event; all which for all that moved him not so to do; but whether for fear of the greatness of the danger, or for that he secretly thought how fitt to circumvent Libadarius, of whom he stood most in doubt, is uncertain. The report of all which his doings and designs were in short time carried first unto Libadarius, as the nearest, and so in short time unto the Emperor; who were therewith not a little both disquieted. And had Alexius as some perwaded him) at the first set upon Libadarius, then unprovided, no doubt but he had done much; but God, by whom all Princes Reign, and whose Power confoundeth the devices of the proud, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppressed, to follow after Theodorus the Emperors Brother, of whom he was to have feared no harm. This Theodorus, the first man that Alexius shot at, warned by his Brother Constantine surnamed, lived a pleasant private life in Lydia, far from the ambition of the Court, and therefore so much the more beloved of the Emperor; but Alexius fearing left in that hurle many should refuse unto him, as unto the Emperors Brother, and so hinder his proceedings, thought best first to make him sure, and afterward to oppress Libadarius, not aware that in stead of the body he followed but after the shadow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his oversight, and knowing many that be the sown of War, gathered together all the Coin he possibly could, both of his own, and his friends, sending also for the Emperors Treasures of Philadelphæa, and with all speed raised the greatest Power that possibly he could out of Ionæ, which he furnished with all things necessary, promising unto his Soldiers great matters, and filling them with great hopes, and that within ten days he would with a great Army meet the Rebel in the heart of Lydia, and there dare him barrel. But withall considering that the Cretansians, men but of a mercenary Faith, had always the Guard of Alexius his Person, he thought good to make proof if they might be unto him no less danger, than if he so well wrought the matter by great sums of money presently given, and promises of greater Preferments with the Emperor, that they (somewhat before discomfited with Alexius his lackness, and now doubting also his success) yielded unto his desire, promising in the beginning of the barrel to deliver him into his hands; which they shortly after in the very joyning of the barrel accordingly performed, delivering him fast bound unto Libadarius his Enemy. Who not a little proud thereof, used him with great Infidelity, and within three days after put out his eyes, for fear the Emperor according to his courteous nature should have given him his Pardo; and so kept him in prison until the Emperors pleasure pleasure were further known. Thus through false flattery and ambition were the greatest Champions of the Greek Empire brought to confusion.

Now after this Rebellion of Philantropous, Andronicus became so jealous of his own people, as that he wot not whom to trust, retaining great confidence in strangers, than in his own Subjects, to the great hurt of his Estate. At the same time it is furnished, that the Maffagets (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond Ister, being Christians, but oppressed by the European Tartars, weary of their slavery, sent presently unto the Greek Emperor, offering to place for them to dwell in, they would come over unto him with ten thousand of their Families, and faithfully serve him in his Wars against the Turks (who then grievously wasted his Countries in Asia, destitute of good Captains and Commanders,) which offer he gladly accepted, as fringing them in need of Aid, and not greatly trusting his own people. But when these Maffagets, in number above 10000, coming over with their Wives and Children, were to be furnished with all things, and especially the Men with Horses, Armor, and Pay, (all which the Emperor could not himself do) the Subjects were therewith hardly charged, and Commotion sent out into every Country and Province, for the taking up of Horses and Armor: every City, every Country-Town and Village, every Gentlemen House and poor man's Cottage, was searched and ransacked, and all things taken from them, that were there found fit for Service, to their great discontentment, every man murmuring and grudging to have his Arms taken from him, and given to strangers; but when they were also to be Contributors unto their pay, they then openly cursed and banned them even unto their faces. Yet at length (though with much ado) these strangers well furnished with all things necessary, went with some other Forces also, shipped over into Asia, under the leading of Michael Palaeologus the Emperors eldest Son, and then his Companion in the Empire. Who marching along the Country, came, and encamped about Adrianople. Where the Turks at the first, after their wonted manner retired themselves into the high Mountains and thick Woods, that from thence they might more safely learn what strength their new come Enemies were of, and what discipline of War they kept; for they knew, that upon the coming of great Armies many false Reports did run, and that things were made far greater than indeed they were; as they did of these also, as of a people invincible; and therefore they thought it best to protract the time, until they might see in what sort best to deal with them. But thus hovering over their heads, and perceiving them oftentimes without order to roam abroad into the Country seeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercenary men spoiled their Friends no less than if they had been their Enemies) they came down in good order from the Mountains, from whence at the first they had sent but a little; but afterwards they came on further, and with greater confidence, in such sort, as that it seemed they would ere long assault the young Emperor in his Camp. Whereupon he with the rest discouraged, without any stroke given retired; and the Turks still following him at the heels. For neither he, neither they, had any thing considered of the small number of their Enemies; but as drunken men, whose heads filled with gross vapors, are deceived in the greatness of the object that they see, and oftentimes think one thing to be two; so were they also in like manner with their own fear blinded. Befide that, most commonly it falleth out, that the Army which Infidelity and Injury forenunceth, is appointed to destruction, and by the fearfulness of it self overthrown before the Enemy fight upon it, they themselves becoming Enemies to themselves, and Gods just Vengeance appointing unto them such an end as their deeds have deserved; neither was it like that they should do any great good, that at their first fighting forth, in stead of provision, carried over with them the bitter Curses and Execrations of their Villages, which the Emperor seeing the Maffagets fly, and not daring with those few he had left, to oppose himself against his Enemies, retired himself into the strong Castle of Magnesia, there to expect what would become of these mischief. But the Maffagets spoiling the Country of the poor Christians as they went, marched directly unto the strait of Hellepontus, and there again passed over into Europe, as if they had been therefore only sent for over the River Ister, to shew the Turks the foener the way unto the Sea in Asia. For it was not many days after, but that Michael the Emperor being returned to Constantinople, the Turks coming down, with a great Power, subdued all the Countries, even unto the Coast of Lesbos, to the great ruine and weakening of the Greek Empire.

It was not long after these great stirrs made by the Maffagets, but that one Ronsierius (sometime a notable Pirate, but as then a most famous Captain) hearing of the great entertainment that the Greek Emperor gave unto strangers, by Messengers sent for that purpose offered unto him his Service in his Wars against the Turks, as had before the Maffagets. This Ronsierius of whom we speak, had out of Catalonia a Province of Spain, and out of that part of France which is called Narbonensis, and some other places also, gathered together a great number of bare needy naked men, yet lusty able bodies, and fit for Service either by Sea or Land; with whom he manned four tall Gallies, and for as a notable Pirate long time robbed, not only the Merchants trading to and fro in the Mediterranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich Islands, carried away thence much rich Spoil also; until at length by the mischief he did being become famous, and great Wars then arising between Charles King of Naples, and Theodore King of Sicily, he was by Theodore sent for and requested for aid; which he (living of the spoil) easily granted, and so came unto him with a thousand Horse and as many Foot, all old expert Soldiers, whose good Service stood the King in those Wars in great need. But as the end of War is Peace, so long as the civil discords of Charles, a Peace being concluded between the two Kings, and confirmed by a Marriage betwixt their Children; Ronsierius living altogether by his Fortunes, was to seek for new Entertainment, both for himself and his men, as having neither house nor certain dwelling place to repair to; but being as needy men, they together sought out of one place, some out of another, in hope of booty as their Fortune led them. In which case Ronsierius their General thought it best to offer his Service to the Greek Emperor in his Wars against the Turks; whereof he gladly accepted, and so sent for him; unto whom he presently came, with two thousand good Soldiers, called (after the proud Spanish manner) by the name of Catalonians, for that they were for the most part Spaniards of the Country of Catalonia. Of whose coming coming the Emperor rejoicing more than he had cause (as afterward by proof it fell out) in token of his great favour, honoured him with the name of the Great Captain, and afterwards gave him his Niece Mary in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Tenza another Catalonian Captain sent for by Ronsierius, was come thither also with more men, the Emperor to gratify these both, gave unto Ronsierius the name of Cesar, and unto the other the name of the Great Captain. But when these new Captains with their Followers were to be transported into Asia, it is not to be spoken what harm they did by the way unto the Country people, and in the Villages along the Sea-coast; abusing the men and women as their Slaves, and spending their subsistence at their pleasure, for which they had many a bitter curse; and this was their first years entertainment. The next Spring they set forward to relieve the great City of Philadelphie, being as then long besieged by the Turks, and hardly belted without with the Enemy; and within, with extreme Penury and Famine; which good Service they most valiantly performed, and raised the Siege. For the Turks beholding the good order of these Latine Soldiers, their bright Armor, and courageous coming on, rose presently and departed, not only from the City, but quite out of the Emperors Territory. Besides that, in this Army were joynted unto these Catalonians great numbers of the best Soldiers of the Greeks, and all the Power of the Maffagets; so that had not the Emperor expressly before commanded, not to pursue them too far, it was by many thought, all those Cities and Countries might then again have been in short time recovered from the Turks, which they had before taken from him. But in Kingdoms appointed unto ruine, fair occasions help not for the stay thereof; yea the greatest help provided by the world, by a secret commanding Power above, being oftentimes converted to the destruction of that they were provided for the safeguard of; as it now fell out with the Emperor and these Spanish Soldiers; for this Service done, the Greeks returned home, as did the Maffagets also. But these Catalonians with Ronsierius their General, roaming up and down the Emperors Territories in Asia, did there great harm, turning their Forces (as Enemies) upon them whom they were sent for to relieve; alledging that they had not their pay according to the Emperors promise; and that therefore they must live upon them that had sent for them and deceived them. So were the poor people in every place spoiled, their Wives and Daughters ravished, their Priests and aged Fathers tortured to confess such secret store as they had; all was subject unto these dissolute Soldiers rage and lust; yea many of them that had not money and Manners, were taken by the greedy Soldiers imagination, having their hands or feet, or some other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high-ways side begging an halpenny or a piece of bread, having nothing left to comfort themselves with, more than their miserable voice and fountains of Tears; with which they now and then did move their pity, and so they had fulfilled by the Turks, the Emperor much grieved, and well the more, for that they were done by him whom he had entertained to relieve them; but what remedy, his Coeffers were so bare as that he was not able to do any thing for the redress thereof. Ronsierius having thus spoiled the Emperors Country, and thus left nothing that pleased either him or his, with all his Power passed over into Europe; and leaving all the rest of his Army at Calpessus, with two hundred of his men went unto the young Emperor Michael (then lying with a final Power at Oreghia in Thracia) to demand of him his pay, or if need were to extort it from him with threats; with whose Infidelity at his coming, the Emperor more offended than before, his Soldiers there present perceiving the fame, with their drawn Swords compassing him, sent by the Court, flew him, with certain of his Followers; the rest fled in all haste to Calpessus to certify their Fellows what had happened.

Thus by the death of Ronsierius, the young Emperor had thought to have discouraged the Catalonians, and abated their pride, as like enough it was to have done; yet in proof it fell not out so, but was the cause of far greater evils. So when God prospers not mens actions, the devil falleth out unto the worst, and their wifed devices turn to meer follies; for the Catalonians at Calpessus hearing of the death of Ronsierius their General, first flew all the Citizens in the City, and notably fortified the same, took that as their Refuge. Then dividing their Soldiers into two parts, with one part of them manned out eight Gallies, which under the leading of the great Captain Tenza, robbed and spoiled all the Merchant Ships, passing the straits of Hellepontus, to or from Constantinople; the other part left in the City, in the mean time foraging the Country all about them. But Tenza shortly after encountering with a Fleet of the Genoways, well provided for him, was by them overthrown, and most of his Gallies sunk, and himself taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his Fellows, and so again enlarged. Now the Catalonians at Calpessus somewhat discouraged with the loss of their Fleet and so many of their men, for certain days kept themselves quiet within their Walls, not knowing well what course to take, for they feared both the Maffagets and Thracians; them, for that they had upon light causes abused them, and slain divers of them in the late Asian War; and these, for that they had but even the other day burnt their Houses and spoiled their Labors in the Country there by; for which and other their Outrages, they utterly deplored of the Emperors Favor, whom they had so highly offended. But that which most of all terrified them, was, for that they looked for every day, when Michael the young Emperor, who as then lay not far off, should with a great Power come to assault them; for fear of whom they cast a deep Ditch about the City, with a strong Counterparty, to preparing themselves, as if they should have been even presently besieged. But the time so passing, and the Emperor delaying his coming, they began to think of other matters; for being brought to that strait, that they could not well tell which way to turn them, that they were on every side beset with danger, they upon malicious Reasons, and unto the Greeks most fatal, by Messengers sent of purpose, craved Aid of the Turks that dwelt on the other side of the strait over against them, in Asia; who presently sent them five hundred good Soldiers, after whom followed also many other fugitives and loose companions, in hope of spoil; with whom the Catalonians for the present strengthened, and being themselves three thousand strong, issued out of the City, and foraged the Country thereabouts, bringing in with them great Herds and Flocks of Sheep and other Cattel, together with their Keepers; whereupon both the Emperors and his Subjects incensed, prepared themselves for Revenge. This was the first calling in of the Turks into Europe (that I read of) and the beginning of those endless miseries

Ronsierius was slain.

P where

The Turks divided the Country into two parts, the Turques, or renegade Turks following Melch, and the rest Chal their General. But Melch being before become a Christian, as were his Followers also; and after that having received most honourable Entertainment at the Emperors hands, and yet again most shamefully breaking his Faith before given, and violating his Religion, had revolted to his Enemies; despairing of the Emperors further friendship, which he had so evilly deserved, made choice rather to go unto Charles Prince of Servia, by whom he was sent for, than to come again into the sight of Andronicus the Greek Emperor. And to go unto him with a thousand Horle, and five hundred Foot, was there of him well entertained himself; but his Soldiers all commanded to deliver unto the Prince both their Horles and Armour, and to fall to other Trades, and not to bear Arms but at such time, and so many of them as should seem good unto the Prince, that had received them into his Country.

But Chal with the Turks his Followers, in number about thirteen hundred Horle and eight hundred Foot, staying at Macedonia, offered unto the Greek Emperor quietly to depart his Country, to that he would give him passage by the Straits of Christopolis, by him fortified; and in safety transport him and his Soldiers with all their substance, over the Strait of Hellepontus into Asia; unto which his request, the Emperor considering the great harm done in his Provinces, and defraus also to be discharged of so great a burthen, easily granted; and sent Semander, one of his most valiant Captains, to conduct them out of Macedonia unto Thracia, unto the Straits of Hellepontus. Where the Greek Captains and Soldiers seeing the great multitude of Horles, and abundance of Money and other Spoils, which they having taken from the Greeks, were now about to carry away with them into Asia, they thought it a great indignity to suffer them to do so; and allured also with the hope of so rich a Prey, as had been of long in gathering, they entered into a device far different from that which was unto the Turks before promised; neither providing them of shipping, neither careful of their safety, but purposing upon the sudden by night to destroy them. Whereof the Turks having got understanding, suddenly rising, surprised a Castle in the Country there by, which they notably fortified for the defence of themselves, to the great affrontment of them that had purposed their destruction, who now not able to force them, were glad to get them farther off, and to certify the Emperor what had happened; who (after I wot not what received Custom of the Greek Emperors his Predecessors) slowly dispatching things requiring great care, carefully delayed the same, to the great trouble of his State, and advantage of his Enemies. For they wisely considering the danger and distress they were in, by speedy Measures sent over the Strait, craved Aid of the Turks their Country-men in Asia, which they presently sent them; wherewith they not a little both encouraged and strengthened, with their often and sudden Incursions grievously wasted the Country round about them, to the great discontentment of the Greek Captains, not able without greater help to remedy the same. Who thereof certified the young Emperor Michael Paleologus, requesting him with all the Power he could make, to come and besiege the Castle, and to suppress these so dangerous Enemies. For the performance whereof, not only the Captains with their Soldiers, but the Country people in general, with their Spades and Mattocks came flocking unto the Emperor; not as if they would have besieged the Castle, but have digged it down and overthrown it together with the Turks their Enemies.

Now the Emperor with his Captains and Soldiers, and a multitude of those Country people, being come thither, who all gladly followed him, most part of them foolish, thinking of nothing, but of the spoil of their Enemies, not considering with what danger the fame was to be gained; so that the more the Enemies provided for the necessary defence themselves, as in a number but few, and shut up in their Enemies Country, the more carelessly and negligently, and without all order, the Greeks proceeded in their Siege, for that they were in number far more, and better provided of all things than their Enemies; repuring with themselves, nothing in this World to be firm and sure; and all worldly things (as faith the divine Philosopher) to be but the mockery of God, and to be hastily turned up-side-down, and with most uncertain course this and that way to wander. But their Enemies, who before feared even the very fame of their coming, accounting themselves rather among the dead than the living, seeing their confused and disordered ranks; therewith much more than before encouraged, bestowed all their Wealth, their Women, and other things unnecessary for battle, in good safety within their trenches, but themselves, with eight hundred chosen Horsemen only, and they very well armed, filled out, even to the place where the Imperial Ensign stood; being neither of any great safety, neither guarded with any such strength or carefulness as befemed; with which sudden and desperate eruption of the Enemies, the Greeks Company, began to fly; after whom by little and little others followed, until at length all the rest without further resistance fled also; which the Emperor seeing, did what he might to have staid their flight; but in to general a confusion and fear, when every man was to flit for one, who regarded him? therefore wearied and finding no other remedy, he was glad to take the same course, and to fly with the rest; yet many of the more expert Captains, ashamed of so foul a flight, made divers stands; and so staid the barbarous Enemy from further pursuit of the Emperor and the other flying Greeks. In which doing, many of them inclosed by the Turks, were of them taken Prisoners; unto whom all the Emperors Treasure became a Prey also, and whatsoever honourable Emblems of the Empire else that were found in the Emperors Tent; yet the Imperial Crown it self, richly set with Pearl and Jewels, Chal putting upon his head, pleasantly scoffed at the Greek Emperor that but late before wore it.

After this Victory, the Turks with great pride spoiled almost all Thracia, in such sort as that the people for two years together durst scarcely go out of their strong walled Towns to plough and sow their Land; which exceedingly grieved both the Emperors, the Father and the Son; for in their own Power they had no great confidence. God having (as it were) taken from their people, both their hearts and courage, so that all their hope was to entertain foreign Aid (the miserable threat of the great distressed Ones) wherein also they found many difficulties and less, whilst they considered the greatness of their Charge, their Coßers being then, if ever, empty

by reason their Territories were so long and grievously by their Enemies wasted; yet need admitting no Law, Andronicus the old Emperor was glad to send to Charles Prince of Servia, his Son-in-Law, to pray his aid. But in the mean time he making no halt (as men in relieving others commonly do) and the misery more and more increasing, it pleased God to stir up the heart of one Philip Paleologus the Emperors near Kinsman, to undertake the protection and deliverance of his Prince and Country; that if afterward for his great valour by the Emperor worthily made Lord great Marital of the Empire. This Philip of whom we now speak, had all his life time been brought up in the Court, and was for his upright dealing and integrity of life beloved of all men, but specially of the old Emperor his Kinsman, whom he with like affection honoured; but was a man altogether unskilful of the Wars, as being by nature of a weak constitution of body, and of very tickly; and with all more given to devotion and the service of God than the Affairs of the World, oftentimes spending most part of the day at his Prayers in the Church. He now grieved to see the perplexed Emperors, and the misery of his Country, requested of him that he might with some small power, and from few Captains of his own choice, go out against these proud Turks; hoping (as he said) by Gods grace to revenge the wrong by them done, and to return to him again with Victory. Unto which his request, the Emperor easily yielded; saying, that God was just, which delighted not in many legs, neither in the greatness of any mans strength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind; not for giving his help unto Michael the Emperors son, for the offences of his Parents; as happily he might unto those who upright and devout a man, regarding more his integrity of life, than his skill in Arms; for turning me about, I have seen in this World (said he) I have seen, the swift not to gain the prize, neither the valiant the victory; wife men to want bread, and men of understanding wealth; the simple to gain favour, and the subtle to fall into disgrace; such alteration worldly things in time find. So the Emperor (as is aforesaid) yielding to his request, furnished him with Money, Horles, and Armour, and such a convenient Power, as he himself desired. Which he having received, first of all encouraged his Captains and Soldiers, in all manner of courteous and kindnes, giving unto them Money, Horles, Armour, Jewels; yea sometime he gave unto his Purse, unto another his Cloke, his Rapier, or some other such thing, as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardness; after that, he persuaded them to an honest and temperate course of life, and valiantly to play the men, promising according to their deserts to reward every one of them, the War once happily ended; and before his setting forth, understanding by his Elipals, that Chal with a thousand Foot and two hundred Horles was foraging the Country about Bizis, he bade his departure, that so he might by the way encounter them, laded with the Spoil of the Country; and so setting forward, came the third day to a little River, which the Inhabitants call Xerogissum, and there in a great Plain near unto the same, encamped. Where after he had for all things in order set for Battle, he made cheerful Speeches as a great Commander, encouraged his Captains and Soldiers; leaving nothing unsaid or undone, that might serve for the animating of them to fight. But he had not so lien two days, but that his Scouts about midnight coming in, brought him tidings, that the Enemy laden with Spoil, was even fift by at hand; who by the rising of the Sun were come within sight, and had themselves a far off also discovered the Christian Army, all glancing in bright Armour. Whereupon saying, a while to prepare themselves for Battle; and first of all, compassing themselves round with their Wagons and other carriages, they bestowed in them all their Captives fast bound together, with the Booty they had taken; and afterwards as the manner was, casting down upon their heads, and their Hands up towards Heaven, they came on. And now the Christian Army came on forward also, Philip still encouraging both the Horsemen and Footmen, and right well conducting them, as was the time and place required. So it furnished, that he that had the leading of the right Wing of the Army, gave the first charge upon a Squadron of the Enemies, and at the first offer unhorled one of the Enemies, and by and by after him another; But having his Horle fore wounded under him, he hastily retired out of the Battle; which somewhat troubled the Christians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcry began most fiercely to press upon the retreating Christians. Philip in the mean time with many cheerful words and comfortable persuasions still encouraging them to play the men; and with his Eyes oftentimes cast up to Heaven, with tears running down his face, most heavenly besought God, the giver of all Victory, no longer to suffer these his Enemies, and the Ministers of his Wrath, to triumph over his People; as did also the poor Captives that lay bound, doubtfully bewail their fate and hope expecting the event of the Battle. The Christian Footmen at the same time encountering hand to hand with the Barbarians, assailed them, and were assailed, flew of them, and were themselves of them slain; so that there was a cruel Fight made on both sides. But Philip with the multitude of his men having almost incircled the Barbarian Horsemen, with a Company of his most valiant Soldiers broke in upon the side of the Enemies Battle, and so made way through the midst of it; and so troubled the Turks, as that they well knew not how to fly, or what to do. So being on every side circumented and hardly charged, most of them there fell, excepting some few Horsemen, whom the Greek Horsemen pursued unto the entrance of Charfontas, with purpose of heart to slay them up. Philip coming thither also, there upon those Straits encamped; at which time the Emperor presently sent out five Gallies to keep the Straits of Hellepontus, so that no aid might be brought unto those Turks out of Asia. Whilst these things thus went, two thousand chosen Horsemen came to the aid of Philip out of Servia, and the Portcote of Persa came by Sea also with eight Gallies more into Hellepontus, to the aid of the Christians; wherefore upon the Greeks and the Servians had thus on the one side flur them up by Land, and they that were in the Gallies on the other by Sea, Philip with all his Power came and incamped about the Town and the Trenches wherein the Turks lay, planting his battery against the Castle, wherewith he greatly shook the same, and made great Slaughter of the Turks and of their Horles, and that not only by day but by night also. But the Turks seeing death now present before their Eyes, and no way left for them to escape, for that they were so on every side both by Sea and Land inclosed, thought good thus to adventure their lives, resolving by night to set upon the Greeks rather than upon the Servians, whom they had hitherto accustomed to overcome, and whom they had with often

The Battle between Philip and the Turks.

Slaughters

Slaughters terrified; that so the rest by them also happily discouraged, they might so delay the assault; but in attempting the fame they perceived themselves much deceived, finding they were at their first falling out ready in Arms to receive them; wherefore having in vain given the attempt (as against a strong Fortress) they were shamefully enforced to retire. Yet were they not therewith so discouraged, but that the straight Siege still continuing, they gave the like attempt upon the Servians; but being also by them in like manner with loss repelled, they began now utterly to despair. Wherefore the next day about midnight casting away their Arms, they with their boloms and pockets full of Coin ran down into the Sea-side, towards the Gallies, with purpose to yield themselves unto the Gensarats that were therein; as fearing of them less harm, as of men whom they had never hurt. But the night being dark and misty, and the Moon giving no light, many of them unawares came unto the Greek Gallies, and there flying the smoke, fell into the fire; for being lightened of their Money, they were by them forthwith without any pity slain also. But the Gensarats slew not all their Prisoners, but only such as had brought with them the most Coin; left afterwards betraying the fame, it should have been fought after by the Greeks; the rest they cast into bonds, of whom some they sent unto the Emperor, otherwise they kept to themselves as their own Prisoners. Thus by the valour and good conduct of this worthy devout Captain, the Turks were for that time again chafed out of Europe, and the Country of Thracia delivered of a great fear.

Now by that we have already written, is easily to be seen the chief causes of the decay and ruin of the Greek Empire to have been First, the Innovation and change of their ancient Religion and Ceremonies; by Michael Palaeologus, whereof ensued a world of Wo: then, by Covetousness, covered with the name of good Husbandry, the utter destruction of the chief strength of the Empire; next unto that, by Envy, the ruin of the Greats false Suspicion, the loser of Friends; Ambition, Honours overthrow; Distrust, the great minds torment; and foreign Aid, the Emperors faithless Porter, opening the gate even unto the Enemy himself; whereunto foul Discord joined (as shall be forthwith declared) that wanted that the barbarous Enemy could desire for the helping of them in the supplanting of so great an Empire? But again to our purpose, Michael Companion with his Father Andronicus in the Empire, had by his Wife Mary two Sons, Andronicus who was afterward Emperor, and Manuel surnamed the Despot; and by his Daughters, was married unto Thomas Prince of Epirus, and Theodora married to the Prince of Bulgaria; of all these, the old Emperor Andronicus their Grandfather to entirely loved Andronicus his Nephew, as that in comparison of him he seemed little to regard either his own Children, or the rest of his Nephews, willing them all rather to perish than him; which many supposed him to do, as purposing by him the better to establish the succession of the Empire in his House; as also for his excellency of Wit, and comeliness of Person; the likeness of name also happily furthering his kind affection. For which reasons, he caused him to be honorably brought up in his Court, as not willing to spare him out of his sight either day or night. But when he was out of his Childhood, and grown to be a lusty Youth (at which time mens hot desires are commonly most vehement) he began to contemn all chaffisement and government; especially in so high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Besides that, his Companions became unto him the Ministers and Persuaders of all those vain Delights which untaught youth most desires; and at the first began to lead him forth to walk the Streets, to hawk, to hunt, and to haunt Plays, and afterwards to night-walks also, not well becoming his State; which riotous course of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged Grandfather gave him but a certain spare allowance for his convenient maintenance, he acquainted himself with the rich Merchants of Geneway which dwelt at Pera. Hereof arose hard taking up of Money, great Debts, fine devices how to come by Coin, with secret consultations and purposes of Flight. For when he saw his Grandfather old Andronicus long to live, and his Father Michael like to succeed him, he had no hope of aspiring unto the Empire; whereupon his ambitious thoughts and impotent desires long time tormenting his haughty Heart, suggested unto himself false purposes. For when as he would not obey his Grandfather as his Tutor, nor follow other mens Councils, as a Child, he fought after the Imperial Liberty, and abundance of Wealth, that he might have that was sufficient for himself, and wherewith to reward others, as the Followers of an Emperor. Which seeing he could not do, his Grandfather yet living, and his Father reigning, he fought after the Sovereignty of other Kingdoms and Countries; one while after Armenia, as belonging unto him in the right of his Mother the King of Armenia's Daughter; another while after Peloponessus, and sometime he dreamed of Lesbos and Lemnos, and other the fruitful Islands of the Ægean Sea; which when it was secretly told, sometime to his Father, and sometime to his Grandfather, he was now croffed and reproved of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to pass over many other his youthful pranks, he used in his night-walks secretly to repair unto a certain Gentewomans House, more honourably born, than himself qualified; which Woman, a certain Gallant (and another Adonis) no less affected than himself; wherewith he highly offended, as with his Rival, appointed certain Ruffians and Fencers to watch her House. But upon a certain time about Midnight, Manuel the Despot (his younger Brother) seeking after him, chanced to pass by where they were Watchmen lay; who seeing him hasten by, and not knowing him in the dark, and supposing him to have been the man they looked for, (the Gentewomans best Beloved) let upon him, and so wounded him, that he fell down for dead from his horse; but being by and by again known by others coming in, he was taken up, and half dead carried unto the Court. Which outrage in the Morning being known unto the Emperor, cast him into a great heaviness, as beholding not the time present only, but wisely considering what was like to ensue in the time to come also. But Manuel the Despot being dead of his wounds there received, and the report thereof brought unto Michael the young Emperor his Father, then lying at Thessalonica, struck him to the heart with so great a grief, that falling sick with the conceit thereof, he shortly after died.

Andronicus the untaught Youth nevertheless holding on his wonted course, with a secret purpose to have fled, became thereby still more and more suspicious to his aged Grandfather, not a little careful unto what end those his violent passions would at length tend. And therefore appointed one Syrgiamus (a man of great Credit and Authority in the Court, in whom, as in a reconciled Enemy, he had most undevotedly repented too much truly) to insinuate himself into the youthful Princes acquaintance and favour; that so founding him and his secret Designs, he should not possibly be able without his knowledge to step aside; which of all things the old Emperor feared most, as to the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgiamus being a man directly Place, and of a subtil Wit, was sometime himself suspected of aspiring, and therefore as upon the Misprision of Treason, was by the old Emperor imprisoned; but afterwards by him again enlarged and received into favour, was now put in trust partly to observe the doings of the young Prince. But he not unmindful of the wrong before done unto him, and in hope by troubling the State, either to aspire unto the Empire himself, or at leastwise to some good part thereof; thought now a fit occasion to be misinformed unto him for him to work upon, both for the one and the other, by letting the old Emperor and his ambitious Nephew together by the ears; which opportunity he not minding to let slip, taking the young Prince one day aside, discovered unto him all his Grandfathers device: brief, as follows:

Your Grandfather, noble Prince (said he) hath set me at a Watch over your actions, or more truly to say, at a Blood-bath, to seek after your doings; only, but if it were possible, even after your most secret thoughts also; and so I will be maliciously prepared for you Shares and Pettors, you not aware thereof, foolishly follow your lusts, and childish conceits. For what shall I avoid my secrets to you, and to me? if the best chance, yet must you (as the common saying is) put your feet under another mans Table, and live of his Charge; if it fall not out worse, that you be slain or made away by them you fly unto for relief, or else fall into the Snare by your Grandfather laid for you. But if so be that casting behind you these your fond Devices, you will hearken unto my Counsel, I will shew you a ready way, how you shall in short time, and without any danger, aspire unto the Imperial Seat and Dignity; the only way whereunto is this, if you leaving the City of Constantinople, shall fly out into the Cities and Provinces of Thracia. For seeing men are most commonly by nature desirous of change, and the miserable Thracians are with their exactions grievously vexed; if you shall but once proclaim a Redress of their Grievances, with Immunity for ever, they will all with one accord follow you whithersoever you will, your Grandfathers long and heavy Yoke being cast off; as it were Siphilus his heavy fume, which they had long relied, and never the near. If you like of this advice, I will be with you both the Author and the Leader of this Exploit, and will easily bring to good effect the whole matter; so that you again on the other side promise unto me upon your Faith, to reward this my travel according to my desire therein. But what Rewards shall thee be? Honourable Preferment, large Puffings, great Revenues, the first place in your service, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my consent and knowledge. For you see how willingly I make my self partaker of your Calamity, and Companion of your dangers, no necessity enforcing me thereto; forgetting even my very Faith, in comparison of the love and zeal I bear towards you, whereas, if I were shall by the multitude of Fortune beside me, I have set down my self with patience to endure it. All which considered, you need not to grudge to yield unto my Requests, if you tender your own safety. And forasmuch as the shortness of the time will suffer no long Consultations, and that delay brings extremest dangers, let us without longer stay impart the matter unto such others, as for the barred of the Emperor are like to keep our Counsel, and may yet much further our Designs.

The young Prince moved with this Speech as if it had been with a Charm, easily granted to his desire, confirming the same by his Oath conceived in writing; at which time were present such as were especially to be acquainted with the Plot of the Conspiracy, namely John Cantacrus, and Theodorus Syndemus (both men of great honour, and the old Emperors ancient supposed Friends, and of him beloved, much of like age unto himself) and Alexius Apocanus the third (not of like honour with the other, yet a man of great Place, and of a most subtil and deep wit;) who all understanding the matter, flew to defend themselves not as Ministers, but as Ring-leaders and Captains of the intended Rebellion. This Conspiracy with most solemn Oaths and Promises on every part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter; and to begin withal, Syrgiamus and Cantacrus, by corrupting divers of the great and most gracious Courtiers, procured to themselves the Government of such Cities and Provinces in Thracia, as they thought fittest for them to begin their Rebellion in. Syrgiamus having the Government of the Sea-coast, and the in-land Country, even from the Sea-side to the top of Mount Rhodope; and Cantacrus the Government of the Country about Orhiza. In all which places they mustered Soldiers, provided Armor, entertaining all strangers, and other vagrant and masterless men, as for some great War; besides that, in the Cities for the Government thereof, they placed their trustiest friends, employing such others as they had in suspicion. All which they coloured by rumors of fidelity raised, one while of the coming of the European Tartars from Danius, and another while by the coming of the Turks out of Asia; against whose Invasions these preparations were again thought to be made, for avoiding of suspicion; and the Traitors for their provident care highly commended even by the Emperor himself, against whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiamus notably diffembled, oftentimes withal certifying the young Prince what he had done, and what was likewise of him to be performed.

But the old Emperor seeing his youthful Nephew not to hearken to his grave advice, but still to proceed in his disfigure kind of Life, was about solemnly to have reproved him before the Patriarch and some others of the chief Nobility; if happily such open reproof might have wrought in him some change of Manners; if not then to have committed him to prison; or like enough he was to have so done, had he not been otherwise perfwaded by Theodorus Aditiches, (who of all others was able to do most with him) by reason of the liberty of the time; for then it was almost Shrove-tide, when as the people dightened with excess of meat and drink, were of all other times most fit, upon any light occasion to be drawn into a tumult or uproar; for fear whereof, he was contented for that time to let him alone. But Shrove-tide past, and a good part of Lent also, the old Emperor seeing no amendment in his Nephew, calling unto him Georgius the Patriarch, and the rest of the reverend Bishops then presiding in the City, sent for his Nephew, openly before them to chide him, and to school him for his disordered life; but especially for his purposed flight; that ashamed of such open reproof before such reverend Fathers, he might either amend his life, or

and fro, to be dispersed abroad in the high Ways, and about in the Country near unto the Depots Camp. And after that, he caused the death of the Emperor his Grandfather to be every where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Constantinopolitans in a tumult slain; which the devilers thereof, in every place reported. Yea some there were, that swore they were themselves present at his woful death, and saw it with their Eyes; other some more certainly to perwade the matter, showed long white Goats hair, or such like gathered out of white Wool, as if they had been by the People plucked from the head of the old Emperors Head or Beard, at such time as he was slain. Which things being commonly reported in every Town and Village, but especially in the Depots Camp, wonderfully filled Mens Heads with divers strange and doubtful thoughts; then divers also of the dispersed Edicts being found, and brought to the Depots, truck him (and not without cause) into a great fear inasmuch, that by the persuasions of his best Friends, he without longer stay retired in haste to Thessalonica. Whither shortly after came a Gally from Constantinople, with secret letters from the Emperor to the Depots, for the apprehension of five and twenty of the chief Citizens vehemently suspected for the stirring up of the People to Rebellion, and so to have delivered the City to the Prince, all whom the Depots should have sent bound in that Gally to Constantinople; but they in good time perceiving the danger they were in, secretly stirring up the People, and by and by after ringing out the Bells, the signal appointed for the beginning of the Rebellion) had in a very short time raised a wonderful tumult in the City; inasmuch, that all the Citizens were up in Arms, who running headlong unto the House of the Depots, found not him (for he forewarned their coming, was fled to the Castle) but saw all they met of his, or else robbing them, call them in Prison. As for the Depots House, they took what they found therein, and afterwards pulled it down to the ground. Then coming to the Castle, they fired the Gates; which the Depots seeing, and not able to defend the place, took horse and fled to a Monastery far off, where being taken up by them that pursued him, he full free against his Will, for the safeguard of his life, took upon him the habit of a Monk; nevertheless, he was from thence carried Prisoner to the young Prince his Nephew, who showed himself much more courteous to him, than all the rest of his Nobility and Waiters; for they, as if they would have eaten him up, were even forthwith ready to have torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his arms, saved his life. Yet the next day after, by the persuasion of his Council, he sent him to Didymochium, where he was kept in a most loathsome Prison, being very deep and dark, in manner of a Well, for they, as if they would have eaten him up, were even forthwith ready to have torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his arms, saved his life. Yet the next day after, by the persuasion of his Council, he sent him to Didymochium, where he was kept in a most loathsome Prison, being very deep and dark, in manner of a Well, for they, as if they would have eaten him up, were even forthwith ready to have torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his arms, saved his life. Yet the next day after, by the persuasion of his Council, he sent him to Didymochium, where he was kept in a most loathsome Prison, being very deep and dark, in manner of a Well, for they, as if they would have eaten him up, were even forthwith ready to have torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his arms, saved his life.

Things falling out cross with the old Emperor, and although they were never so well devised, still forcing out upon the world, he became very impatient and doubtful what to do. So it turned, that one day in his melancholy mood, having a Plaster in his hand, to relieve his doubtful mind, he opened the same, as if it were of that heavenly Oracle to ask Counsel; wherein the first vert that he light upon was, Dum celsa difficit Reges, non conferunt in Salmon; When the Almighty Scatter Kings (for their sakes) then were they as white as snow in Salmon. Which he applying to himself, as if all things, troubles, and whatso ever evil had happened in them, proceeded from the Will of God, although for causes to him unknown; he by and by sought to reconcile himself with his Nephew; contrary to the mind of Syrigianes, desiring nothing but trouble. For (as we have before said) the young Prince although he was detested of the People and Liberty of an Emperor, yet he left the Ornaments and Care thereof unto his Grandfather; and had not he oftentimes and earnestly been egged forward by his Companions to affect the whole Empire, happily could and would have contented himself with the former pacification; for being now kind for, he came first to Rhegium, and there visited his Mother (now set at liberty, and sent thither for the furtherance of the desired pacification) where he with her and by her Counsel did whatsoever was there done. So within a few days the matter was brought in to so good terms, that an Assurances were made, and he himself went, and met the Emperor his Grandfather before the Gates of the City; the old Emperor sitting then upon his Horse, and the Prince lighting from his, a good farlong before he came at him; and although his Grandfather was very unwilling, and forbade him so to do, yet he came to him on foot, and kissed his Hand and Foot as he sat on horseback; and afterward taking horse, embraced him, and there kissed one another, to the great contentment of the Beholders; and so having talked some few words, departed; the old man into the City, and the young man into his camp, which then lay near unto Paga; where staying certain days, he came divers times into Constantinople, and so went out again; for as then his Mother, partly for her health, partly for the love of her Son, lay at Paga.

But Syrigianes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and his Nephew, walked up and down sick in mind, with a heavy countenance, especially for that in time of Peace his busy head stood the Common-wealth in no stead. Wherefore in all Meetings and Assemblies, he willingly conversed with them which most disliked of the present State, and spake hardly as well of the Emperor as of his Nephew, as if he thought by them best; whereas in the time of their greatness both he had (as he said) stood them in good stead. But seeing one Afanes Andronicus walking melancholy up and down, as a man with heaviness oppressed; who having done good service for the young Prince, and not of his regard, had fled to the old Emperor, and there found no such thing as he expected for the sake of his grief, although he were a man honourably born, and otherwise endowed with many good parts; with him Syrigianes acquainted himself, as grieved with the like grief that he himself was; with whom as with his Friend, without any dissimulation he plainly discoursed of all such things as his grief desired. But Afanes handling him with great wisdom, did himself with like words speak hardly both of the Emperor and his Nephew; but yet curiously noted whatsoever Syrigianes said, for he had before by Art and Ambition, and as then, took it in displeasure, that he was Enemy unto Catacuzanus, his Son-in-Law, who was all in all with the young Prince, and did did oftentimes comfort him. But the fang being thoroughly set, Afanes came secretly unto the old Emperor, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except he betime laid hold on Syrigianes, affecting the Empire, he should in short time be by him brought to the Scaffold. Whereupon Syrigianes was forthwith clapt fast in Prison; whole House with all his Wealth, the common People took the Spoil of; and not contented to have rased it down to the ground, converted the Site thereof, together with the pleasant Vineyards adjoining unto the same, into a place of feed Goats and Sheep; a worthy reward for his manifold Treacheries. The young Prince shortly after going to Constantinople, was there crowned Emperor, as fellow in the Empire with his Grandfather; unto which solemnity in the great Temple of Sophia, both the Emperors riding, it fortune the old Emperor by the Humbling of his Horse to be overturned, and foully lacerated in the mire, the Streets being then very foul by reason of much rain but a little before fallen; which many took as ominous, and portending the evil fortune which shortly after befell him. During the time of this Peace, it fortune that as the young Prince was a hunting in Chersinopolis, twenty Turks adventurers, were by force of weather driven on shore; who before they would yield themselves Prisoners, made a great Fight with the Emperors men, and slew divers of them; in which conflict the young Emperor himself was wounded in the Foot, wherewith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late Prince, and now Fellow in the Empire with his aged Grandfather, held not himself long to contented, but after the manner of ambitious Men (and continually prick forward by his aspiring Favourites) longed to have the whole Government to himself, which hardly brooketh any Partner; and therefore weary to see his Grandfather live so long, resolved no longer to expect his natural death, (although it could not by course of Nature be far off) but by one device or other to thrust him from the Government; or if that might not be wrought, at once to dispatch him both of life and state together. And the first way he took the Plot wherewith so foul and horrible a Treason was to be built, he by the Council of his Mother and others, by whom he was most directed, sent for Michael the Prince of Bulgaria, his Brother-in-Law (though before to him unknown, as was his Wife his Sister also) to make with him a firm League, to the intent by him to provide, that if the Prince of Servia (who had but lately married the old Emperors nigh Kinswoman, and so to him much devoted) should take part with him, he should by the Bulgarian his Neighbour be intangled. Who so sent for, with his Wife, the old Emperors Daughter, caused to Dyspochium, where they were many days, he honourably entertained both by the young Emperor and his Mother; for why, this meeting plotted upon great Treason, was finely coloured, with the desire the young Emperor had to see his Sister and her Husband, as before unto him unknown, and the Emperors Daughter, who had not been in three and twenty years before. But the secret conclusion betwixt them was, that the Bulgarian Prince should to the uttermost of his power aid the young Emperor against his Grandfather, and he likewise him against the Servian, as he should have need; and further, that if his Grandfather being deposed, he should recover the whole Empire, then to give him a great sum of Money, with certain special Cities and Provinces confining upon him, as in Dowry to his kind Brother-in-Law, and Companion in his labours. So Michael the Bulgarian Prince honourably entertained by the young Emperor and the old Emperors his Mother-in-Law, loaded with rewards, and promises of great reward, returned home into his Country.

This matter thus dispatched, the young Emperor therewith encouraged, and knowing all the Constantinopolitans, besides the other Cities of Thracia, exceedingly to favour him and his proceedings; by whom also he was secretly invited to hasten his coming thither (as was weary of the long life and laziness, as he termed it, of his Grandfather) thought it best cunningly to go about the matter; that to his Grandfather being with as little stir as might be deposed, he himself might alone enjoy the Empire. But needing Money for the effecting of so great matters, he by force took all the Money from the Collectors, whom the old Emperor had sent into Thracia for the taking up of Money there, telling them that he was an Emperor also, and in need of Money, and that the common charge was likewise by the common Purse to be discharged. After that he took his way towards Constantinople, pretending that upon fiscal causes he had occasion to send Embassadors unto the Sultan of Egypt; for the transporting of whom he was there to take order for the setting forth of a great Ship, and other things necessary for the journey. Neither went he slenderly appointed, but with a great Power; and the Cities of Thracia before were assured unto him, such as he suspected being thrust out of Office, and others more assured unto him placed in their steads. But whilst he thus bestirred himself, one of those that were most inward with him, detesting to foul a Treason, secretly fled from him unto his Grandfather, from point to point discovering unto him all the intended Treacheries; and wistful, how that his Nephew had determined to depose him from his Empire, or otherwise to bereave him of his life if he should stand upon his Guard; but if in the attempt he should find ease success, then to spare his life; and depriving him of the Imperial Dignity, to thrust him as a Monk into a Monastery; and therefore advised him to beware how he suffered him after his wonted manner to come into the City, for fear of a general revolt, but rather for force to keep him out. Which the Emperor hearing, and comparing with other things which he had heard of others, yet founding in his Ears, deeming it to be true, stood up, and in the anguish of his Soul thus complained unto God; Revenge my quarrel O God, upon them that do me wrong, and let them be ashamed that rise up against me; and preserve thou unto me the Imperial Power, which by thee given unto me, he cometh to take from me without my self being deposed. And whereas he began to consider what course to take for the assurance of himself and his State in so great a danger. And first he sent unto his Nephew (came half way) to forbid him from entering the City, and to tell him, that it was a great folly for him, being so manifest a Traitor, both unto his Grandfather and the State, to think his traitorous purposes to be unknown unto the World. And beside in way of reproof to rehearse unto him, how many occasions he had given for the breaking of the League with his Grandfather; first in taking away the Money from the Collectors, wherewith the State never stood in more need; secondly by reason of the division of the Empire, which required double charge; then in that he had in the City every where displaced

such Governors and Magistrates as his Grandfather had sent thither, and placed others at his pleasure, with many other like facts, declaring his treacherous aspiring mind, for which he was not without cause by his Grandfather forbidden to enter the City. After that, the old Emperor by secret Letters craved aid of Grates Prince of Servia, and Demetrius the Despot his brother, who was then Governor of Thessalonica and the Countries adjoining, commanding him with Andronicus and Michael his Nephews (Governors of Macedonia) with all the Forces they were able to raise, and such aid as should be sent unto them out of Syria, with all speed to join together and to go against the young Emperor. But the Letters thus written unto the Prince of Servia, the Despot, and others, (as is before said) were for the most part intercepted, by such as the young Emperor had for that purpose placed upon the Straits of Constantinople, and the other passages; especially such as were written in Paper, yet some others in fine white linnen Cloth, and secretly fowed in the Garments of such as passed them, escaped for all their frate search, and were delivered. And in truth nothing was done, or about to be done in Constantinople, but that the young Emperor was by one or other advertised thereof; whereas the old Emperor on the other side, understood nothing what the great Councils, yet and many other of the young Emperors nearest Kindredmen also; who curiously observing whatsoever was done in the City, forthwith certified him thereof. Amongst whom was also Theodorus the Marquis, one of the old Emperors own Sons; who many years before by the Emperors his Mother sent into Italy, and there honourably married, was by his prodigal course of life there grown far in debt; so that leaving his Wife and Children behind him, he was glad after the decease of his Mother, to flee unto his Father at Constantinople, and there now lived; who befide that he most honourably maintained him in the Court, and was many great things upon him, and also all his Debts, which were very great. All which Fatherly kindness he forgetting went about most frivolous like to have betrayed his aged Father. For he also dreaming after the Empire, and for many causes (but especially for that he was come a Latine) by his manner of thought he could not do him a greater despite than by revolting unto the young Emperor; so that the nearer he was in blood, the more he was his Father's unnatural Enemy. Shortly after, Demetrius the Despot, having received the Emperors Letters at Thessalonica, called unto him Andronicus, Michael his Nephews, the Governors of Macedonia, with whom joining all his Force, and daily expecting more aid out of Servia, he first spoiled the young Emperors Friends and Favourites in Macedonia, giving the Spoil of them in all the Cities and Towns of Macedonia, unto their Souldiers, who made havoc of whatsoever they light upon; and whosoever seemed any way to withstand them or dislike of their Proceedings, they took their Goods and Lands they confiscated, and drove the men themselves into exile. Neither was the young Emperor Andronicus in the mean time idle, but secretly sent out his Edicts, into all parts of the Empire, yet into the very Cities of Constantinople and Thessalonica; and over all Macedonia; whereby he proclaimed unto the People in general, a releasement of them from all Tributes, Impositions, and Payments; and frankly promised unto the Souldiers and Men of War, the augmenting of their Penfions and Pay; which were no longer bruted; but that most men were therewith moved both in Word and Deed to favour his proceedings, doing what they could to further the same, and by secret Letters inviting him to hasten his coming into the City; who thereupon coming to Regnum, by his Embassadors sent from thence, requested the old Emperor, either to give him leave according to the League betwixt them, to come into the City, or else to send him certain of the chief of the Nobility and Clergy, with some of the better and more understanding sort of the Burgers and Citizens also; unto whom he might frankly speak his mind, for them faithfully to deliver the same again unto the Emperors his Grandfather, and the People. Which request the old Emperor perceiving to be full of Deceit and Treachery, for a good space answered thereunto nothing at all, but stood all silent, as doubting what to grant; for, to suffer his Nephew to come into the City, he saw was dangerous to the Citizens (as he well knew) being for the most part inclined to revolt to him to soon as they should once see him within the Gates; and to send any forth unto him, as he desired, might be (as he feared) an occasion of some tumult to be after raised in the City; for he knew that his Nephews drift therein was, openly by fair words, and secretly with great gifts and large promise, first to gain them, and by them the rest of the Citizens. Both which things being dangerous, he made choice of the easier, and sent forth unto him two of the most noble Senators, two of the most reverend Bishops, two other grave Prelates, and the four of the chief Burgesses of the City; unto whom at their coming unto him, he in the open hearing of all men delivered this premeditated and crafty Speech.

It is not unknown unto the World, you my Subjects, to have always been unto me more dear than of late have been unto my self; and as you have seen my ambition conceits, so I have seen your Emperors his Grandfather's good Will, gone out. For you see how that I neither spare mine own life, or my pleasure, for the care I have of you; I come unto you compassed about with a Guard of armed men, as in the manner now of Kings only, for the safety of their high places; but of others only of far meaner calling, whom I desire to comfort, banished from their Parents and Kindred, hath enforced to wander here and there, with death also before their Eyes. Let any man tell me how I came by these wounds which I yet bear in my body, but in fight with the Enemies of my Country which pass over the Walls of this Thracia; or else dwelling near unto Illyria, do with their manhoods from thence miserably waste that fide of Thracia which is next unto them? For I (to tell you the very truth) seeing the old Emperor by reason of his great years to become feeble and blockish, and not possible to be awaked out of his drowsie sleep, neither any while to grieve, whom as the poor Christians his Subjects were both by day and night, some as Sacrifices slain by the barbarous Enemies, some carried away into most miserable Captivity, and the rest poor and naked to be driven out of their Houses and Cities; not to speak in the mean time of the greater mischiefes in Asia, and how many Cities have been there lost through the old Emperors slab and negligence; when I saw these things (I say) broken with a piercing grief, which my heart could not endure, I went out for two causes, either by some kind of honourable death to end my grief, together with my life, or else to the uttermost of my power to stand my Country in some head. For by no means it can come to pass, but that a man, and be that hath of long time reigned, must at length become loathsome unto his Subjects, and incur their deadly hatred. For why, God hath made nothing in this life immutable and firm; whereby it cometh to pass, as we see, that all worldly things joy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force Fortune to his desire, and strive to bind things unto a certain firm and constant course, he shall but lose his labour, and in vain strive against nature. But whatsoever is contrary unto nature, or exceedeth the just bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that caused the wife men to say, and to leave to us as Rules, Not to dwell too long upon any thing; and a measure to be the fairest virtue. For you see how that my Grandfather being grown to great years, and having reigned so long (I may almost say) as never did any but he, is become hateful unto all his people; and yet regards not either how to discharge himself of so great a burden, or how to relieve the declining State of the Empire, or so much as grieveth to see the Successors of the Empire to die before him: For my Father is dead without any fruit of the Empire, except the bare Title only; and others also nearest to him of blood, and far younger than he, are dead likewise; and happily I self may die also before I shall receive any profit thereof for the benefit of my Country. Especially unto a man that summeth no danger, and regards not his life? But some perhaps will suspect me of Ambition, for departing from the Emperors my Grandfather, and for refusing to be ruled by him. Which thing I neither flatly deny, or altogether confess. For might I see the Empire increase, and the bounds thereof enlarged, I could willingly content my self, and at my ease take my rest; clearing my self up with such hope as do they that bear with their Cocks, making time to pay long for their dinner; in hope thereby to fare the better. But seeing the State of the Empire daily to decline from evil to worse, and the miserable people carried away Captives, or slain by the Enemies even at the Gates and under the Walls of the Imperial City; what deem you me then to think? For most men cast their present grief, with the hope of future good, although the same be but vain: But unto me is not left even such vain hope unto my false comfort. And can you marvel at the impotent affliction of the Great Alexander of Macedon, grievously distressed to see his Father to keep Vicers upon Viceroy, and to cut off all the hope of his Sons glory, by leaving him so few occasions of War; and not think me (to whom you see the quite contrary is chanced, and from whom not only the hope of the Empire is cut off, for the waiting thereof, but even the cause of a quiet life) to be sad and grieve thereof? Moved with such, and not able longer to endure it, at length I rise up, and requested of the Emperors my Grandfather, but a thousand men at Arms, promising him by the Power of God with them to preserve the Cities in Bithynia, and to drive his Enemies further off. (Before that having them) they should pass over the Strait, and besiege the Imperial City of Constantinople; which I for a small request he not only denied me, but hath ever since taken me for his mortal Enemy. But this and many other things else I pass: I have now another request unto him by you, which is, That he would give me eight thousand Duckets to content my Souldiers withall, who of my share from place to place roamed up and down with me, whose lives were in uncertain Fortune: Which granted, I will no more be unto my Grandfather troublesome, but dismissing my Forces, hold my self right well contented.

Having thus said, he rose out of his Seat, and taking them apart one after another, courteously discoursed with them, and so filling them with great hopes, sent them away, every one departing from him and coming into the City, became as it were the open Proclaimers of his Praises, enslaving the people with a greater desire of him than before. Which the old Emperor hearing, and perceiving almost all his Friends in the City to be in heart revolted from him; and with all hearting to be of them, he was so much troubled, that he was therewith exceedingly vexed. Yet he thought it best before any such thing should happen, to prove their minds, and to hear the Counsel of the Patriarch, and Afanes, and the other Bishops also; unto whom being by one of the Senators called together, he declared his mind, as followeth:

Were I assured, that having deposited my self of the Imperial Dignity, I should my self live in safety, and see my people well governed, I would I should never be of the Company of the Faithful, if I did not by much prefer a pleasant quiet contented life before an Empire. For if a man would seek for the pleasure of the mind, what can he be so contented, than to be disburdened of all Cares, and free from such dangerous, as attend high Estates? But if for my sin and the sin of my people, as also for the sin of mine Ancestors, I have the vengeance of God in manner of a violent Tempest raging against us, (whereby our Empire and I and yet the People, by the help of God reformed and quieted the State of the Empire, grievously troubled with Discord in the Church, and the often invasion of the Enemies; and taught by long experience know not how in so great hurle and tempest which way to turn my self: How can I with safety commit unto my Nephew so great a Charge, who as yet is both an untried Youth, and so careless of his own good, as that he knoweth not how well to govern his own private affairs? For how giving over his Power to young unskilful men, and having flung away his Imperial Possessions amongst them, be himself liveth in penury and want; neither regards any thing more than his Dogs and Kitts, of whom he keeps few less than a thousand Currs, and as many Hawks, and not much fewer men to look unto them. Wherefore unto such a man, how may I safely commit either my life, or the administration of mine Empire, by God committed unto me? But I will never writing and willingly cast away either my Subjects or my self. For my Nephew I have loved, not only more than my Wife and Children, but (to say the truth) more than my self; as you well know how tenderly I have brought him up, how carefully I have instructed and advised him, as purposing to have left him the Heir and Successor both of my Wisdom and mine Empire, that he might be the better pleased both God and man. But less, contemning my good counsel, hath spent whole nights in Banqueting, and Rites, and Banquets; which he hath also done with his own Brother, and to be brief, he hath risen and lifted up his hand against me his Grandfather, and a Grandfather that had of him so well deserved, attempting such a Villany as the Sun never saw. Wherefore you ought also to hate and detest his wickedness, and to strive to restrain his impudent Disobedience, and by your Ecclesiastical Counsel to denounce him unworthy of the Empire and the Communion of the Faithful, as one separated from God; that so ashamed and corrected, he may lovingly thither return from whence he is shamefully departed, and again be made Heir both of mine Empire and Kingdoms; for there is no man alive whom I had rather have promoted unto the Empire, than him who I have so often heard his own counsel, and obey my Counsel. As for the conclusion he used in his former Speech, it was altogether feigned, crafty, and malicious; for you have heard how many

Reproaches

*Reproaches he hath given me in all that Speech, wherewith his conclusion agreeth not; but the more to stir up the hearers thereof against me, did of purpose so con-

The Patriarch with divers of the Bishop conspire
Emperor.

Upon this, moſt of the foreſaid grave and learned Biſhops agreed, that the young Emperour ſhould no more be named in the Prayers of the Church, until he had better conformed himſelf. Howbeit the Patriarch and ſome others ſecretly favouring both him and his proceedings, liked not thereof, and therefore ſaying nothing thereunto, returned home unto their own houſes. But meeting once or twice afterwards in the

Patriarch's house, they there conspired together against the old Emperor ; with whom also divers of the Nobles, and of the Clergy, were secretly joined. Oath was conceived in writing, whereby they bound themselves to continue confiant in thair their wicked Refolution. Whereupon, about threethree days after, the Patriarch causing the Bells to be rung, and a great number of the common people flocking together, pronounced the Sentence of death upon the said Emperor, against his will, in their publick Prayer, omit the name of the young Emperor, or refuse to do him all Honour due unto an Emperor. Which thing not a little grieved the old Emperor, as appeared by his Speech, in saying, If the Deutor of Peace be so maine against us, in hope of Reward promised by my Nephew, that causing us to be thus against our selves, and the Church, he should seduce us against us, the people, the attempts of the vulgar people against us, if we reflect but mans life for the Patriarch so much as in him he is, I see, the murderer of us. So the Bishopps of the contrary Faction, moved with the notable impudency of the Patriarch, excommunicated him likewise, as he had done them, with the same Frolicke of the Authour of the said Faction. And on, and incited with Bribes to the troubling of the State ; for which cause also he was by the Emperors Commandment committed unto fasting keeping in the Monastery called Manganium. But about two days after, the young Emperor came out of the Walls of Constantinople, to see his Grandfather, and to receive his Blessings, came unto him ; earnestly requesting, that it might be lawful for him alone to enter into the City, to do his duty to his Grandfather. But neither he, nor he, neither his words were any whit at all regarded, but was by such as stood upon the Walls, himself, with stones driven away ; so that he could not stand, but was miserably runned down into the City, saying, All his talk to be nothing effected but deceit and fraud ; and so for that time he retired a little from the Walls. But night being come, certain buffe heads among the common people (and they not a few) secretly meeting together gave him knowledge, that about midnight, the Watchmen should be sent to the Walls, to the Watchmen in security, he should come unto the Walls, where they would be ready with Ropes to draw him up unto the top of the Bulwarks ; which done, the matter (as they said), was as good as dispatched ; for that they were overpowered, that the Citizens so soon as they heard the Watchmen call, should be ready to follow them ; so that they would forthwith all revolt unto him. So he according to this appointment, about midnight approaching the Walls, found there no such matter as he had well hoped, for the receiving of him into the City ; But contrariwise the Watchmen came happily with all along the Walls, and calling out to each other to be prepared, he seeing he could hope, he went Catechumenus Synodus, his chief Counsellors, leaving the South side of the City, in a little Boat rowed fifty all along the Wall that is toward the Sea, if happily they might there find their Friends, and to be received in; but there the Watchmen also descrying them from the Walls, and calling unto them, but receiving no answer, began to cast stones at them, and to make a noise, so that deceived of their purpose, and out of hope, they were glad to get them further off, and to depart as they came.

But the evil success of this Exploit was shortly after with his better Fortune recompensed; for by and by after, fewer Letters were sent unto him from Theoflancia, requesting him with all haste to come to her assistance; and the Council of the Bishop, with divers of the Nobility, and the good liking of the people in general at his coming to open the Gates of the City unto him: Whereupon he leaving a great part of his Army with Synadenus, to keep off the rage of Constantinople, he himself with the rest of his Army went forward towards Theoflancia, where he in the habit of a plain Country man entered the City unsuspected; but being got within the Gate, and there calling off that simple attire wherewith he was clothed, he shewed his Rich and brave Germany, and presently appeared to the young Emperor, the people came flocking about him, and with many joyful Acclamations received him as their Lord and Sovereign; yet some few, more favouring the old Emperor, fled into the Castle, and there stood upon their Guards defended, as at length taken for traitors, and were notably defeated, was at length taken from them.

Theſſalonians thus yielded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Aſan Michael, the old Emperors chief Captains, then lying with their Army not far off, and many well truſting one another, ſaid ſoftly to thoſe who ſtood by, Why ſtand ye ſtill? ſee ye not the young Emperour; who departing from Theſſalonica, came to Serre, which by compoſition was delivered unto him alſo, but not the Caſtle; for that was by Baſilius Nicephorus (the Captain thereof) ſtil holden for the old Emperour. This Baſilius was a ſon of that Captain of the young Emperours of great Capacity or Wit, as the finer fort ſuppoſed, and therefore not of them much regarded, or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter: whom yet the old Emperour for his plain ſincerity, more than for any thing elſe, had made Captain of that Caſtle, and ſo ſent him to the Countre theſeſides, which he yet ſtil held, and in theſe moſt troubleſome times ſhewed himſelf wiſer than all that had to thought of him; of whom ſome died in deſpair, ſome fled, ſome were taken Priſoners, and ſo ſuffered a thouſand evils, the reſt with the loſe of a Honour, ſtood firme, and ſo the young Emperour ſaw the young; whereas he alone, looking but even forward upon his Allegiance, with his truſt in God, ſo long as the old Emperour lived, oppoſed himſelf againſt theſe troubles, and ſtood ſaſt for him, and was not to be moved with any fair Proſpect, ſo that the young Emperour, ſeeing the ſpiriting Emperour, whereof he lacked none. But having ſtrongly fortified the Caſtle committed to his Charge, there kept himſelf, until that hearing of the death of the old Emperour, he then reconciling himſelf to the young, as unto his right Sovereign, delivered up the Caſtle, and ſo ſoon as he ſaw his Fidelity gave it him again to hold for him, in as plain manner as he had before held it for his Grandfather. For wiſdom men honour Vertue even in their Enemies, as did King Philip in Demetrius, when as he ſaid, if any Athenian living in Athens, doth ſay that he prefers me before Demetrius, I will ſlay him. I ſay will much money, but not think him worthy my friendship; but if any of my Country-laks shall hate me, him will I impute as a Cadle, a flrong Wall, or a Bulwark; and yet admire his virtue, and reckon the City happy in having such a man. And so in few words to conclude a long discomfite, the young Emperor Alphonso having received through Macchiois, and without much taken all the strong Towns and Cities thither, he there took also Demetrius the Depots Wife and Children, with all his Treasure, as also the Wives of Andronicus and Aspar, and of all the Senators that followed them: after whom the young Emperor Alphonso sent Macchiois for the most part taken and calt into prison some at Theffalonia, some at Didamichum, some of the rest afterward most miserably perishing in exile. Whereupon the old Emperor discouraged, was about to have sent his Embassadors unto Alphonso for Peace, whilst he was yet thus buffed; but Macchiois and Alphonso would have had not another hope arising in the mean time, quite altered that his better purpose. It fortuned at the same time, whilst the old Emperor was thus thinking of Peace, that Michael the Bulgarian Prince, in hope of great profit thereof to himself, sent his Ambassadors unto him against the young Emperor his Nephew Alphonso. Offer the old Emperor his Nephew accepted, and Embassadors were sent to and fro, about the full conclusion of the matter, so man being acquainted therewith, more than two or three of the Emperor's most secret friends and trusty Counsellors, in the mean time disdaining to be coopt up as he was wont to be by his Nephews Captains, even in the Imperial City; sent out one Constantinus Assen, with the greatest part of his strength against him; who encountering him at the River Maurus, was there by him in plain battel overthrowen and taken prisoner. The young Emperor's Confined Army flying headlong back again to Constantinople, they thus prosperously proceeding with the young Emperor, and the Countries of Macedonia and Thracia now almost all at his Command, he returned in half with all his Power unto Constantinople, to prevent the coming of the Bulgarians; thither he sent his Army, and being the City weakly manned, should treacherously and secretly manfully, thus were about him, and so seize upon the City themselves; or at leastwise give him such Aid as might keep him out, and so cut off all his hope for obtaining of the Victual in the City; and so many living shut it up on the one side by Lands, and the Venitians; with their Galleies on the other side by Sea; who then at odds with the Genoways dwelling at Pera, kept all that strait Sea betwixt Europe and Asia, in such sort, as that neither way, either for Merchandise could be brought that way, either for Provisions to Pera. The young Emperor coming to Constantinople, and at his first coming to have entered the City, in hope without any great resistance to have been received; but repulsed by the Defendants, was glad to get him further off. About the same time, the old Emperor of the Island Horlemon, sent his Ambassadors unto the Bulgarian Prince, unto the old Emperor, who although he wanted men, and was right glad of their coming, yet remembering the harms he had before received by foreign Aid, and not now daring to trust them too far, sent them away, and desired the City, more than by their General and former Advocates the Commanders with him. Now the young Emperor upon the coming of this Aid, left some great harm might befall either the old Emperor or himself, to the utter subversion of their State. He secretly sent unto his Grandfather, requesting him to be well advised how he trusted those who were so far off, offering himself to do whatever he should command, and to bear the great a harm should happen unto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But the truth the old Emperor had conceived of this Bulefaro and his friends, he had not revealed, as he had little lifted unto his Nephew's regard, as that he had not been able to do so. He thought that, how could he well trust him that had so oftentimes deceived him? Wherewith the young Emperor much grieved, and now again almost died, till he had been by the Emperor's side, and drew near unto the place where they were. He then saw the Emperor, who lay on his back, and Horfimen lay encamped; from whence he sent certain Embassadors with great Gifts and Presents to the General, and the rest of the chief Commanders, to let them know that he would not have any more of this great trouble, if they would without further troubling themselves, turn home again; whereunto they willingly granted, and so were of him honourably feasted, and on the next day after conducted upon their way home.

It happened, that the young Emperor returning back again from the Bulgarians, and incamped in the place where he before lay; two of the Watchmen of the City, the one called Germaris, and the other Cafellanus, both Smiths, hid secretly unto him, who admitted to his Presence, and all others commanded to depart, excepting Cafellanus and the Emperor, who, concealing himself, and saying unto him, that he would under his hand writing assure them of such a sum of Money, and such Possessions as they required; which he easily granting, and the hour and manner of performing of the same, being by them declared and agreed upon, they by and by without longer stay, for fear of being taken, fled again into the City. But the Emperor staying long days in the flame place, caused certain Ladders to be made of great Ropes, which as they use in great Ships; But the appointed night being come, the two Traytors having provided great store of good Wine, liberally gave the flame by way of entertainment unto those who were their Companions near unto them; who drank for a night long thereof, that not able any longer to hold up their heads, they fell into a found a sleep, as that but for breathing they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certain Soldiers of the young Emperors, with the forcible Ladders; where the Traytors by and by sawing under them by a Rope cast down, and making them fall unto the top of the Wall, received by the flame eighteen armed men; who being got to the City, without more ado broke open the Roman Gate, whereby the young Emperor with his Army profrely entered, no man letting him. Being now in the night marking, how things appointed to befall us, are by no means to be feared, although we he thereof before never so plainly forewarned: For the same night the City was surprised, immediately after the setting of the Sun, the Gates being that, a certain Country man came running in all haste from out of a Village near by, and knocking hard at the Gate, called for aid, saying it good to fear, that some of the Soldiers; who being come, he told them, how that a little before he had seen a great number of the young Emperors men marching towards the City, by the way that leadeth unto the Roman Gate; which being told unto the old Emperor, did not a little trouble him. And therefore he thought it good to send out certain Scouts, to see if it were clear about the Walls

Walls toward the Land, from Sea to Sea; which his purpose Attochita his chief Counselor letted, saying, It did not become a courageous mind to be upon to light an occasion so much moved; for that either the rumor was false, or the endeavour of so few vain, the Walls and Gates of the City being so filled with armed men; which happily he said not so much upon ignorance of Martial Affairs, as blinded by a certain commandment Power, that the supernal Decree given by God himself against the old Emperor, might at length take place. And again, the third part of that night yet faint past, divers other Countrymen came running unto the said Gate Givralima, and told the Watchmen upon the Walls, that a great number of men were met together at the Roman Gate; whereof the Emperor hearing, was therewith much more troubled than before, inasmuch that sharply rebuking Attochita, he said unto him, Thou seemest to be strangely metamorphosed into a man of Iron, which art become so secure, as not to have any feeling of the danger wherewith we are inclosed: Seest thou not that this matter requires, not that we should thus sit still and take our rest? For the noise of my Nephew foundeth in mine Ears as the found of a great drum, and disquieteth my mind. I feel a Sea of Calamity broken out against me, which overwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Nevertheless he, firm in his former Opinion, notwithstanding of those Reports; and therefore rose to go to bed, to thence indeed that he accounted nothing of them, but as false alarms. But the Emperor left alone, and no body with him unto whom he might break his grief, laid him down upon a Palace, not contenting himself with a Pillow, but together with them put on extreme dejection, lay tumbling now and fro as a man in mind troubled with divers many and heavy thoughts. In the mean time he heard a great noise at the Court-Gate, and the report of the entering of the young Emperor his Nephew, with a great clattering of Arms; for there were above eight hundred Soldiers entered with him, and withall they of the City on every side saluted him with most joyful Acclamations. But the old Emperor hearing the great Tumult and Out-cry, rose from his Pillow, exceedingly troubled; and destitute of all the help of his Captains and Souldiers, (for wily, his Palace was altogether desolate, except of such as were his ordinary Waiters) betook himself unto his Prayers, beseeching God not to forsake him in so great a danger, but in his mercy to defend him from the fury of those wicked men. Who presently heard him, and sent him present relief; for the while he was praying, in the Palace, the young Emperor with him, calling together all his Captains and Lieutenants, frantically charged them upon pain of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the Majesty of the old Emperor his Grandfather, nor any other about him; for this Victory (said he) God hath given us, for this Victory (said he) Will ordereth all things, wherunto all things obey; the Stars, the Air, the Sea, the Earth, Men, Floods, Tempests, Plagues, Earthquakes, Showers, Deaths, and such like; sometime to our Bliss, and sometime to our Correction and Destruction; wherefore using us as the Instruments of his Chastisement, he hath given unto this present Victory, which peradventure to-morrow he will give to others to use against us, and then as we have been unto them we have overcome, such will they also shew themselves unto us again; wherefore if neither nightness of blood, neither that we be all of one Country, may move us yet in respect of our selves less us life mercy, that we feel not the Hand of God upon us in like case. In the mean time a Courtier opened a Wicket unto the young Emperor, with this Message from his Grandfather.

Forasmuch as God this day (my Son) hath given The pit unto thee the Imperial Scepter, taken from me, I rest Supplique of thee this one good turn, for many which I can of have even from my birth bestowed upon thee, (for Empers in this my hard estate I let pass, that I next unto his No God have been the Author of thy Nativty and In-crease) I give me my life, (for thy Fathers dead, and with violent Weapon fill not that blood from which thou thy self hast taken the Fountain of life. Man truly beholdeth Heaven and Earth, and Heaven and Earth behold mens Actions; wherefore make not the Heavens and the Earth beholders of thy wicked an Outrage as never man ever committed. If Brothers blood long ago cried out unto the Lord against Cain, how much louder shall thy Fathers blood cry unto the Lord, and declare Jo great a wickedness unto the Earth, the Sun, and Stars, and make it abhorred of all the Princes of the World? Regard my miserable old age, which of it self promiseth unto me shortly death, but unto thee a Rest after long Care. Reverence the hands which have oftentimes most lovingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy Swearing-Claime. Reverence thine Lips which have oftentimes most lovingly kissed thee, and called thee my other Soul: Have pity upon a bruised Reed, cast down by Fortune, and do not then again tread upon it. And seeing thou art thy self a man, be not too proud of thy present Fortune, but consider the uncertainty and change of worldly things, taking by me Example's life in me the end of long life, and marvel, how one night having received me an Emperor of many years, leaveth me now subject unto another mans power for ever.

The young Emperor Andronicus moved with this Speech, and taking great care of his Grandfathers safety, scarce abating from tears, entered the place, and coming to his Grandfather, humbly saluted him, embraced him, and with cheerful words comforted him. Straightway after he went unto the Monastery Manganium, where (as is aforesaid) the Patriarch Eusebius was by the old Emperors Commandment kept in safe keeping; whom the young Emperor now took from thence, and carrying him away in one of the Emperors richest Chariots, restored him again unto his Patriarchal Dignity; where in he afterwards spared not to revenge himself to the full, and most cruelly to persecute the old Emperors Friends. That day from morning unto night, a man might have seen all the riches and wealth of such Noblemen as had taken part of the old Emperor, carried away, and their goodly Houses overthrowen and made the scorn of the base common people; but especially the House and Wealth of Theodorus Attochita, a man but the day before in greatest favour with his Prince, and of all others next unto the Emperor himself, of greatest Authority and Credit, whose whole Wealth (not that only which he had laid up in trust with his Friends, discovered by Notes found in his Study) became most part a prey unto the common people, and the rest confiscated unto the Prince. Thus he which earst of all others next unto the Emperor was accounted most fortunate, was now upon the sudden, with his Wife and Children brought unto extreme beggary; and after many years Felicity, in one day day cast into the bottom of despair and misery; where a man might have heard many complaining, say, All that Wealth and Treasure to have been the blood and tears of the poor oppressed Subjects, brought unto him by them whom he had made Rulers and Governors of the Provinces and Cities of the Empire: to the intent that when they had dealt cruelly with the people, as with their Slaves, he might stop them for coming to complain of their griefs unto the Emperor; and that the eye of the Revenger had not always slept, but was now at length awaked, and had of him yet cruelly taken sufficient punishment; which every where to hear, increased not a little his grief. As for himself, he was confined unto Dysmaeleum, as the place of his exile and banishment; where after he had a certain time poorly lived, he was sent for back again to Constantinople; where having nothing left to relieve himself (for his house at the coming of the young Emperor, was in the fury of the people plucked down to the ground, and the very pavement thereof digged up) he went unto the Monastery of Clara there by, which long before built by the Emperor Justinian, and become ruinous, he in the time of his Prosperity had with great charge repaired, and therein now (having made shipwreck of all that he had) quietly shrouded himself, to the great comfort both of his Body and afflicted Mind, where he not long after died.

But to return again unto the old Emperor, as yet in doubt what should become of himself, it fortuned that the same day that the City was taken, the young Emperor at night returning to the Palace, by the way met with Niphon sometime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to deal with his Grandfather. Whereunto the young Emperor answering, That he would deal with him honourably and Emperor like; he was by him therefore blamed and reproved. For this Niphon being of a crafty sibil Wit and malicious Nature, besides that he secretly hated all them upon whom Fortune greatly either fawned or frowned, bare an especial grudge against the old Emperor: First, for that at such time as he was right worthily for his shameful covetousness and extortion, by the rest of the Bishops and Clergy thrust out of the Patriarchship, he was not by him (as he looked for) defended; and secondly, for that dreaming again after the Patriarchal Dignity, he thought it one good step thereunto, to have him (as his greatest Enemy) taken out of the way. Wherefore he said now unto the young Emperor, If thou desire to Reign without fears, give not thine Honour unto another's, but taking all the Ornaments of the Empire from the old man, cast Hair-cloth upon him, and Jo clap him fast in prison, or thrust him into exile. This mischief the matter amongst them, that although they could not quite draw the young Emperors mind from his Grandfather, yet they much changed the fame, so that he could no longer endure to take him for his Companion in the Empire. Whereupon after many Meetings and Consultations had, it was decreed, That the old man should still retain the Name and Ornaments of an Emperor, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to sit still quietly in his Chamber, with the yearly maintenance of 10000 Ducats, for the maintenance of himself and such as tended upon him; to be raised of the filling before the City of Constantinople; a poor Pension for the maintenance of so great an Emperor. Of which so shameful a Decree, Eusebius the Patriarch was also a furtherer, who seeing an Emperor that had reigned so long, cast down, and flung up as it were in prison, was so far from grieving thereat, that foolishly rejoicing, he took thereof abundantly wrested this Text of Scripture, saying in his ministrations, Laudatur iustus, cum viderit ultionem. The just shall rejoice when he seeth the Revenge; calling himself, Just, and the Emperor, Revenge. But the old Emperor thus shut up in his Chamber (differing in nothing but in Name, from a Prison) was not long after the state of his body overthrowen with grief and corrupt humors distilling out of his head, first lost one of his Eyes, and shortly after the other also; and so oppressed with eternal darkness, mingled (as faith the Scripture) his drink with tears, and ate the bread of sorrow, being oftentimes (to his great grief) most bitterly mocked and derided, not of them only which were by his Enemies let to guard him, but of his own Servants also. Not long after, the young Emperor falling sick, in such sort as that it was thought he would not recover, Catacuzenus, and the rest of his greatest Favorites and Followers careful of their own estate, and yet doubtful of the old blind Emperor, devised many things against him, but being unwilling to one purpose for the shortning of his day, in the end all other devices left apart, they put him to his choice, either to put on the habit of a Religious, or for to ever to bid the World Farewell, or else to take what should otherwise ensue; the best thereof was either Death, Exile, or perpetual Imprisonment in the infamous Castle of Forgetfulness: For the putting whereof in execution, Synacelus (of all others to him most hateful) was appointed. At which hard choice, the old Emperor as with a world of woes suddenly oppressed, lay a great while upon his bed as a man speechless; for what could he do else, except he had an heart of Steel or Adamant? being then compassed about with many barous and merciless Souldiers, and his domestical Servants kept from him, and no man left that would vouchsafe to direct him (being blind) whither to go, or where to stand. But to make the matter fatter, would he, would he not, they made choice for him themselves, polling and flaying him, and casting a Monks habit upon him, changed his name, after the name of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthony the Monk. Glad was Eusebius the false Patriarch of this the hard estate of the old Emperor; for that he (seeming to be very sorry for that which was done, but purposing indeed therein to deride him) sent unto him two Bishops, to know what his pleasure was to have done therein. Unto which their demand, he oppressed with heaviness, and fetching a deep sigh even from the bottom of his heart, answered thus:

As in poor Lazarus appeared a double miracle, that being dead, he rose; and being bound, walked;

The old Emperor blind.

Andronicus on the old Emperor against his will blind, and called Anthony.

even so was it to be done in me, though in quite contrary manner: for loe, being alive, I am dead, as overwhelmed with the Waves of Calamity and Woe; and being loofe, I am bound, not my Hands and Feet only, but my Tongue alfo; whereby unable to do any thing elfe, I might juft as leaft bewail my Woes and Wrongs unto the Air, and fuch as by chance fhould hear me, and unto this moft awful darknefs wherein I muft for ever fit. But fume hath clofed my mouth, my Brethren abhor me, and my Mothers Sons account me for a ftranger unto them; and the very light of mine Eyes is not with him, my Friends and Neighbours ftood up againft me, and all that faw me, laughed me to fcorn; my Feet had almoft ftipped, and my Footfteps were almoft overthrown; for I fratted againft the wicked, when I law the peace of the U-edyly. The Emperors long ago gave great Priviledges unto the Church, even thofe which it at this day enjoyeth; and the Church gave to them again Power, to choofe whom they would to be Patriarchs. Now concerning him that fent you, I not only nominated him unto the Patriarchfhip, but my felf made choice of him, and preferred him before many other right worthy and moft famous men, being himfelf a man grown old in a more private life, never before preferred, or for any other thing famous; I will not fay how often I have beloved him and done him good. But now when he fhould again have relieved me in my Calamity, he joyneth hands with mine Enemies againft me, more cruel upon me than any bloody-handed Executioner; not affeared to take my life, but to remember in the Churchs figning himfelf to be ignorant and forry for mine offence, much like unto the Egyptian Crocodile of Nile, which having killed fome living Beaft, lieth upon the dead body and wafteth the head thereof with her warm tears, which the afterwards devoureth together with the body. But what to anfwer him unto this his catching queftion, I know not: for if I fhall fay, As an Emperor, I fhall forbear to be taken by them which he hath in purple have me in hold; but if I fay, As Anthony the Monk, it fhall be taken as the frank confeflion of mine efate, by them which have craftily contrived mine Overthrow; as if I had not by compulfion, but even of mine own free will put on this monaftical habit, which God knoweth was never in my thoughts.

Having thus faid, he fent them away without any other anfwer unto their demand; but fitting down upon his bed-fide, faid, My foul return again unto thy reft, for the Lord hath dealt well with thee; neither poked any one word more in declaration of his grief, his Tongue there ftaid by his fingular Wildom, or elfe with the greatness of his grief; and fo againft his will in filence paffing over his forrow, his mind with the greatness of his Woes overcome; and as it were attorned, before the humors gathered into the brain could be diffolved into tears; for as the Sun fending forth his moderate beams, draweth unto it many exhalations and vapors, but cafting the fame forth more plentifully, doth with his immoderate heat confume the fame before they can be drawn up, fo the moderate affections of the mind may have their griefs by words and tears expreffed; but fuch exceeded all meafure, and with their vehemency as it were overthrow the mind, commonly make men to ftand ftill, mute and filent, or if they fpeak at all, to fpeak idly, and nothing to the purpofe, as men befide themselves, or in an extafie; but for the refolution of the queftion by the Bifhops demanded, the devout Patriarch decreed, That in the Church-Prayers he fhould be remembered before the Emperor his Nephew, by the name of the moft religious and zealous Monk Anthony; which was done (God wot) for no good zeal to the poor blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if he weary of the World, had voluntarily taken upon him that filly profeflion. Nevertheless, within four days after, Synodemus, understanding them in every place to whipper among themselves, and fecretly to mutter againft the hard dealing with the old Emperor, who had long reigned over them, and fo by right was againft to do, if his Nephew fhould chance to die, and that the Ecclefiaftical Laws enforced him to ftand againft him, will to enter into religious Orders; he therewith enraged, fent to him certain of his own Confederacy, to exact of him an Oath in writing, That he fhould never more after that time, feek after the Empire, or yet accept of the fame if it were offered him, neither to fubftitute any other; which if he refufed to do, to put him in fear of his life; and the more to terrify him, let a guard of infolent barbarous Souldiers over him; for fear of whom, he yielded to do whatever they required; and fo his Oath being folemnly conceived into writing (another man leading his hand, becaufe he was blind) he figned the fame with a red Crofs above, and a black Crofs beneath, after the manner of the religious. Having thus lived in darknefs difgraced, fhut up in his Chamber as a man forfaken of the World, with an unfure guard yet to attend him, by the fpace of two years, it fortuned that the 12th of February towards night (a day in the Greek Church dedicated to the Vigil of St. Anthony, whose name they had given him) certain of his Friends that were fuffered to have accefs unto him, going as their manner was, once in three or four days to vifit him (among whom was his Daughter, fometimes the Princefs of Servia his Wife, but then a Widow and Nephew's Gregoras, Author of this History) he entered with them, as with his Friends, into a familiar difcourfe of many matters, wherein he fo deceived the time, that it was paft midnight before they perceived how the time paffed. But the Cocks crowing, he brake off the talk, and bidding them farewell, gave them leave to depart, pleafantly faying, That to morrow they would make an end of their difcourfe: who all thereupon took their leave and departed, no fign of any ficknefs as then appearing upon him; and after they were gone, called for meat and did eat; the meat he eat, was certain fhell-fifh, for it was with them a fafting-day, and he had not eat any thing; after which, when as he fhould have drunk a cup of Wine, for the comforting of his old ftomach, and digefting of that fo hard meat, he drank cold water, as his manner was, when he felt any inward heat, to drink the fame immoderately; which hurtful manner of diet he then using alfo, began by and by to feel a great pain in his ftomach, and fo prefently after became very fick, falling withal into a great loofenefs of body, fo that in the fpace of one quarter of an hour he was glad oftentimes to arife, and to go unto an homely Houfe of Office in an inner-Chamber thereby to difcharge nature's burden; where after many Evacuations, fitting down upon an homely bed fait by, and not able to recover his own Bed, having as then none to help him, there before it was day, died, after he had reigned 43 years. His death was by many ftrange figns and accidents as it were foretold; firft a great Eclipse of the Sun appeared, juft fo many days before his death as he had lived years; and after that, another Eclipse of the Moon; and with it an Earthquake, the day before he died at night, being St. Anthony his even, whose name his Enemies had thrutt upon him; at which time alfo, the Sea with a great Tempeft rifing above the wonted Bounds, made divers breaches in the Walls of the City towards the Sea, as if it had been fome violent Enemy, and overflowed alfo divers Houfes in the City. Many Croffes and Pinacles were then alfo from the tops of Churches and other high Buildings overthrow; and with them a great Pillar, fome time one of the Ornaments of the City, ftanding before the Church, commonly called the Church of the forty Martyrs; which being very high, and below burnt and worn away with time, had put many in fear as they paffed by it, left it fhould have fallen upon them; infomuch that the Emperor upon a time paffing that way, was requested by fome of the Nobility there prefent, to ride farther off from it, for fear of falling upon him; who fmiling at their vain fear, by chance answered, O would to God I might live fo long as this Pillar will ftand; which now falling out according to his Speech gave many of them that had heard him fo fay, occafion to marvel. His dead body was honourably buried in the Monaffery of Libe, which his Mother Theodora the Empereff had not long before new built, and his Obfeques there (after the manner of that time) yearly folemnly kept by the fpace of nine days.

Thus at length having paffed through the troubled State of the Greek Empire, during the long Reign of the old Emperor Andronicus, the confiderate Reader may eafily fee the caufes of the declining and ruine alfo of this famous Empire; and how that the Greek Emperors troubled with their tempeftuous Affairs nearer home in Europe, yea in the very Imperial City it felf, and in their own Palaces, were not at leifure to look over the Strait into Affia, but glad to leave their Territories there unto the weak defence of themselves. At which time, and even in the middle of the aforefaid trouble, Othoman on the one fide, with great induftry laid the Foundation of his Empire in Thracia and Bithynia, now the greateft terror of the World; and then did thofe things which we now have of him written. The other Princes of the Turks alfo, the Succelfors of Sultan Aladin, at the fame time on the other fide, alongft the River Meander encroaching on as faft; until that at laft amongst them they had thrutt the Greek Emperors quite out of Affia, and in fine became themselves, together with the Greek Empire, Prey unto the Othoman Kings, as in the procefs of this History fhall move at large appear.

But again to return unto Othoman himfelf, who all this while (that old Andronicus the Greek Emperor was thus troubled) had with his Son Orchanes fought by all means on every fide to enlarge his Kingdom; the Garrifons by him left in the two late built Caftles near unto the great City of Prufe, under the Charge of the two valiant Captains Attemur and Bolubazack (as is before declared) having now continued there certain yeers, had by hurting upon the paffages, and fpoiling of the Country, brought the City into fuch diftreff and penury, that many of the Citizens and other poor Chriftians fled into the City, there died of Famine. The reft now out of all hope to be relieved by the Building overthrow, and the relieving himfelf, came to Compofition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then fick of his old Difate the Gout) covenanting with him, that they might in fafety with life and liberty depart, and fo much of their Goods as they themselves could carry; and fo yielded to him the City. Which conditions (as moft write) were on the Turks behalf well and faithfully performed; yet fome there be that report them to have been in moft part by Orchanes broken. Thus was Prufe, one of the greateft Cities of that part of Affia, yielded unto the Turks, in the year of our Lord, 1327, and was afterwards by Orchanes made the Royal Seat of the Othoman Kings.

About this time, or very fhortly after, Othoman The death of Othoman, Othoman lived at Prufe, in the eighth and twentieth year of his Reign died, at the age of 69, in the year of our Lord, 1328, and lieth buried at Prufe, where his Tomb is yet at this day to be feen, in a certain Chappell of an old Monaffery in the Caftle, ftanding in the middle of the City, covered with a Mantle of green Chamler, and a little Tulipant or Turkish Hat (fuch as he ufed to wear) lying over his head, differing from thofe which the Turks now wear, efpecially the better fort of them, fo great that they can therewith fcarcely come in at a door. There is alfo another Monument of him to be feen at Seygus, fait by the Sepulchre of his Father Ertogrul, there made by his Sons in remembrance of him; whereof fome have reported him to have been there buried. Howbeit the Turks themselves generally fuppofe the true Monument wherein he is interred, to be at Prufe, as is aforefaid. He was wife, politic, valiant, and fortunate, but full of diffimulation, and ambitious above meafure; not rafh in his Attempts, and yet very refolute; what he took in hand, he was bountiful and liberal, but efpecially to his Men of War, and the poor, whom he would many times feed and cloth with his own hands. Of a poor Lordfhip he left a great Kingdom, having fubdued a great part of the lefter Affia; and is worthily accounted the firft Founder of the Turks great Kingdom and Empire. Of him, the Turkish Kings and Emperors ever fince have been called the Othoman Kings and Emperors, as lineally of him defended; and the Turks themselves Osmannide, as the People or Subjects of Othoman, or Osmán, for fo he is of the Turks commonly called.

Note, That in the reckoning up of certain of the great Christian Princes and Prelates of the same time, at the end of every of the Turkish Kings and Emperors Lives, the first and greatest number following their Names, sheweth the Year of our Lord, wherein such an Emperor, King, or Bishop began to Reign, or Sit; and the number following, how long he reigned or sat; As for example, Andronicus the elder began to Reign in the East, in the Year of Grace, 1282. and reigned 43 years; and so of the rest. Wherein we seek not the exact Computation unto a month or day (as not much material to our History, or any part of our purpose) but only the reasonable view of the great Princes of the forepassed Times, as they lived in Ages together.

The LIFE of ORCHANES or URCHAN, Second King of the Turks.

AFTER the death of Othoman, his two Sons, Orchanes (whom the Turks call Urchan) and Aladin his Brother, having with great Solemnity entered their Father at Prusa, immediately summoned a Parliament, whereunto both the Brethren came accompanied with the chief of their Nobility. This Parliament was called especially, for the establishing of the Succession in this new Kingdom, and for the division of Othoman's Treasures and Goods, betwixt them two, his Sons. But upon view taken, there was no Money, Plate, or Jewels found in the Kings Coffers, for that he had in his life time most bountifully bestowed it upon his men of War; so that all the Wealth he left unto them his Sons, was, the honourable remembrance of his Life for them to imitate, large Dominions for their Possessions, store of ready Horsemans fit for service; with great Herds of Beasts and Cattel for Household Provision.

Whereupon Orchanes demanded of his Brother Aladin, what order he thought was best to be taken with those things by their Father so left? To whom Aladin answered, That it was most requisite, first to establish a King in their Fathers Kingdom; which like a good Shepherd might govern and defend his Subjects, rule and maintain his men of War, providing all things meet for defence of his Kingdom: And that unto him of right belonged all these other things by their Father left, as the Patrimony of his Successor, for the common good and maintenance of his Estate. As for mine own part (said Aladin) I claim no interest therein, you being my elder Brother, and so unto me instead of a Father; by whom also you have been these two years, as it were already put in possession of the Kingdom, all things being committed to your Government, during the time of his late sickness. This modesty of Aladin was greatly commended of all the ancient Counsellors; by means whereof, the Kingdom in all peaceable manner descended to Orchanes. In regard of which courtesy, Orchanes would gladly have made Aladin his Brother President of his Council; which Honour he would in no wise accept, but requested rather that he would give him the Lordship of Fidore in Takenes Country; which Orchanes frankly granted. In which Lordship of Fidore, Aladin most part lived a private and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan Churches, and an Abbey at Prusa, there yet at this day to be seen.

Some Latine Historiographers otherwise report this beginning of Orchanes his Reign; as that Othoman should have three Sons, and that Orchanes the youngest obtained the Kingdom by murdering of his other Brethren. A practice of late much used amongst the Turkish Princes, but not before the time of Bajazet the first of that name, who first of the Turkish Monarchs embroiled his hands with his Brothers Blood; where before, they used all brotherly love one to another, as the most probable Histories collected out of the Turks own Chronicles affirm.

The Christian Princes and Captains, presently upon the death of Othoman recovered the City of Nice, with divers other Castles and Forts, out of the hands of the Turks; as it commonly chanced, that Dominions lately won with great peril, are soon again lost, the Conqueror dying before there be a firm Government established. Amongst other forts by the Christians repossessed, the Castle of Thesspholus, situate upon the passages of the River Sangarius, most grieved the Turks, for thereby their passage into that part of Bithynia was much impeached. Wherefore Orchanes desirous to recover this Castle, disguised himself with a few other of his best Souldiers, in the apparel of Christian Merchants, and came to the Castle, craving leave to pass as Merchants; the Wardens of the Castle verily supposing them by their Attire to be Merchants, opened the Gates, and let them into the Castle; who presently drew their Swords, flew the Wardens, and so by force possessed the Castle, to the great benefit of the Turks, and the hurt of the poor Christians yet left in the Country of Bithynia. For they now having opened a way over the River Sangarius, and as it were broken down the strongest defence of that side of the Greek Empire, at their pleasure foraged the Country in rich sort, as that the great City of Nice (for want of Victuals to relieve so great a multitude as for fear of the Turks was fled out of the Country into it) was brought to great extremity and want. For the relief whereof, and for the repulsing again of the Turks, Andronicus the young Emperor, who then commanded, with such an Army as he was then able to raise, passed himself in person over the Strait of Constantinople, into Asia; the greatest Strength of his Army consisting in two thousand choice Horsemen; the rest as well Horse as Foot, being for the most part Artificers taken up in the City, men altogether unacquainted with Arms (who in token of their cowardice, and that they were more mindful of Flight than of Fight, carried over with them almost as many long Boats and such other small Vessels, as they were men, to be ready to receive them at such time as they should flee) or else abject Rascals, taken up here and there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, and of all others most unfit for so great a Prince (as was the Emperor) to commit the defence of his Person and Honour unto. But Orchanes hearing of his coming, sent certain of his most expert Captains, to lordly the strait passages of the Country whereby the Emperor was to pass; following also himself after with his Army, of purpose to encounter the Emperor. Who in three days march after his landing in Asia, being come to Philobrene, a little Town in Bithynia, and understanding that Orchanes having before taken the Straits, lay not far off encompassed with his Army; he there at Philobrene pitched his Tents, and bled that night also. But the next morning, the Sun as yet scarcely risen, he seeing divers Companies of the Turks coming down from the Mountains

The city of Nice with divers other Castles recovered from the Turks after the death of Othoman.

fast by, put his Army into order of Battle, and so far forward to meet them; where to begin the Fight, the Turks Archers freely bestowed their piercing shot amongst the Christians, still keeping themselves aloof off, so to do the more harm. Which the Emperor mistaking, and supposing that their keeping off to have proceeded of fear, encouraged therewith, commanded certain loose Companies disorderly to march forward, and assault with the sword, his most experienced Captain liking, would have otherwise persuaded him, as to have kept his Strength together against the danger of the Barrell. Nevertheless, such was his youthful heat, as that he could by no means be otherwise intreated, but that forward needs they must. But all the forenoon spent in this light and tumultuary kind of skirmishing, and the Sun at the highest now shining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the Mountains receiving the Christians to be weary, and his own Army to be hot, and also skirmishing, came down from the Hills with a world of men following him; who with a most hideous cry charged the Christians on every side, some a far off with their Arrows, and some hand to hand with their Swords and other Weapons; whose assault the Christians at the first most valiantly received and a great while right worthily defended themselves, having wounded and slain a number of their Enemies. Which hard Fight till on both sides grew so many and so close, that the Town being in sight, with great laughter on both sides; at what time, the Christians weary of the long Fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their Enemies, did orderly retiring toward their Trenches, and hardly pursued by the Turks, received there a great loss, as well of their Horsemen, as of their Foot; but by the coming on of the night, the Battle was at length ended with uncertain Victory. Among others there hurt, the Emperor himself was wounded, and his Army so much distressed, that it happened a wofull mishap, and a manifest token of Gods his Wrath; for Orchanes valour to his self made proof of the Strength and Valour of the Christians, and doubting they would the next day come on further into the Country, left three hundred Horsemen as Scouts, to attend the Enemies removing; and himself with his Army retired before hand to take advantage of such place as the Christians were to pass by. But the Emperor in the Evening sent forth his Camp, going to attend the Town, and to see how better with his Wound distressed, the rest of the Army understanding of his departure, and supposing him to have fled for fear (as if Orchanes with a great Army would that night have slain him all) fled themselves also out of the Camp, every Mothers Son, some to their long Boats and other little Vessells they had for that purpose brought over the Strait; some halting toward the Town Gates, were by the multitude of others running heavily after them, and some running toward the Sea; and some hanging about the Mothers Tail, like a Chain, got some part of them up to the top of the Rampiers of the Town; othersome drawn back by them that hung upon them, falling down together by heaps, and trod upon by others, there perished; some (as is reported) died there of very fear, no man either chafing or hurting them, so weak is mans Courage, when God withdraweth from him his Strength. But in the morning the Sun arising, the three hundred Turks left for Scouts, pursued the flight of the Christians, and in the forenoon came, where they found Horses, Armour, and empty Tents, yea the Emperors own Furniture, and his Horses ready falled; of all which, two hundred of these Turks took the Spoil at their pleasure, and the other hundred pursuing the dispersed Christians, like headless men wandering here and there, flew a great number of them. The Emperor himself leading his Army thus (as it were) by the hand of God, and overhauling the dispersed, took shipping aloft, and returned to Constantinople. After whose departure, the Turks seizing upon many Sas Towns along the Coast of Bithynia, and there seating themselves, laid heavy Tributes upon the other Country Towns and Villages; for the benefit whereof they spared to destroy them, together with the Inhabitants, which they might at their pleasure full easily have done.

About this time it fortun'd, the Captains Son of Scamandria ( a Town not far from the ruins of the antiquities of Troy, and about a days journey from the renowned Castle of Abydos to depart out of this World; unto whose Funerals, being kept in the Country, whilist his woful Father the Captain with his Friends out of Scamandria reformed, the old crafty Turk Accezoza lying always in wait, as a Fox for his Prey, suddenly fell upon those heavy Christians, whereof he flew the most part, and took the Prisoners. Amongst whom he first took the Captain, and carried him to his Castle and Country; where he afterwards led the Prisoner unto the Castle of Abydos, which is one of the most famous Castles situate upon the Sea of Coast of Asia, over against Sefus in Europe; where the Sea of Helluspont by the narrow Strait falleth into the Sea of Aegium; two Castles much renowned by reason of their high Situation, and ever placed in divers parts of the World; eternized by the singing Wits of Poets, for the adventurous passage of the Argo to the Sea, to his Love Hero; which Castles are now called Dardanelles. Accezoza having brought the Captive Captain of Scamandria (lately a man of great account in that Country) so near as he could unto the Castle of Abydos, offered to let him at liberty if they would surrender their Castle, otherwise they should fee him cruelly slain before their Faces. These Turkish threats did not moved them of Abydos, more than to say, That they would never give up the Castle to a Head, feed him and eat him; but the Castle they intended not to deliver. The brave Captain was afterward by the commandment of Orchebas proferred to the Emperor of Constantinople to be redeemed, which he refused; yet as the last he was ransomed by the Governor of Nicomedia, and again fell at liberty. Accezoza of long time held the Castle of Scamandria; yet to continually move the Garrison of Abydos, and men of War sent from Constantinople, that he with his Followers were glad to see him live, he sent him back, to be always in more readiness against the attempt of their Enemies. The Captain of the Castle of Abydos had at that time a fair young Gentlewoman to his Daughter, who (as the fable) chanced to dream (what she had happily waking for the myrr part wished) That being fallen into a deep myrtle Ditch, out of which the could by no means help her self, a luty young Gallant coming by, did not only help her out, but also in love; and made her his wife, and conversed with her in rich and costly Attire. The danger of this dream much troubled the tender Gentlewoman, but the image of the young Gentleman was so well phantased in her brain, that waking, she thought the fill saw him, and sleeping longed fore for what he saw now. Thus whilist this young Gentlewoman with great devotion entertained this imaginary man, the old gray-headed Turk Accezoza came, and with a strong army of his Slaves, took the Castle of Abydos. During which Siege, the young Gentleman sometimes went up into the high Tower of the Castle from whence the might at pleasure fee the Martial Deeds on both sides, and take full view of all the Enemies Camp. But fee the chance, as Abdurachman with great Courage and no less Bravery, approached near to the Siege of the Castle, the thought (upon the first sight of him) that he was the very man whom he had before dreamed of, and whose Idea was in his Heart to deeply engrave; and therefore he was fully resolved to perform what the had without any further self determined. And waiting another time when Abdurachman approached the Castle, the cast down to his Feet a Letter written in Greek, and made fast unto a Stone; which Letter he taking up, delivered the fame to the General Accecozza. Wherein after the had discovered their paffionate affection, the promised to deliver the Cattle into Abdrachman's Power, if the Turks would raise their Siege, and Abdrachman himfelf with fome few would fecretly return to the Cattle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her redemption. Accecozza like an old Fox, which is feduced by a trap, gave a fmall credit to thofe loving lines; for fear of the fuppofted danger, who are the man (he faid he to Abdrachman) whom the fup on fpecial liking hath made choice of for the purpofe, will you adventure your Perfon? And he armed with a manly Courage, a full defence than any Armor of proof, incited alfo with hope of Honour, Riches, and Beauty, all worthy prizes for Martial minds; faid he would not be afhamed of the achievement of that Exploit, if it were his pleasure. The fuppofted danger, which he faid nothing should be fufpected by his fudden departure, gave a tharp Affault to the Cattle, as if he would have taken it by fine force, yer in the end retired, and prefently brake up his Siege, as defpairing of the winning thereof. The Defendants of the Cattle thinking themfelves delivered of a great danger, greatly rejoiced; and in their joy, they oftentimes falleth out, in their great joyllity furching the fuppofted danger, with excefs both of Meat and Drink. But Abdrachman at the time in the Letter appointed, put himfelf upon the way with certain felect Souldiers, and about Midnight came to the appointed place of the Cattle, where the young Gentlewoman was attending his coming; and he by her was conveyed into the Cattle, and fo by her direftion, he fuppofted the danger, he flew the Porter being faft afleep, and opening of the Gates, let in his Followers: which went direftly to the Captains Lodging, and there took him Prifoner, being before their coming overtaken with Wine, and faft afleep. Thus was the Cattle of Abydos furprized by the Turks, from whence they gave a fair profpect out of Afia into Europe. The Captain with his fair Daughter, and the greateft part of his Cattle, who the night was delivered up to Abdrachman, to the preference of Orchane at his Court, then lying at Neapolis. Who wonderful glad of fo good news, gave the fair Gentlewoman, with the greateft part of the Prey to Abdrachman. The Poffterity of this man (as they fay) yet remains among the Turks. Amongft others of the Warlike Captains there was alfo one Cararachman, whole name was fo dreadful to them of Constantinople, that when his Children cried, they would make them to men and maid his peace, by faying, Cararachman comes. Not long after, the two valiant aforementioned worthy Captains, Cumger-Alpes and Accecozza died. After whole death, Orchane made his Sons, Solyman and Amurath, Lords and Governors of thofe Countries and Provinces. And intending (by the perfwafion of Abdrachman) to befiege Nicomedia, he was fo overcome any where, he took divers fmall Cattles and went towards the City. Nicomedia was at that time governed by an honourable Lady, Kingwoman unto Andronicus the Emperor of Constantinople; but the feeling her City Befeged by the Turks, and doubting her own Forces not to be able to hold out the Siege, by a trufty Meflenger offered to yield the City unto Orchane, upon condition, That the wife Citizens as would, might in fafety depart with their Goods, and that fuch as they thought granted, the wife fo many as would follow her, departed out of the City by night, taking fhipping for Conftantinople.

Orchanes having taken Nicomedia, made his Son

Solyman Governor of the fame. The Churches of the Christians he converted unto Turkish Mechitas or Temples. The greatest Church (being of wonderful Beauty) he converted into a College, or School, for the learned Professors and Students of Mahomet Law, which is yet called Nicomedia, Orchanes his School or College. And because the Country near unto Nicomedia, lying upon the Sea, was ever in danger to be spoiled by the Gallies of Constantinople, he placed in those Countries divers of his most experienced Soldiers to defend the same, appointing to every of them Possessions and Penfions, according to their degrees and merit. After this Orchanes by the counsel of his Brother Aladin, commanded all his men of War to wear white Caps, which were known from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of Caps the Tanizaries use at this day. The Turks also in Orchanes Reign, and long time after, used not to cut or shave their Beards, but did wear them long; so that if the King would disgrace any man, he would in his displeasure command his Beard to be cut or shaven. The manner of cutting and having their Beards which they now use, they learned of the Italians; of whom they have also borrowed many other fashions, not only differing, but quite contrary to their ancient Manners and Customs. Nice, where he lay a long time after. There he built a sumptuous Church, appointing a Preacher to preach to the People every Friday; he erected in Nice also two fair Abbies, in the one of which he with his own hands served the Sengals, and Poor the first dinner. He was the first that builded Abbies or Monasteries among the Turks; whose example most of his Successors have imitated, and is amongst them used unto this day.

The Government of Nicomedia Orchanes committed to his eldest Son Solyman (as is before said) a Prince of great towardsness, giving him in great charge to have a vigilant Eye to the Towns of Taraxia, Gomineca and Madurea, which were nigh unto Nicomedia, yet in possession of the Christians; all which Towns, with the Countries adjoining, Solyman in short time got without force, by composition. This Solyman was of a Princely Disposition, so tempering Justice with Clemency in his Government, that many Christians allured with his Virtues, became of his Religion, and gladly put themselves under his Subjection: the politic Laws of the Country he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had been of ancient time accustomed, whereby he greatly won the Hearts of the People. Amurath his younger Son, Orchanes made Lord and Governor of Prussa, after he had removed his Court to Nice. And the Castle of Chara-chilar, with the Seigniorie thereto belonging, he gave to his Cousin Armenure, the Son of his Uncle Jundus.

There was at this time in Orchanes Court a Noble young Gentleman called Turfon, Beg, the son of Dharaf King of Charafia; by whose persuasion Orchanes in Person himself with a strong Army, made an Expedition into that Country; for that his Fathers Subjects after the death of the King his Father, denied their Obedience to his elder Brother, wishing rather to have Turfon for their Sovereign. In whose behalf Orchanes taking that journey, surprised by the way many Castles and Towns to his own use. Orchanes was no sooner entered the Country of Charafia, but Turfon, elder Brother died at Pergamum, whither the Turks shortly pursued him; where Turfon desirous to speak with his Brother, unwarily approaching the City, was wounded with an Arrow thro' from the Walls, and there slain. With whose death Or- chanes was so greatly offended, that he threatened to destroy the whole Country with Fire and Sword, if they did not by a day prefixed, generally submit themselves to his mercy. The People terrified with this proclamation of so great a Prince already in Arms, yielded themselves unto his Subjection. The King Son also that was fled into Pergamum, upon reasonable conditions, yielded himself unto Orchanes, who sent him to Prussa, where after he had there lived two years, he died of the Plagues, after whose death Orchanes made his Son Solyman Prince of Carafina. Neither is this taking in of the Country of Carafina to be accounted a small Conquest; one of the greatest Houses of the Turks the Successors of the iosman Sultan Aladin, now thereby taking end, and their Dominions (which were not final, as containing almost Lydia, with some good parts of Mysia, Troas, and the lesser Phrygia) now united unto the Orthoman Kingdom. Orchanes upon his return, for the good success of this journey, built a Church and Monastery at Prussa, placing therein religious men, with all diligence sought for out of all his Kingdom; of which Religious the Turks write many Fables, better worth the smiling at, than the serious reporting. Hitherto the Kingdom of Orthoman and Orchanes his Son, was contained within the bounds of the lesser Asia, which the Turks call Anatolia.

Now it refteth to be shewed, upon what occasion Orchanes or rather his Son Solyman Balla, as it were fatally, with a small power first passed over Hellepontus into Europe; where they and their Successors have by little and little to enlarged their Dominions, that they have now long ago quite overthrown the Grecian Empire, with many other great Kingdoms, and are at this present a terror to all Christian Princes bordering upon them; to the perpetual Infamy of the Greeks, who for want of courage, and busied with civil discord, never sought in time to impeach their greatness.

Orchanes having now so augmented his Kingdom, that he might from many parts thereof out of Asia take view of the pleasant borders of Europe, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow Sea of Hellepontus; and continually incited with the insatiable and restless desire of Sovereignty, began to devise how he might possibly pass that Strait Sea, and set foot in Europe another part of the World. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his Son Solyman; who presently answered his Father, That if it would please him to give him leave, he would not doubt to pass the Strait of Hellepontus; and in time to plant the Mahometan Religion in those Countries of Europe possessed by the Christians. Which answer of Solyman much pleased his Father, who gave him leave to depart into his Country, and in that matter to proceed further, as he thought best, and as occasion should best serve. Solyman taking leave of his Father, took his journey into Carafina, where riding up and down the Country, as it had been to his pleasure only, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous City of Troy sometime stood; where yet (as the Turks and some others say) are to be seen the wonderful ruins of that unfortunate City by the Sea side. In this place Solyman stood still a great while, as it were in a study, forecasting (as it seemed) some great matter, without speaking one word to any of his Followers. When one of his Clergymen called Escan-Beg, to put him out of his deep thoughts, boldly said unto him, My Lord and great Sovereign, what strange thing is this, that you are so deeply drowned in these your melancholy thoughts? undoubtedly it is some great matter that you are studying upon. Truth it is, (said Solyman) for I was thinking how it were possible to pass over this

The Country of Carafina yielded unto Orchanes.

Sea of Hellepontus into the borders of Europe, and to take view of that Country, and so to return and discontinue. If this be the matter, (said Escan-Beg) bidding him unto him one Fazil-Beg, a man of no less valour than himself) we two will by the power of God perform unto you this Enterprize. Then was Solyman desirous to know of them, about what place they would pass over; which they well knowing the Sea coast, shewed him not far off. Wherefore Solyman giving them leave, they departed; and shortly after making a little Boat, or rather as some suppose a Raffe, passed over Hellepontus by night, and arrived in Europe side, near unto a Castle of the Turks, called Zemene or Zembenic, but of the Greeks Caridocastren, that is to say, The Hoag Castle, not far from Sifrus; where going ashore, they took Prisoner a Greek in a Vineyard near unto the Castle, whom they finding to be a good sensible Fellow, without delay put him into their Boat or Raffe, and returning back again, presented him to Solyman. This Christian Captive Solyman entertained courteously, giving him great Gifts, and rich Apparel, to discover unto him the Estate of his Country; and in fine learned of him a means to take the Castle Zemene, before the Christians should thereof be aware. For achievement whereof, certain Boats were speedily made ready by Solyman Commandment, and he with eighty chosen Soldiers easily passed over them by night, with their Christian Guide the Greek; for in that place, the Strait betwixt Asia and Europe is not past an Italian mile over. This Guide brought Solyman directly to the aforesaid Castle, where was a great Dungeon, so high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his Soldiers easily got into the Castle, which they won without any great resistance; for it was then Harvest time, and most part of the People were in the Vineyards, or treading out of their Corn all night, as the use of the Country is. Solyman thus possessed of the Castle of Zemene, used no extremity against the Inhabitants thereof, seeking rather by courtesy to gain their good Wills, than by extremity to force them to his; yet such Gentlemen as he took, with some others also of the better sort, he sent by shipping into Asia, and by the same Ships returned Soldiers as fast as he could into Europe; so that he had in one day two hundred Soldiers more brought over unto him; and manning such small Vessels as he had left about the Castle, sent Escan-Beg along the coast on Europe side, to burn fish shipping or Vessels as he could find, lest the Christians should by them hinder his passage upon the Strait of Hellepontus. So in a few days Solyman had transported into Europe two thousand good Soldiers of the Turks, whom he so governed, that they did not in any violent For injury to the vulgar Christians, by reason whereof the common People began to like reasonable well of the Turks, and to converse with them without fear. This was the first coming over of the Turks into Europe, with purpose then to conquer and inhabit, under the fortune of the Orthoman Kings. For albeit that some of that Nation had at sundry times before come over, as men seeking after Spoil, or otherwise before for, yet formerly the Greek Emperors themselves; yet never staid they long, but having done what they came for, or else left themselves, returned back again into Asia; until that now conducted by Solyman, and possessed of the little Castle of Zemene (as is aforesaid) they there took to salt footing, as that they and their Posterity after them, were never thence to be since that time removed; but still more and more encroaching upon the Kingdom, have unto their Asia Kingdom joyned a great part of Europe also, to the terror of the rest that yet remaineth, as in the process of this History (if God will) at large appear.

About two miles from Constantinople the Castle was another Castle called Alatice, or more truly Madurea, which Solyman also took; so that now he had gotten two Castles in Europe, both which he strongly manned. After which time, the Turks in great numbers came out of Asia into Europe over that narrow Strait of Hellepontus, to dwell in Constantinople; and Solyman induced of them, to make room for his Turks, sent Christians out of Europe to be placed amongst the Turks in Asia. The report of this coming over of the Turks into Constantinople, and of the taking of the Castle of Zemene, carried in post to Constantinople, was sufficient to have stirred up any provident or careful men, presently to have taken up Arms for the recovery of the lost Castle, and the driving out again of the barbarous Enemies out of Europe, before they had gathered any greater Strength, or fortified themselves in those places; but such was the careless negligence and great Security of the proud Greeks, that instead thereof, they to extenuate the greatness of the loss, commonly said, That there was but a Hogsty lost; alluding unto the name of the Castle; and vainly (as said a grave Father of their own) jolting at that was not to be jested at, but lamented for, as in few years it proved, their foolish humour being not without good cause contrived to their ruin.

Solyman Strength to fill increasing by the daily coming over of the Turks, he proceeded further, to spoil the Country of Calipolis, almost as far as the little Calipolis, distant from the Castle Zemene about two and twenty miles; after which pleasant City the proud Turk began now to long. Which the Governor thereof perceiving by the Turks continued encroaching upon him, raised what power he was able to make, and sent forth against them; all the rest of the Greeks in the mean time lying still, as if they had been asleep, or that the matter had not concerned them; but meeting the Turks, he was by them (after a great conflict) overthrown, and for safeguard of his life glad to flee into his City; after whom the Turks following, spoiled the Country round about, and in their return, by plain force took the City, together with the Castle also; which happened in the year of our Lord 1258. Where the madness of the Greeks was again more than before to be wondered at; for the news of the loss of Calipolis being brought to Constantinople, the People there made full account thereof, although it was indeed a right great loss, and much concerned the State; but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talk thereof, in jolting wise commonly said, That the Turks had not taken from them a Port of Wine. But by taking of such Hogsties and Portes of Wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few years after had gone so far in Thracia, that Amurath (the same Solyman Nephew which now took from the Greeks the City of Calipolis) even in the heart as it were of the Greek Empire, placed his Royal Seat at Hidencople; and immediately after him, Bajazet his son (having subdued all the Country even to the Walls of Constantinople) for certain years laid hard Siege unto the Imperial City itself; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expedition of the mighty Tartar Prince Tamelaque unto Bajazet fatal) in the mean time happened; where by (God so appointing it) the prosperous proceedings of the Turks were for a space well staid, that they should not before the time by him projected, devour the Remains of the Greek Empire. And it were to be wished, that the Christians of our time also (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead sleep; who of late hath lost unto the same Enemy, not the Cattle of Zemboie, or the City of Callipolis, but whole Kingdoms, as Hungary and Cyprus, and are still fair in the way; I say no more for grief, and foreboding of evil fortune. But again to our purpose; Solyman having made this prosperous entrance into Europe, and there got strong footing, by speedy Messengers certified his Father what he had done, and that it was expedient for him with all speed to send unto him a great supply of men of War, as well for the sure defence and keeping of those Castles and Forts by him already gotten, as for the further invasion of the Country. This message was wonderful welcome unto Orchanes, and where-as many Families of the Saragins at that present were come into the Country of Carafina, to possess the Dwellings and Places of them, which in hope to better their Estate were before gone over into Europe; all these Saragins he commanded to pass over into Europe likewise; which they did accordingly, fearing themselves for a time in the Country near to Callipolis. In the mean time Solyman omitted no opportunity to enter further into the Country, winning small Forts and Holds, and still replenishing the same with his Turks. And on the other side, they of Carafina passed over into Europe, placing themselves as it were in a new World. For which cause, and for the great desire they had to extend the Turkish Dominion and Religion, they refused no pains of War; so that all things at that time prospered with the Turks, and went backward with the Christians.

In the time of these Wars, not far from Callipolis was a little Castle called Congere; the Captain whereof was by a Greek name called Calo Johannes, a valiant and painful man; this Captain continually molested and troubled the Turks which lay on that side of Callipolis, under the leading of Ezer-Beg, many of whom he slew and took Prisoners, as he could find them at any advantage. Solyman much angered herewith, by crafty and secret Espials learned a certain time when he was gone out of his Castle to do some exploit upon the Turks. Whereupon he presently to bolster the Castle with Souldiers, that he could by no means return thither, but he must first fall into their hands; and for more assurance placed others also in by-ways, lest he should by any ways escape. The Captain ignorant of all this, prosecuted his enterprise, and having taken a Turk Prisoner, thinking to return to his Castle, was hastily pursued by Fazil-Beg, for which cause making the more haste, he suddenly fell into the danger of the Turks laid in ambush; where his men were all slain, and himself taken and brought before his own Castle, and had there his head presently struck off; whereupon the Castle was forthwith by them that were therein (having now lost their Captain) surrendered, and Chazil-Beg, a valiant Captain of the Turks, placed therein; who from thence never ceased to trouble the Country, even to the Walls of Dydimotichum, as did Solyman also out of Callipolis.

Thus in the space of one year, the Turks got strong footing in Europe, possessing divers Castles and Towns, with the Country about them, which Solyman gave in reward unto his Captains and Souldiers, as appeareth by the Graves and Tombs of Ezer-Beg and Fazil-Beg, the two which first came over into Europe, which are there yet well known.

About this time it fortuned, that as this Martial Prince Solyman was for his sport hawking in the Fields of Bolayre on Europe side, galloping in to his Falcon, was with his Horse overthrown in a ditch, of which Fall he being sore bruised, shortly after died. The news of his death being brought to Orchanes his Father, gave unto him (then being sick) of Orchanes just occasion of great sorrow; so that within two months after he died also, being fourscore years old, when he had reigned thereof 31 years; and died about the year of our Lord 1359. Some Histories report otherwise, both of his death, and of the time wherein he lived; as that he should be slain in a Battle against the Tatars; or as others write, with an Arrow at the Siege of Prusa, in the year of our Lord 1349. But Joannes Leunclavius in his History collected out of the Turks own Chronicles (whom we follow as most probable) reporteth it as before.

This Orchanes was wise, courteous, and bountiful, more ingenious than his Father in devising warlike Engines. He built divers Princely Churches, Abbies, Colledges, and Cells, and was in his superstitious Religion very zealous; in so much that he appointed Penfions to all such as could in the Church say the Book of Makomet's Law by heart; and appointed competent maintenance for all Judges of his Courts, because they should not take any thing in reward of his Subjects, for the perverting of Justice. He greatly enlarged his Kingdom in Asia, and not content to be inclosed with the Seas of Euxinum and Hellepontus, set fast footing in Europe, which some attribute to his Son Amurath. He was to the Christians always a most mortal Enemy, and so died.

The LIFE of AMURATH,

The First of that NAME,

Third King of the Turks,

And the great AUGMENTOR of their Kingdom.

Amurath
succeeded his Father Orchanes
in the Turkish Kingdom.

Amurath the younger Son of Orchanes succeeded his Father in the Turkish Kingdom, his elder Brother Solyman being dead a little before his Father.

This Amurath with greater zeal than any one of the Turkish Kings, advanced the Mahometan Religion, and had therein wonderful Success. In the beginning of his Reign, he gathered a great Army out of all parts of his Kingdom, to Præsa, purposing to pass over Hellipontus, to invade the Christians in Thracia. But understanding, that the other Mahometan Princes in Asia had combined themselves against him, he was thereby enforced to leave his former determination for Europe, and to turn his Forces upon them. In which Wars he mightily prevailed against them, and returned with Victory to Præsa. But having so subdued those Confederate Princes, he the next year after profecuted his Wars before intended against the Christians in Europe. For which purpose having levied a strong Army in Asia, he passed over to Callipolis, accompanied with his Tutor, whom the Turks call Lala Schahin, whose grave advice and counsel he most followed in all his weighty Affairs, being at that time one of his chief Counsellors. From Callipolis he marched to the Castle of Benatum, which was by composition yielded unto him. From thence he went to Taurulus, where the Christians gave him a sharp encounter; but in the end he won the Town, and carried away the Victory. And so proceeding farther, took divers other small Castles and Towns in that part of Thracia, which of the ancient Roman Colonies was then called Romania, and now of the Turks Rumilias, namely Mesine, Burgus, and others; whereof some he utterly raled, and into the rest put strong Garrisons. At this time also, Chafp-Ilbeg and Eurençis, two of his most valiant Captains, took certain Forts standing upon the River Morizus, in ancient time called Hebrus; whereby they much troubled the Inhabitants of the Country therabouts. Wherewith the Captain of Didymotichum offended, gathered his Souldiers together, intending to have intercepted the great Captain Chafp-Ilbeg; in which Attempt he lost most of his Followers, and was himself there taken Prisoner. For whose Ransom and certain other Conditions, the Citizens of Didymotichum yielded the City unto the Turks.

Didymotichum
yielded

Turks.

Shortly after, Amurath sent his Tutor Lala Schahin to besiege Hadrianople, now called Adrianople, but in ancient time Orestias; of whose coming the Christians hearing, encountered him upon the way, and fought with him a great battle, wherein many were on both sides lost; but in the end the Christians being put to the worst, retired again to the City. Of this Victory Schahin sent News unto Amurath, with certain of the heads of the slain Christians; who thereupon sending Chafp and Eurençis before, he himself with a great Army followed after to the Siege of Hadrianople; of whose coming, the Governor of Hadrianople understanding, fled secretly out of the City by night to Adria. The Citizens seeing themselves so forsaken of their Governor, yielded their City unto Amurath, in the year of our Lord, 1362.

The taking of these strong Cities in Thracia, especially of Didymotichum and Hadrianople, is (by some of the Turks own Histories, otherwise reported; which, because it is neither improbable nor disagreeing from the fabul dealings of the Turks, and of themselves also received, I have thought good to fit down as their own Historiographers report the same.

The Turkish King Amurath had (as they say, and as truth was) in the beginning of his Reign concluded a Peace with the Christians of Thracia; during which Peace, the Governor of Didymotichum intending to fortifie his City with new and stronger Fortifications against the Assaults of the Turks, entertained all the Masons, Carpenters, and other Workmen he could by any means get; which Amurath understanding, secretly caused two hundred good and lusty Workmen and Labourers to come out of Asia, to offer their Service unto the Governor; who gladly entertained them, using their help in that his great and hasty Work. Which thing some of the wiser sort of the Citizens disliking, wished the Governor to beware of those Asian Workmen, as by them suspected. But he presuming upon the Peace made with Amurath, and considering they were but base Workmen and no Souldiers, had the less care of them; nevertheless (using their work all day) he commanded them to lodge without the Walls of the City every night. Amurath understanding that these Workmen were thus by the Governor entertained, sent for the valiant Captain Chafp-Ilbeg, and requested him with thirty other good Souldiers disguised as poor Labourers, to go to Didymotichum to seek for Work, and in doing thereof to spy if any opportunity might be found for the surprizing of the City. Chafp with these thirty according to Amurath's direction, coming as poor men lacking Work, found entertainment at Didymoteum, where they carried stones, mortar, and such like things, ever working themselves very diligent in their labour; Chafis with vigilance eye still awaiting what might best serve his turn for the surpadding of the City. When night was come, the Turkish Workmen and Labourers after their accustomed manner, and as they were by the Governor appointed, went out of the City into the Suburbs to their Lodgings; from whence Chafis secretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and showed him how one of the gates of the City might upon the sudden be taken, if it would please him to place a sufficient number of Turks in ambush near unto the City, to join with him and the other Turkish Labourers when occasion should serve. Which being resolved upon, Amurath sent him back again to put this his device in execution: So Chafis returning to Didymoteum, broke the matter to so many of the Asian Workmen as he thought convenient, fully instructing them what was to be done. The next day (according to his appointment) the Christians being then at dinner, these Turkish Workmen and Labourers fell all at once upon themselves, and from house to house; in which counterfeited Brawl and Tumult, they suddenly ran to one of the Gates of the City salt by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands upon the Warders Weapons, as if it had been to defend themselves against their Fellows, suddenly fell upon those Warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner and presently flew there, which done, they opened the Gate of the City, and let in the other Turks which lay in wait not far off; who with great celerity entering the City, presently took the same, and there put the chiefest of their Citizens to the Sword, sparing the rest of the meaner sort.

The City of Rhododrom (of the old Writers called Rhodes) was by Amurath his commandment, in this time of peace, by sudden assault given in the night by the Lord Eurenos, taken also.

With this foul dealing and breach of League, yet in force, the Christians hardly charged Amurath, who turned it over to the unreasons of his Captains and Men with whom he threatened with great severity to punish; and to give the better colour that it was done without his privacy, he had fained himself sick all the while these things were in doing; but being requested to restore those Cities to wrongfully taken from the Christians, he utterly refused to do, saying, That it was against the Law of his great Counsellors, to deliver again to the Christians, any Town or City wherein the Mahometan Religion had been once openly taught. Whereupon Wars began again to arise on fresh betwixt the Christians and him, wherein sometime the one prevailed, and sometime the other in such sort, that those Wars at length became unto them both very tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace again with the Christians of Hadrianople, Selyria, and Constantinople; yet desiring nothing more in heart, than to take the City of Hadrianople; which the better to bring to pass, he caused Chafis to be a discontented Captain to fly to Hadrianople, pretending himself to have been hardly used by the Tyrant his Master; where having in his Company other such dissembling Fugitives as was himself, he oftentimes issued out of the City and valiantly skirmished with the Turks; who to greatly pleased the Governor of Hadrianople, that he thereby grew into his great favour. Many other Turks who upon pretence of like discontentment, resorted unto Chafis; wherewith finding himself well strengthened, he writ Letters secretly unto Amurath, That he would deliver one of the Gates of Hadrianople unto him at a certain appointed time, if he would against the same time be ready to fend him present Succors. All things being agreed upon, Chafis at the appointed time came in the dawning of the day to one of the Gates of the City, accompanied but with ten of his Followers, as if he would have gone forth to hunt, as he had before accustomed. But so soon as the Gates were opened, he with the other ten well apprized for the purpose, furiously fell upon the Warders, whom they at the appointed time by the rest of the Fugitive Turks (which with all speed by appointment before made, resorted unto them) they possessed the Gate; until a great power of the Turks, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambush near unto the City, having knowledge what was done, and hearing the alarm, speedily came on, and by that Gate entered the City; where was fought a cruel fight all that day, even from morning until night. But in the end the Turks prevailing, took the City, which they have ever since possessed unto this day.

These great Cities of Thracia thus taken, or Hadrianople, and as aforesaid, I leave for the Reader to think of as he pleaseth. In the Royal Seat of the Turkish Kings in Europe, appointed the Seat of his Royal Court at Hadrianople, as a place of all others most fit for the further invasion of the Christians, and enlarging of his Kingdom in Europe; from whence such a world of Mischief and Woe hath since that time overflowed a great part of Christendom, and howing so many goodly Kingdoms in Europe, as that both Christians and most part of the rest that yet remain (daily in dread of like destruction) might justly accuse and detest the woful carelessness and degenerate cowardice of the Greeks; were not they themselves together with the glory of their Church and Empire swallowed up, in the flames of their own Army and Woe, and become to all others most miserable; but what avail vain Complaints, but to increase all griefs; wherefore again to that we have in hand.

The proud Sultan Amurath (having to his great content thus seated himself at Hadrianople, in the midst of Thracia) presently sent out his Tutor Lala Schahin with a great Power to invade the Country about Philippopolis with the Country of Zagora, which lieth towards the great Mountain Hemus, where the best Turkish Scimitars were made, giving like charge unto Eurenos, for the subduing of the Territory of Ipsala; who both notably performed what he had commanded, and in short time brought in those Countries under his Subjection, wherein he shortly after placed divers Sanzaks or Governors, for the better advancement thereof, being so lately gained.

About this time (by the suggestion of Cara Rustem a Doctor of the Mahometan Law) Zinderah Chelid, then Cadeflor or chief Justice among the Turks, but afterwards better known by the name of Cairadin Bassa, by the Commandment of Amurath, took order, that every fifth Captive of the Christians, being above fifteen years old, should be taken up for the King, as by Law due unto him; and if the number were under five, then to pay to the King for every Head six Aspers, by way of Tribute; appointing Officers for collecting both of such Captives and Tribute money, of whom the aforesaid Cara Rustem himself was chief, as first deviser of the matter. By which means great numbers of Christian Youths were brought to the Court as the Kings Captives, and by the counsel of the same Zinderah Chelid, were distributed among the Turkish Husbands, men in Asia; there to learn the Turkish Language, Religion, and Manners; where after they had been brought up in all painful labour and travel by the space of two or three years, they were called unto the Court, and choice made of the better sort of them to stand upon the Purtil of the Prince, or to serve him in his Wars; where they daily practising all feats of activity are called by the name of Janizari (that is to say, new Souldiers.) This was the first beginning of the Janizari under this Sultan Amurath the First, but had great increase under Amurath the Second, inasmuch that Janizari with some time, almost upon the beginning of this Order to him; which nevertheless (as appeareth by the Turks own Histories) had the beginning as is aforesaid; and hath ever since been continued by the Turkish Kings and Emperors, by the same and some other greater means, so that in process of time they are grown to be greater as that they are oftentimes right dreadful to the great Turk himself, after whose death they have sometimes preferred to the Empire such of the Emperors Sons as they best liked, without respect of prerogative or age, contrary to the will of the great Sultan himself; and are at this day the greatest strength of the Turkish Empire, and not unlike in time to be the greatest cause of the ruine thereof; the finger of the Highest oftentimes (as we have before said) turning even those helps which were by mans wisdom provided for the establishing of Kingdoms, unto their more speedy destruction; and especially these continual Garrisons of martial men, no less to be feared than Pestilence, as in the course of this History may appear.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at Hadrianople, determining now to return unto Asia, he made Sebahin his Tutor Beg-Lerlog or Vice-Roy of Romania; and Eurenos Lord Governor of the Marches; Zinderah Chelid he made Veiz Azemes or Lord Prefect of his Conscience, and changing his name, called him Cairadin Bassa, that is to say, The Bassa that had well deserved, his name witnessing his good desert. After this he returned into Asia, where he spent that Winter at Prusa. These two great men Cairadin Bassa and Cara Rustem before named, sometimes two Doctors of the Mahometan Law, were (as the Turkish Histories report) the first that corrupted the Turkish Court with Covetousness and Bribery, and are therefore of them even yet much blamed.

Whilst Amurath thus wintered in Asia, News was brought unto him, That the Christians of Servia and Bulgaria had gathered a great Army for the besieging of Hadrianople; which caused him to prepare great Forces in Asia, to aid his Captains in Europe. But in returning out of Asia, he by the way took the Town of Bogaz where he put to the Sword all the Christians that were therein able to bear Arms, leading the rest into Captivity, and with the spoil rewarded his Souldiers. This strong Town was not long after again recovered by the Christians, which they named the Turks with like measure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raised it down to the ground; yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is: this present to be seen; which was done in the year of our Lord, 1365.

In the mean time, the Christian Army of Servia and Bulgaria, in number between forty and fifty thousand, marching towards Hadrianople, and now come very near the same, fell in mutiny among themselves. Whereof the Turks by their Espials having intelligence, suddenly in the night set upon them; who blinded with inward hatred, and no less fearing one another, than their Enemies, neglected to join their Forces against them, but were ready to turn their Weapons one upon another; and so by their own discord, more than by the Enemies force, were made a prey to the

Turks, by whom they were put to flight, and slain with great slaughter, that the place wherein they fell lay far from Germia; is thereof at this day called Zirf-Zindger; that is to say, the place wherein the Servians were overthrown. The news of this notable a Victory, with the fifth part of the Spoil, and a great number of the heads of the slain Christians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) sent to Amurath into Asia, being now ready with a great Power to have come over to Callipola; who upon joyful news of this Victory, returned again to Prusa. This was done in the year, 1366. In which year also Amurath with wonderful Triumph circumscribed his two Sons, Bajazet and Jasup. At which time he also built a Temple, with a Monastery and a Colledge, at Salanga; and another fair Church at Nepis; at Alpigha he also built a stately Place in the Castle, with a great Church at the Gates thereof; in which City he also founded an Abbey and a Colledge. Germen Ogli, a great Mahometan Prince in Asia (whose Territory for the most part lay in the great Phrygia, and the Counties thereabout, bordering upon the Ordouman Kingdom) having always envied at the rising of the Ordouman Kings (as did all the rest of the Mahometan Princes of the Selzucian Family) and fearing that their Greediness might after his death grow dangerous to his son Jasup, being now himself very aged, thought good to the more safety of his State to join in Alliance with the Christians, and for that purpose Jasup (a learned Doctor of the Mahometan Law) Embassador to him, with many rich Presents, and to offer his Daughter, the Lady Hatur, in marriage unto his son Bajazet; s promising with her in Dowry divers great Cities and Towns, with their Territories in Phrygia and Bithynia, adjoining upon the Ordouman Kingdom; and naming Alpigha, Eggen, Tonjand, and others. Neither was this without Dowry, but well becoming to great a Prince; the City of Cutais being at this day the place whereat the Turkish Emperors great Lieutenant or Vice-Roy in Asia is always reliant, as in the heart of his Kingdom in the latter Asia. Or which much to offend, Amurath liking well, contracted his son Bajazet unto the said Lady asud for solemnization of the Marriage, prepared all things with great Magnificence, sending his Embassadors to most of the Mahometan Kings and Princes both far and near, and to invite thereto; commanding also most of the Nobility of his Kingdom, to honour the same with their presence. The time of this Marriage drawing near, Embassadors came to Amurath Court, from all the Princes before invited; amongst whom, the Embassador from the Egyptian Sultan had the highest place. These Embassadors brought with them many great and rich Gifts, such as well becomed the great Princes their Masters, which they with all Reverence presented unto Amurath. At length amongst the Gifts of his own Nobility came the Lord Eurenos, whom he had before left Governor of the Frontiers of his Kingdom in Europe; who besides many other rich Gifts not easily to be valued, presented unto Amurath an hundred goodly Boys, with as many beautiful young Maidens, all Christian Captives, finely attired in Garments richly embroidered with Gold and Silver, every one of them carrying a Cup of Gold in the one hand, and a Cup of Silver in the other; the Cups of Gold having in them divers precious Stones of great value, and the Cups of Silver being filled with Gold. The richness of these Gifts was so great, that all the Embassadors of the foreign Princes much wondered thereat. All which rich Gifts Amurath most bountifully bestowed upon the strange Embassadors;

Embassadors; and the Presents which were sent unto him from other Princes, he liberally gave to Eurefent. The Learned and Religious which came to that Marriage he so bountifully rewarded also, that none came to the same poor, but he went away rich. He had before sent divers of his Nobility with an hundred Ladies and Gentlemen, and a Guard of three thousand Horsemen, to attend the coming of the Bride. On the other side, the old Prince German-Oglu meeting this honourable Company upon the way, valued every man of Account according to his Degree; and bringing them to one of his Cities, in most Royal manner feasted them, bestowing upon them many rich and princely Gifts; all which things with great Solemnity performed, he delivered his Daughter the Bride to two of the most ancient Ladies, whereof the one had been Bajazet Nurse; and so taking leave of his Daughter, sent her away, accompanied with his Wife Yenise, and other of his Courtiers, who conveying her to Prusa, he was there in most Royal manner married to Bajazet. The Cities and Towns promised in Dovry, were accordingly delivered into the Possession of Amurath, who shortly after took Possession of the same, and furnished them with his own Garrisons.

At this Marriage Clasen-Beg Prince of Amisium in Galatia, by his Embassador fold his Territory of Amisium into Asia, and to his Cities and Towns; doubting, as it was thought, how to be able to keep them, now that Amurath was come so near him, whom he saw not to let slip any occasion offered unto him for the enlarging of his Kingdom. When Amurath had in this sort spent great time in Asia, he gathered a strong Army to return into Europe; and for his attire, he committed the Government of his Kingdom in Asia (which the Turks call Anatolia) unto his Son Bajazet, joyning with him Temurtas a valiant man of great experience; and having left all things in order in Asia, passed over Hellepontus, to Calpitolis, from whence he marched towards Hadrampolis; and because he would take something in his way, he besieged Malgasara, which he in short time won; where Lala Schahin and Eurefent with all their Forces came to him; which two Captains he sent to besiege the City Phere, which was by them after a few days siege taken. But he himself to be revenged upon Lazarn the Despot, led his Army into Servia, where after he had without resistance foraged the Country fourteen days, understanding by his Captains, That the strong City of Nissa, being the Metropolitane City of Servia, was as it were the Key of that Kingdom, he profreely marched thither, and laid siege to the same; and by the advice of Tasir-Beg the Son of Temurtas, he shortly won it. Which thing he daunted Lazarn Despot or Lord of Servia, that he despairing in his own Forces, having loo lost one of his strongest Cities, forthwith sent Embassadors to Amurath to intreat a Peace; offering to pay him a yearly Tribute of fifty thousand pounds, and to add him with a thousand men in his Wars, whenever he should require it; upon which conditions Amurath granted him Peace; and he departed out of Servia. In this Expedition he also with much ado won the great City of Appolonia, near unto the Mount Atlas, and gave leave unto most of the Christians, with their Wives and Children to depart, and to sell part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof spoiled by the Soldiers. This done, he returned back to Hadrampolis, leaving Eurefent upon the Marches, who shortly after took Berha, with divers other Towns. At which time also Lala Schahin won Zichne and Serez, in the Confines of Macedonia, with many other strong Towns upon the Frontiers of Thessalia and Thrace. In the City Serez Eurefent made his abode, as in a chief Frontier Town; and he sent the Christians for fear of the Turks were all fled out of the Country about Serez, great numbers of people were sent for out of Asia, to inhabit that Country by the Christians forsaken in the Confines of Macedonia. Amurath had not long continued at Hadrampolis, but that he was advertised of Asia, That Aladin his Son in law King of Caramania, did with Fire and Sword invade his Dominions in Asia; with which News he was exceedingly troubled. And for that cause sending for his Counsellors and Nobility to the Court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of Religion, Faith, Peace, and Alliance, with all Hospitality invaded his Provinces in Asia, whilst he with great danger of his Person, and greater terror of his Enemies, fought with honour to increase the Mahometan sincere Religion (as he termed it) in Europe; from which godly War (said he) I am against my self enforced to turn my Sword, in full defence of my self, against men joyning with us both in Religion and Alliance. And having thus declared his mind, he appointed Charradin Bajla his Lieutenant-General in Europe, and also made his Son Alis Bajla one of his Council, although he were by some thought too young for so great a place. And to having left all things in order according to his mind in respect of passage from Calpitolis into Asia, and so to his City of Prusa, where he spent that Winter. In which time Embassadors came unto him from the Sultan of Egypt, for the renewing of their former Amity and Friendship; which Amurath took very thankfully, and sent them back again laden with kind Letters, and princely Rewards.

When the Spring was come, in the year, 1387, he levied a mighty Army to make War upon the Caramanian King his Son in Law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no less Power to meet him, associating unto him all the left Mahometan Princes of Asia, which were not under Amurath Obedience; to whom the Osman Kings were now grown terrible; which Princes brought with them great Supplies to join with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his Friends, thinking himself now strong enough for Amurath his Father in law, sent an Embassador unto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in Power inferior to him, and therefore nothing less than what he pleased him to have Peace, that he could for his part be content to hearken unto the same upon reasonable conditions; but if he had rather have War, he should find him ready to dare him battle in the Field, whenever he should come. For answer of which Embassage, Amurath willed the Embassador to tell the perjured King his Master, That he had of late, contrary to his Faith before given, in most cruel manner invaded his Dominions, whilst he was busied in most godly Wars (as he termed it) against the misbelieving Christians; from prosecuting whereof, he was by his violence (as he said) withdrawn, contrary to the Law of their God Prophet; for which Outrages and Wrongs, he would shortly come and take of him sharp Revenge; and that therefore he was to expect nothing at his hands but War, for which he willed him to provide, as that at his coming he might not find him waiting to himself. Aladin by his Embassador having received this answer from Amurath, assembled all the Confederate Princes his Allies, with great Perfwasions and greater Promises, encouraging them to this War; and they again kissing the ground at his Feet, as the manner of that Nation is before great Princes, promised with solemn Oaths never to forsake him, but to do all things things which Princes desirous of Honour or Fame, ought by their Oath to do for their Sovereign, to whom they ought Homage and Duty.

In this great preparation for Wars in Asia, Charradin Bajla going into Europe directed which he should do, understanding appointed Alis Bajla his Son to go into Europe, there to be Governor in his Fathers stead. But he was stayed in his Journey by urgent occasions; which Amurath understanding, sent for him back again in post.

Aladin foreseeing the great dangers like to ensue of this War, sent another Embassador unto Amurath, with reasonable conditions of Peace; to whom Amurath answered, That if Aladin had made that Offer one month before, he would perhaps have accepted thereof; but for so much as he had done him great wrong, and that he had now to his infinite Charge drawn him into the field so far from home, he would not make any other end than such the chance of War should appoint. And whereas he in disgrace had called me a Herdman or Shepherd (said he) if he be not such an one himself, as he feigns to be, let him meet me in the field and there try his valor. Hereunto the Embassador replied, saying, That the King his Master made this Offer of Peace not for any fear, but to save the effusion of innocent blood; which consideration, apart, he should find him not inferior to himself, either in number of most expert Soldiers, or other War-like Provision; and that therefore if he rejected this Offer of Peace, he needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, which would bear themselves to valiantly in the field against his Turks, as that he should have no great cause to rejoyce, if his coming thither. Which words of the Embassador so nettled Amurath, that in great rage he commanded him to depart, and to will his Master, if he were a man of such courage and valour as he said, to show himself in the field with all his Forces, there to make an end of all quarrels; where he doubted not but in short time to challenge him according to his due deserts. So after the Embassador was departed, marching forward three days, Alis Beg came unto him: of whose coming he not a little rejoyced; for why, he loved him dearly, and although he was yet of years but young, relied much upon his Council.

The Embassador returning, recounted unto Aladin all that Amurath had said, committing his hard Speeches and proud Threats, and how that he hoped shortly to take from him Iconium and Lareda (the principal Cities of Caramania) with many things more, leaving nothing untold. Which Aladin hearing, laid unto the Confederate Princes that were with him, Verily Amurath threatens to take from us the Cities of Iconium and Lareda; but let him take heed that we take not from him his fair City of Prusa. Then demanding of the Embassador, of what strength Amurath might be; it was answered by him, that he deemed him to be about seventy thousand men. Whereupon Aladin was not a little rejoycing, said, Assuredly when he shall see our Army, he will not dare to give us battle; or if he do, he shall fight upon great disadvantage, his men being both fewer in number than we, and fore wearied with long and painful travel.

In the mean time Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, daily encouraging his Soldiers with Perfwasions and Gifts bountifully bestowed upon them, filling their heads with promises of greater, the War once happily ended. At length he came to the great Plains in Caramania, called the French Plains, because in former time the Christians (whom the Turks for most part call Franks) in these places camped their great Armies, as they were wont to the winning of Jerusalem (as in the former part of this History is declared.) Into these Plains also came Aladin with his Army, and was now incamped within one days march of Amurath, and so rested that night.

The next morning Amurath put his Army in order of battle, appointing the leading of the right Wing to his youngest Son Jacup, with whom he joynted Caluzas Beg, Ein Beg Subbajla, Egribon Subbajla, Serazac, and Cusfendil, two Christian Princes, all Captains of great experience. The left Wing was led by Bajazet his eldest Son, with Ferize and Blazac, both valiant Captains; in which Wings were also placed the Christian Soldiers sent by Lazarn out of Servia, according to the convention of peace; in the main battle he stood himself; the Vanguard was conducted by Temurtas; and the rearguard by the Subbajla of Oxyllitus (called also Temurtas) and Archemen. Aladin on the other side, with no less care and diligence for his men likewise in order of battle, placed himself in the main battle, as did Amurath; and the Princes his Allies, with his other expert Captains, some in the right Wing, and some in the left, as he thought most convenient; in such sort, as that in all mens judgment he was in Force nothing inferior to his Father in Law.

These great Enemies thus ranged with Ensigns displayed came on courageously, one directly upon the other; where approaching together, the confused noise of Trumpets, Drums, Fics, with other Instruments of War, the neighing of Horses, and clattering of Armour, was so great, that whilst Warlike sounds there rejoyced, Cowards thought Heavens fall. But the sign of battle, both sides given, Samagance was charged, having before obtained exceeding courage first charged Temurtas in the Vanguard, and broke his Ranks; at which time Temurtas a Tartar Prince, and Farjadac another of the Confederates, delivered their Arrows aloft upon the Vanguard, as if it had been a flower of Hell. Which Bajazet seeing, and how hardly Temurtas was charged, having before obtained leave of his Father, brake in upon the Enemy with such violence, as if it had been the lightning; whereof he was ever after firamed Gildern, which is to say, The Lightning. Ferizes and Hozze, which is to say, the other valiant Captains in that Wing, following Bajazet, with princible courage entered the battle; where for a great space was made a most dreadful and doubtful fight. A man would have thought two rough Seas had met together, swaying one against the other, doubtful which way the current would at length fall. In this conflict many thousands were on both sides slain, so that the held lay covered with the dead bodies of worthy Men and valiant Soldiers; yet at length these Confederate Princes, finding themselves overmatched by Bajazet and his Soldiers, referring themselves to their better Fortunes, turned their backs and fled; when Aladin seeing a great part of his Army thus overthrow, and himself now ready to be charged by Amurath his whole Power, despairing of Victory, sped himself in all haste to Iconium, his strong City. The spoil which Amurath got in this battle was great, most part whereof he gave in reward to Temurtas and his Soldiers, which had induced the greatest fury of the battle. Amurath after this Victory with all speed marched to Iconium, and there besieged Aladin the Caramanian King, in his strongest City, giving out Proclamation in the mean time, That none of his Soldiers upon pain of death should use any violence to any of the Country-people, or take any thing from them; to the intent it might appear unto the World, that he made that War against the Osman King, rather to procure Injury, and Wrong than for desire of Sovereignty or Spoil. his to frail a Proclamation, the Christians sent by Lazarus, amongst others, transgressed; and therefore by his commandment suffered (many of them) exemplary punishment; which was the cause of the Servian War which not long after ensued, both unto Amurath and Lazarus the Delpot, as hereafter shall appear.

Aladin now on every side besieged in Izonium, and without all hope of escape, sent to the Queen his Wife, Amurath's Daughter, bewailing unto her his desperate estate, and requesting her by all the love that he so honourable a minded Lady might bear unto her miserable Husband, to adventure her self to go to her angry Father, and to crave pardon for his great Treasons and Offence. The Queen forthwith attiring her self, as was fittest for her Husbands present estate, came to her Father's; where falling down at his Feet upon her knees, with words wisely pleaded, and tears distilling down her fair Cheeks from her fairer Eyes, as if it had been from two Fountains, in most forrowful manner, craved her Husbands Pardon, imputing to the heat of Youth whatsoever he had done; and would not be comforted or taken up until she had obtained Grace. Amurath most entirely loved his Daughter, and therefore for her sake not only granted unto her her Husbands life (which in short time was like to have been in his power to have spilt); but also his Kingdom, which as a Victorious Conqueror might by Law of Arms have of right detained. She now assured of her Fathers promise, sent unto her Husband Aladin, wishing him the next day without fear to come out of the City, and in humble sort to acknowledge his fault before her Father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and prostrating himself before Amurath, acknowledged his unfaithfulness; of whom (for his Wives sake) he obtained Pardon, and Restoration to his Kingdom, with many great Gifts, contrary to his evil desert. The Latin Historians mistaking the man, report this Caramanian War, to have been fought against the King of Caramania, Amurath his own Grandfather by the Mother side; and that he was by Amurath then spoiled of a great part of his Kingdom; but it agreeth not with the Turkish Histories, which make Amurath to be the Son of Orchanes and Lulifer, the Daughter of the Governor of the Castle of Jarcheser, as is before declared in the life of Orchanes; which Lulifer lieth buried by her Husband Orchanes in Prusa.

This great Victory gotten by Amurath against the Cosacs, was the true beginning of the greatness of the Orchoman Kingdom in Asia; wherewith the other Mahometan Princes of the Selazucian Family were so discouraged, that they were glad to submit themselves thus hith unto Amurath, and after that unto his Son Bajazet; until that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince, some few years after, taking Bajazet Prisoner in a great battle at Mount Sidra, abated the Orchoman Pride, and restored the other oppressed Mahometan Princes to their old Possessions and Kingdoms.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way took the City of Dijonopolis, and coming to Cutais, broke up his Army, and so in triumph returned to his Court at Prusa.

Lazarus, Delpot of Servia (in old time called Myria) had sent a thousand armed men to Amurath in this late Caramanian War, according to the convention of the Peace not long before made betwixt them; for many of the Soldiers were with great favour (to the terror of others) executed in Caramania, for transgressing Amurath's commandment. This great War being ended, and the Army broken up at Cutais, they with others were licensed to depart into their own Country. Whose General (whom they call the Yavoyd) returning home, reported unto Lazarus the Delpot, the success of that War, and withal in what cruel and tyrannical manner the men he had sent were in that Service used by the commandment of Amurath. With whom (said this General) you without cause have made a most dishonourable Peace; first, by giving your Faith to such a Mercenary, and then in sending your loyal Subjects, in recompence of their good Service, to be butchered at his pleasure, besides the shameful Tribute which you yearly pay unto him. Whereas if it would please you in the depth of your wisdom but to know your own strength, you should find your self in War-like force and power nothing inferior to the Tyrant; for we your Servants being in number but a handful, were in these late Wars a terror unto his Enemies, and by our valour, and not his own, he got the Victory over them. What cause is there then, that you should subject your self unto your Inferior? I know he cannot of himself bring into the field above fifty thousand fighting men; but admit he were able to bring a hundred thousand, are not you (if you so please) able to levy a far greater Power? and for all other War-like provision you are ten-fold better provided than he. Besides that, the mighty Christian Princes will send you such Aid against this hateful and common Enemy, that being united with yours, his Barbarian Forces will be nothing in comparison of those which you shall then be able to bring into the field against him; which no doubt the Christian Princes will the rather do, as men desirous to quench this devouring fire in another mans house, rather than in their own.

These words of the Yavoyd so much moved Lazarus, that he determined in himself to break that servile League which he before had made with Amurath. And for that cause sent his Ambassador with secret Instructions to the King of Bosnia (in time past called Illyria) his Neighbour; whereof the chief point was, to crave his Aid against the Turk their common Enemy. By whom the King of Bosnia returned this answer, That it had been much better such consideration had been thought upon before the foul contract (full of disgrace both to himself and all other Christian Princes) was upon a vain fear by him rashly made with the Turkish Tyrant; yet for so much as things done could not be undone, letting that past which was remediless, he promised to join with him his whole Forces against so dangerous an Enemy. And thereupon appointing a place for an Interview, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the Articles of their Confederation.

There was in the Confines of Bosnia a Castle called Alexandria, the Captain whereof being a Christian, was yet Tributary unto the Turk; wishing unto him such good, as men oppressed use to do to them by whom they are so wronged. This Captain under the colour of Friendship went to Amurath, and in great secrecy offered to him the whole State of the Kingdom of Bosnia; and withal, that the King thereof intended some great matter against him; for the preventing whereof he offered his own Service, and shewed some probable means how that Kingdom might be brought into his Subjection, if he would but find some worthy General with a convenient Power for the undertaking thereof. This wonderfully pleased the ambitious old Tyrant, who therefore commanded a rich Garment to be sent unto the Captain (which amongst the Turks is taken for a sure token of the Kings great Favour) and and forthwith appointed his Tutor Lala Schahin, according to this Captains direction, to invade the Kingdom of Bosnia. Who joining himself with this deceitful Captain Ala Alexandria, with an Army of twenty thousand men entered into Bosnia; where, upon overrunning a file of the Country, he without resistance took great Booties; and seeing no apparent cause of fear, to do the more harm, by the advice of the same Captain divided his Army, which he sent into divers parts of the Country, to burn and spoil the same. Of these Messengers from the Captain advertised, had in convenient places laid strong Ambushes for the intercepting of his Enemies. So that as Schahin was returning homeward with a rich booty, having then with him but a thousand men, suddenly appeared in his way thirty thousand Christians, which Schahin seeing, thinking it folly to oppose so few against so many, would have presently fled; but the rest of the Gallants that were with him, presuming of their good Fortune, and loth to lose their rich Prey, would needs fight Schahin with the Christians; in which desperate Conflict they were almost all slain, and the spoil they had taken, all recovered by the Christians. As for Schahin, he was glad by shameful flight to save himself. The like mishap befell the other Turks in the other parts of Bosnia, who for the most part were likewise intercepted and slain; so that of twenty thousand, scarce five thousand returned home.

Whilst these things were doing in Euxetie, Amurath in great Triumph at Neapolis married the Emperor of Constantinople his Daughter; whose two Sisters were also given in marriage to his two sons; at which time he with great Solemnity celebrated three of Bajazet's Sons. At this time also returned Jacagi Oghli, whom he had before sent Ambassador to the Sultan of Egypt in request of the honourable Embassage before to him sent from the said Sultan. Now Amurath understanding of the loss of his men in Bosnia, with the revolt of Lazarus Delpot of Servia, was therewith much disquieted. Wherefore he commanded Alia Bajazet his chief Counsellor, with all speed to send forth Commissions into all parts of his Kingdom, for the levying of a Royal Army; which was done in such post haste, that it was thought he would have taken the Field before the beginning of the Spring. At which time also the other Mahometan Kings and Princes of Asia, Caraman Oghli, Taka Oghli and the rest, bound unto him by Homage, with divers others of smaller Power, were sent for, to Aid him in his War; who partly for fear, and partly moved with the zeal of their Mahometan Superstition, brought their Forces with great devotion. Unto this War against the Christians, came also great numbers of the Mahometans from far Countries, as voluntary Soldiers. Bajazet his Son also, then Governor of Cassia, with a great part of Galatia, gathering all his Forces, came to aid his Father in this religious War (as it was by them termed). The Christian Tributary Princes were not then forgotten; of whom two came, namely Cuspidi and Serazali; other two forsaking Amurath, came not, which was Safmenos Prince of Bulgaria, and the Prince of Varna and Dobruza; with whom Amurath was highly offended. In the time of this so great Preparation, Lala Schahin, Amurath's Tutor and faithful Servitor, died, being a man of great years; and Tamertafes was appointed Governor in his place.

The revoking of the two Christian Princes, Safmenos and the Prince of Varna, much grieved Amurath; Wherefore he commanded Alia Bajazet, with an Army of thirty thousand to invade and spoil

Safmenos his Country, now called Bulgaria, and in ancient time the lower Myfia. Alia Bajazet according to that was given him in charge, falling unto him Jacagi Beg, the Son of Tamertafes, Ulin Beg, Sutratza Bajazet, with other Captains and Commanders of the Turks Provinces in Europe, assembled an Army of thirty thousand for the Invasion of Bulgaria. With this Army the Bajazet took many strong Towns and Castles in Bulgaria, as Piravade, Penzazina, Madra, Soni, and others.

In the mean time, whilst Alia Bajazet had thus begun the War against the Christians in Bulgaria, Amurath having gathered a great Army in Asia, determined in the beginning of the Spring to pass over with the same into Europe; commanding the Government of his Countries in Asia, to Tamertafes Bajazet, Forist Beg, Tamertafes Sibbajazet, Culu Beg, and Haza Beg; and so all things left in order in Asia, he drew down his Asian Forces toward Hellefponus, where he was a while stayed with contrary Winds; but was afterwards transported to Callipolis, by Jenice Beg Sanzack there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his Army out of Asia into Europe. But whilst he stayed at Callipolis, Bajazet his Son with a great Power came unto him thither: Alia Bajazet also understanding of Amurath's arrival in Europe, retired out of Bulgaria, and came to him at Alcida, recounting unto him the whole Success of his Expedition into Bulgaria.

Safmenos Prince of Bulgaria, seeing his Country spoiled, his strong Cities and Castles taken by the Turks, and whilst hearing of their great Preparations for War, by the advice of his Nobility, thought it best betimes again to submit himself unto Amurath; wherefore, sending a Winding-sheet about his Neck, in token that he had deserved death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at Calcidia, where falling flat upon the ground, at the Horles feet whereon Amurath sat, he in most humble voice craved pardon; offering by a certain day to deliver Silifria the chief City of his Dominion, into Amurath's Possession, as a pledge of his Fidelity; who thereupon granted him pardon, and to assure him of his Favour, commanded a rich Garment to be sent upon him, after the manner of the Turks, sending Alia Bajazet at the time appointed, to take possession of Silifria. But Safmenos repenting himself of that he had so largely promised, would not deliver his City, but in strongest manner he could presently fortified the same. Wherewith Amurath more offended than before, commanded the Bajazet with Fire and Sword again to spoil and wait his Country; who according to his commandment entered again into Bulgaria, and struck such a terror of his coming into the hearts of the people, that many strong places were voluntarily yielded unto his Power, namely Dirizze, Coslova, with the City of Ternova, the Seat of the Princes Court; Tzernovi, Novakofski, Zilifova, with divers others; and proceeding farther, he laid siege to others; the strongest City of Bulgaria, upon the side of the great River Danubius, whether Safmenos was for fear himself fled. Who finding himself unable to hold out the Siege, once again (with shame enough) tying a Winding-sheet about his Neck, as he had done before, and taking his Son with him, went out of the City, he laid siege to another manner falling down at the Bajazet his Feet, craved pardon; which the Bajazet moved with compassion to free the misery of so great a man, and having already taken from him the greatest part of his Dominion, and now out of fear of further resistance, easily granted. And having thus ended the Bulgarian War, returned Amurath, of whom he was right joyfully received.

Amurath had now made great Preparation for the invading of Servia, for which purpose he had drawn upon Europe the greatest Forces he possibly could; sending also for his youngest Son Jacup, Governor of Carsia, who understanding his Fathers pleasure, repaired unto him with all the Power he could make. This Army by Amurath thus assembled, was the greatest that ever was before that, brought by the Turks into Europe. Lazarus not ignorant of this great Preparation made by Amurath, had taken into the society of this War, the King of Bosnia (as is aforesaid) with Vukcu Prince of Macedonia, his Son in law, who both brought unto him great Aid; he had also by his Embassadors procured great Supplies from other Christian Kings and Princes, out of Valachia, Hungary, Croatia, Sclavonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Italy; great numbers of other voluntary devout Christians, which all assembled and met together, did in number far exceed the great Army of the Turks.

With this Army Lazarus the Despot encamped upon the side of the River Morava the greater, not far from whence stood the strong Castle of Sarkovo, which Alis Bajazet had of late taken from the Bulgarian Prince, standing as it were between Bulgaria and Servia; this Castle being now possessed of the Turks, was thought by Lazarus dangerous to his Country, who therefore sent one Demetrius, a right valiant Captain, with certain Companies of select Men to take in the same. The name of this Captain Demetrius was a general terror unto the Turks, for he had done them so; so that they in the Castle hearing that he was come, without further resistance yielded the same unto him. Whereof Amurath understanding, sent Eime, and Sarutze Basha to recover the same; but Lazarus doubting that the Castle would hardly be kept in that dangerous War, sent Vukcu his Son in law with twenty thousand Men, to bring away all that was therein, and in the City near unto it, left it should become a prey unto the greedy Turks; which he accordingly did, and at the same time raised both the Castle and the City, before the coming of Jacup Beg, sent from Amurath to have done the same exploit; which he coming thither, found already done to his hand by Vukcu.

As Amurath was marching towards Servia, Sarutze and Custendi, two Christian Princes his Tributaries, met him with their Forces, whom he caused to march before him, as his Guides; and passing through Custendi his Country, was there refreshed with plenty of all things necessary; until the length passing the River of Morava the less, he drew to near unto the Plains of Cassova (where the Christian Army lay) that he with his Son Bajazet from a little Hill took full view of the Christian Camp, which was so great, that it covered all those large Plains from side to side, and daunted Amurath, as that returning to his Army, he presently entered into a great consultation with his greatest Captains and Commanders, what course to take against such a puissant Enemy.

These great Armies being now come so nigh together, as that they might the one well defy the other, Amurath had purposed the same day to have given the Christians battle; but being dissuaded by Eurenesius, both for that it was extremely hot, and his Souldiers wearied with travel, he rested that night. The next morning as soon as it was day, he put his Army in order of battle, placing his Son Bajazet with Eurenesius and Eime Beg Subbajazet in the right Wing; his youngest Son Jacup with Sarutze Basha in the left Wing; the main battle he left himself; Lazarus in the mean time had also for his Army in good order; giving the charge of the right Wing to Vukcu his Son in law; the left Wing was led by the King of Bosnia, and his Sons; in the main battle stood Lazarus himself; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Bulgarians, he placed in both Wings; it is thought, greater Armies than those two had seldom before met in Europe. Lazarus as the Turkish Histories report (but how truly I know not) having in his Army five hundred thousand men; and Amurath scarce half so many.

To begin the battle, Amurath had drawn a thousand of his best Archers into the leading of Alis Bajazet, out of the right Wing of his Army; and the like number of Archers out of the left, under the conduct of one Musaphas; which he placed on both sides of the Army as he thought best, Eurenesius a man of great experience, told Amurath, That the Christians being for the most part well and strongly armed, and should now close together in their charge, would be like a Rock of Iron, unable to be pierced; but if in joining the battle, he would a little retire, the Christians following upon good horse, would so loose their clove standing (the chief part of their strength) and leave an entrance for his Men. Upon which resolution, Amurath commanded the Archers to give the first charge; which they courageously performed. At which time, the Turks Army gave ground a little; which the Christians perceiving, with great force assailed the left Wing of their Army, and after a hard and cruel fight put the same to flight; which Bajazet seeing, with such fury renewed the battle, that the Turks which before as men engaged fled in the left Wing, began now to turn again upon their Enemies; and the Christians, having as they thought already got the Victory, were to begin a great battle. In which bloody fight many thousands fell on both sides; the brightness of the Armor and Weapons, was as it had been the Lightning; the multitude of Launces as other Horsemens Staves, shadowed the light of the Sun. Arrows and Darts fell so fast, that a man would have thought they had poured down from Heaven; the noise of the Instruments of War, with the neighing of Horses, and out-cries of Men was so terrible and great, that the wild Beasts of the Mountains stood astonished therewith; and the Turkish Histories, to express the terror of the day (vainly say) that the Angels in Heaven amazed with that hideous noise, for that time forgot the heavenly Hymns wherewith they always glorified God. About noon time of the day, the fortune of the Turks prevailing, the Christians began to give ground, and at length betook themselves to plain flight; whom the Turks with all their force pursued and slew them down right, without number or mercy. In which battle Lazarus the Despot himself was also slain. Howbeit some Histories report otherwise, as that he with his Son were taken Prisoners, and by and afterwards (in revenge of Amurath's death) cruelly slain; otherwise also reporting that he died in Prison. Amurath after this great Victory, with some few of his chief Captains taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heaps in the field like Mountains; a Christian Souldier, fore wounded and all bloody, seeing him, in flagging manner arose (as if it had been from death) out of a heap of slain men, and making towards him, for want of strength fell down divers times by the way as he came, as if he had been a drunken man; at length drawing nigh unto him, when they which guarded the Kings Person would have stayed him, he was by Amurath himself commanded to come nearer, supposing that he would have craved his life of him. Thus the half dead Christian pressing near unto him, as if he would for honour sake have kissed his Feet, suddenly stabbed him in the bottom of his belly with a short Dagger, which he had in his Souldiers Cloak; of which wound he died. The name of this man, (for his courage worthy of eternal memory) was Miles Cobelitz; who before fore wounded, was shortly after in the presence of Bajazet cut into small pieces. The Turks in their Annals somewhat otherwise report the death of Amurath; as that this Cobelitz, one of the Despot's Servants, in time of the Battle, coming to Amurath as a Fugitive, offering him his Service, and admitted to his presence, in humbling himself to have kissed his Feet (as the barbarous manner of the Turks is) being himself therefore shortly after (as is aforesaid) in the presence of Bajazet most cruelly hewen into small pieces. Whereupon ever since that time, the manner of the Turks hath been, and yet is, that when any Embassador or Stranger is come to kiss the Sultan his hand, or otherwise to approach his Person, he is as it were for honours sake, led by the Arms unto his presence, between two of the great Courtiers; but indeed by so interrupting him, to be sure that he shall not offer him the like violence, that did this Cobelitz unto Amurath.

The dead body of Amurath was presently with all secrecy conveyed into his Tent by the Bashes and Captains present at his death; whether Bajazet was also brought with an Ensign before him, as the Successor in his Fathers Kingdom. His younger Brother Jacup, surnamed Zelebi (or the Noble) yet ignorant of that had happened, was by the great Bashes sent for, as from his Father; who calling no peril, but coming into his Fathers Tent, was there presently by them strangled, by the Commandment of Bajazet, as most Histories report; howbeit the Turks Annals charge him not therewith. This was the beginning of the most unnatural and inhumane custom, ever since holden for a most wholesome and good policy among the Turkish Kings and Emperors, in the beginning of their Reign most cruelly to Murther their Brethren and nearest Kindred, so as once to rid themselves of all fear of their Competitors.

This Amurath was in his Superstition more zealous than any other of the Turkish Kings; a man of great courage, and in all his Attempts fortunate; he made greater slaughter of his Enemies, than both his Father and Grandfather; his Kingdom in Asia he greatly enlarged by the Sword, Marriage, and Purchase; and using the Difcord and Cowardice of the Grecian Princes, to his profit, subdued a great part of Thracia, called Rossania, with the Territories thereto adjoining, leaving unto the Emperor of Constantinople, little more or nothing more in Thracia, than the Imperial City it self, with the bare name of an Emperor, almost without an Empire; he won a great part of Bulgaria, and entered into Servia, Bosnia, and Macedonia; he was liberal, and withal severe; of his Subjects both beloved and feared; a man of very few words, and one that could dissemble deeply. He was slain when he was three score and eight years old, and had thereof reigned thirty one, in the year of our Lord, 1390. His dead body was by Bajazet conveyed into Asia, and there Royally buried at Prusa, in a fair Chapel at the West end of the City, near unto the Baths there; where, upon his Tomblieth his Souldiers Cloke, with a little Turkish Tulip, much differing from those great Turbans which the Turks now wear. Near unto the same Tomb are placed three Launces, with three Horse-tails fastned at the upper end of them, which he used as Guidons in his Wars; a thing in ancient time not strange. There standeth a Castle with the Tomb, made in remembrance of him, in the Plains of Cassova, where he was slain, and his Entrails buried; which giveth occasion for some to report that he was there also himself entombed.

The LIFE of

BAJAZET,

The First of that NAME,

The FOURTH and most UNFORTUNATE

King of the Turks.

Bajazet
seeseth
Servia.

Bajazet, or as the Turks call him, Baiaſſe, of his violent and force Nature ſinamed Gilderunor Lightning, ſucceeded his Father Amurath in the Turkiſh Kingdom, his younger Brother Jauſp being ſtrangled immediately after his Fathers death, as is before declared. He in the firſt year of his Reign invaded Servia, and there beſieged Cratova, a City of the Deſpots; whereunto the Silver Mines of Servia (not the leaſt cauſe of that War) belonged. Which City was yielded unto him, upon condition, That the Chriſtian Inhabitants might with Life and Liberty depart. Who were no ſooner gone out of the City, but that by his commandment they were all moſt cruelly ſlain by his men of War, for that purpoſe ſent out after them. At this time he alſo won Uſcupis, with divers other Caſſes in the Country near unto Cratova.

Siegmund at the ſame time King of Hungary (a young Prince of great hope, and Brother to Wenceslaus, then Emperor of the Weſt) adverted from the Servians his Allies and Confederates, of theſe proud proceedings of Bajazet; by his Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe, requeſted him, That as he was a juſt Prince, and wiſhed to live in quiet with his own, to deſiſt from doing of ſuch open wrong, and from invading of ſuch Countries of his Friends and Confederates, as he had no right in. Which Embaſſadors to ſee, Bajazet deſained without answer, until ſuch time as he had overrun a great part of the Deſpot's his Country, and therein done what he thought good. Then calling the ſaid Embaſſadors unto him into one of the ſtrong Towns which he had in every corner filled with his own Souldiers, told them that they might there ſee, that his Right both unto that Town and the reſt by him taken, was good enough, for as much as the very Walls acknowledged the ſame; And ſo giving them leave to depart, willed them to tell their Maſter. Which his proud answer, by the ſame Embaſſadors reported unto the young King, no leſs troubled him, than if open War had by them been denounced unto him, ſeeing the Tyrant (as it ſhould ſeem) pretended Right unto whatſoever he could by force get; nevertheleſs, being himſelf not yet well ſetled in his Kingdom, and in doubt of the contrary Faction (that altogether liked not of his Election into Hungary for their King) he was glad at that time to put it up, and ſo to hold himſelf content.

The next year, Bajazet by Periſes-Beg, took the City of Vidua, with many other ſtrong Towns and Caſſes in Servia, and afterwards returned to Hadrianople. But whiſt that he thus raged in Europe, the Caramanian King invaded and ſpoiled the Frontiers of his Countries in Aſia; which although he was not then at leiſure, he forgot not afterwards to revenge to the full. At the ſame time Ewroſes, Lord Governor of the Marches of his Kingdom in Europe towards Grecia, departing from Serres (where he then lay) took the City of Sitrus in Thracia. And Periſes-Beg, not content to have taken Vidua (as is aforeſaid) paſſed over the great River of Danubius, and grievouſly ſpoiled Valachia; from whence he returned laden with a great Prey. This was the firſt time (that I read of) that the Turks ever paſſed over the River Danubius. At this time alſo Jegides Baſſa entered the Kingdom of Bosnia, from whence he carried a great number of Captives to Hadrianople, where Bajazet ſpent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring Bajazet paſſed over Helleſpontus to Proſa, where he built a fair Mahometan Temple, with a Colledge, and an Alms-Houſe; which works finiſhed, he returned again into Europe, and built a Monastery at Hadrianople; and ſo returned again into Aſia, leaving Temurtaſes, Begler-Beg (or his Viceroy) in Hadrianople. After he was come into Aſia, he laid Siege to the ſtrong City of Philadelphia in Lydia, which was at that time the only City in the leſſer Aſia, yet holden by the Chriſtians in the midſt of the Mahometan Princes; for now was the Greek Emperor by the Ottoman Kings and the other Turks quite driven out of the leſſer Aſia. In the beginning of this Siege, Bajazet gave ſtrait commandment to his Souldiers, That they ſhould not ſpoil or hurt any thing in the Country belonging to the Citizens; hoping by ſuch reſtrained courteſie to make them the more willing to yield themſelves unto his Obedience. But diſappointed of his expectation, and finding them reſolved to hold it out unto the laſt, he forthwith gave out contrary commandment, not to ſpare any thing they could waſt or deſtroy; which was accordingly by his greedy Souldiers performed.

performed. After long Siege, the Citizens seeing the Country about them utterly wasted, and themselves unable longer to endure, and out of all hope of relief, yielded their City unto the pleasure of Bajazet. It is written by some, that this famous City was not besieged without the consent of the Emperor of Constantinople; and that the Greeks themselves, moved with envy to see that City so long held out, did help the Turks in the winning thereof.

In the time of this Siege Aidin Oglu Prince of Caria, a Mahometan, came to Bajazet, and yielded himself into his power as his Vassal; unto whom Bajazet restored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him; yet upon such condition, as that he should not from that time coin any Money in his own name, either be remembered in publick Prayers as a Prince in their Mahometan Temples, as he had before been; but that all such things should be done in the name of Bajazet, as his dread Lord and Sovereign. With which disgrace the poor Prince was glad to content himself, and to live as his Vassal. From Philadelphia he led his Army into the Country of Saruchania, in ancient time called Asia Maritima, which he subdued unto himself upon like conditions. After that, he passed farther to Manissa, or Menez, sometime called Myndus in Caria; the Prince whereof for fear fled to Cutrum Bajazet, Prince of Cassama and part of Pontus, leaving his Country to the pleasure of the Tyrant. And forasmuch as the young King of Caramania had invaded his Countries, whilst he was busied in Europe, Bajazet in revenge thereof entered with his Army into Caramania, and took Cesaria, with divers other places there; so that the young King discouraged with the loss of his Towns, and fearing Bajazet his greatness, was glad to hold himself contented with his loss, and to make Peace with him as it pleased him to grant it. As Bajazet was making this expedition into Caramania, another young Mahometan Prince, the Son of Prince German, came unto him with one of his chief Counsellors, and were both by him sent Prisoners over the Strait to the Castle of Isfala, where they lay in durance many years after. Thus Bajazet having oppressed and wronged most of the Mahometan Princes, the Successors of Sultan Aladin in the lesser Asia, at last returned again himself in triumph to Prusa.

The Prince of Montesia, who for fear of Bajazet was fled out of his Country, as is aforesaid, had now incited Cutrum Bajazet, Prince of Cassama, with great power to invade that side of Bajazet his Kingdom which bordered upon him. Which Bajazet understanding, gathered a great Army to go against this Mahometan Prince. At which very time the Vayvod of Valachia, hearing of Bajazet his troubles in Asia, with a strong Army passed over Danubius into those parts of Serbia and Bulgaria that were by the Turks as then possessed; where he spoiled the Country, and slew great numbers of the Turks, making Mahometan Saints and Martyrs by heaps; for so the Turks account all them whom the Christians kill in their War, which done, he retired back again into Valachia, carrying with him also most of the Turks Prisoners. Bajazet thus at once invaded both in Asia and Europe; deferred his Wars purposed against the Prince of Pontus, until a more convenient time, converting his Forces against the Valachians. Wherefore passing over the Strait to Hadrinople, he sent his Army from thence to Nicopolis, and there passing the River of Danubius, entered into Valachia, burning and spoiling the Country before him as he went. Where the Vayvod to repress his Fury, met him in the Field and gave him Battel, but was therein overthrown, and many of his People slain; so that at last he was glad to sue for Peace, which he obtained, by submitting himself to Bajazet, and yielding to pay him a yearly Tribute.

Whilst Bajazet was thus busied in Valachia, news was brought unto him, That the Christians of the West with a Fleet of Gallies did great harm along the Coast of his Dominions in Asia. In revenge whereof, he entered with his Army unto Thessaly, destroying all the Country unto Thessalonica; in which expedition he took the City of Neapolis in Greece, and Joannina in Etolia, and after that returned into Asia, where he spent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring, he with a great Power passed the Strait of Calipolis to Hadrinople, intending to have invaded Hungary. But as he was upon the way, it chanced that a Constantinopolitan Spy was by the Turks intercepted, with Letters from the Greek Emperor to the King of Hungary, giving him warning both of the Turkish preparation and coming. By which Spy Bajazet also understood of another Messenger before sent into Hungary for like purpose. Whereupon Temurastef (then his great Lieutenant in Europe) perswaded him to desist from his intended Wars in Hungary, and to besiege the Imperial City of Constantinople, as a thing of more honour, and less danger; the City being already (as he said, and as in truth it was) surrounded with the Turkish Provinces; bringing in Philadelphia (but a few years before won) for example of the like exploit. Of whose Counsel Bajazet liking well, returned with his Army, and shortly after came and fate down therewith before Constantinople, laying hard Siege thereunto, first by Land, and after by Sea, with his Gallies sent from Calipolis. Which hard Siege continued (as most Histories report) the space of eight years; in which long time he drave the Emperor Emmanuel Paleologus to that Strait, that he was glad to leave his City, and himself in person to crave Aid of Wenceslaus the German Emperor, and Charles the Sixth the French King, and other Christian Princes also. At which time the Citizens were at length brought to such extremity, that they were even at the point to have yielded up the City; and happily had so done, had not Sigismund King of Hungary (assisted with a great Army of the French, and other voluntary Christians almost out of every part of Christendom, to the number of an hundred and thirty thousand, under the leading of John Count of Nivernis, and after Duke of Burgundy) for the relief of the besieged Emperor, passed over Danubius into the Turkish Dominions; and there having recovered Valpae, with certain other strong Holds in Bulgaria, laid Siege to Nicopolis; out of which City the Turks oftentimes sallied, and gave him many an hot skirmish. It is reported, That the young King Sigismund beholding the greatness of his Army, in his great joyly hearing of the coming of the Turks Army, should proudly say, What need we to fear the Turks, who need us at all to fear the falling of the Howens? which if they should fall, yet were we able with our Spears and Halberds to hold them up from falling upon us. But Bajazet understanding what Spoil the Hungarian King had made in his late gained Countries, and of the

Thessalia invaded by the Christians.

Siege of Nicopolis; commanded the Ladders and the other great provision now in readiness for the scaling and assaulting of the City of Constantinople to be burnt, because they should not come into the hands of the Christians; and so raising his Siege, marched with a right puissant Army to Nicopolis, sending Eurenos before, of purpose to intercept some of the Christians, thereby to learn the State of their Camp and Army. But they hearing of his coming, so well looked to themselves, that he with flame returned to his Master as he came, without any one Prisoner taken. Which thing much troubled Bajazet, as fearing he should have to do with a wary Enemy. Sigmund understanding of the approach of Bajazet, leaving a furious host himself, and for the continuing of the Siege, retired himself, and with the rest of his Army went to meet his proud Enemy. Of whose coming and approach Bajazet understanding, divided his Army into two parts; and being now come within the sight of the Christian Army, made them but of the one half, keeping himself close in secret ambush not far off with the other. The Christians deeming themselves (as they were) far more in number than the Turks which they saw, divided their Army also into two parts, purposing betwixt them to have inclosed the Turks. Of all the Christians that were there present, the French desired to have the honour of the first charge to be given upon the Turks, and in their heat upon good hope set forward (the Hungarians, with a great part of the Army, not yet far in order) and so began the Battle; where betwixt them and the Turks was fought a right cruel Fight, and in a little time many thousands slain. But this Fight, which was endured, when Bajazet with the other half of his Army suddenly arising, came on with such violence, as well became his surname of Gildern or Lightning; and so hardly charged the French, that they amazed at the suddenness of the danger, and oppressed with the fury and multitude of the unexpected Enemy, stood at the first as men dismayed; but seeing no remedy, encouraging one another, valiantly fought it out until they were almost all either slain or taken Prisoners; still in hope to have been relieved by the Hungarians and the rest. In this hard conflict divers of the French Horsemen having forsaken their Horses, fought on Foot, as their manner was; which Horses running back with-out their Riders, upon the Hungarians, caused them to doubt that the French were quite overthrown; wherewith dismayed, they without further coming on, all turned their backs and fled, in to great halt, as that it looked no more like a King or any other great Commander to go about to fly their Flight. The French thus by their too much haft overthrown, the Turks pursuing the Hungarians and the rest of the Christians, made of them a great slaughter; of whom also many were drowned in the great River Danubius. At which time also the French took so many Prisoners, that it was thought every several Turk had his Prisoner. King Sigmund himself, who but a little before had despised even the falling of the Heavens, had then also undoubtedly fallen into his Enemies hands, had he not in a little Boat by good hap got over Danubius; not unlike another Nero, who having covered the Seas with his Ships, and with a world of men passed over into Grecia, was afterwards by the strange change of Fortune, himself alone in a small Fish-Boat glad to get back again into Asia. Sigmund being thus got over Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the loss of the Battle, fled by Sea into Thracia unto Constantinople, from whence he failed unto the Island of the Rhodes; and from thence sailing through the Aegean and Ionian Sea, landed at length at Dalmatia; and so having wandered from place to place, toiled with many Fortunes, after eighteen Months long and painful travel returned again into Hungary. Where he found the State of the Kingdom in his absence much troubled by the contrary Faction in the mean time having made choice of Ladislaus King of Naples for their King; who was even then with a great Army going to have taken possession of the Kingdom, had not Sigmund in good time by the help of certain of the chief of the Hungarian Nobility prevented him. In this Battle, called the Battle of Nicopolis, were of the Christians twenty thousand slain, and of the Turks threefold thousand. The Count of Nivers the French Kings near Kinsman, was there taken Prisoner, with three hundred great Commanders more; where after he had endured great contumely and reproach in the presence of Bajazet, he was commanded to make choice of five other of the Captains, such as he liked best, all the rest being cut in pieces before his Face, and he with the other five left alive, sent Prisoners to Prusa, from whence they were afterwards ransomed for two hundred thousand Ducats. This bloody Battle of Nicopolis was fought in the year of our Lord 1396.

Bajazet after this great Victory, having worthily relieved his besieged City, returned again to the Siege of Constantinople, laying more hardly unto it than before, building Forts and Bulwarks against it on the one side towards the Land; and passing over the Strait of Bosphorus built a strong Castle upon that Strait over against Constantinople, to impeach so much as was possible, all passage thereunto by Sea. This Strait Siege (as most write) continued also two years, which I suppose by the circumstance of the History, to have been part of the afore-said eight years. Emmanuel the besieged Emperor wearied with these long Wars, sent an Ambassador to Bajazet to treat with him a Peace; which Bajazet was the more willing to hearken unto, for that he heard news, that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince intended shortly to war upon him. Yet could this Peace not be obtained, but upon condition, that the Emperor should grant free Liberty for the Turks to dwell together in one Street of Constantinople, with free exercise of their own Religion and Laws, unto a Judge of their own Nation; and further, to pay unto the Turkish King a yearly Tribute of ten thousand Ducats. Which dishonourable Conditions the distressed Emperor was glad to accept of. So was this long Siege broken up, and presently a great sort of Turks with their Families were sent out of Bithynia, to dwell in Constantinople, and a Church there built for them; which not long after was by the Emperor pulled down to the ground, and the Turks again driven out of the City, at such time as Bajazet was by the mighty Tamerlane overthrown and taken Prisoner.

Bajazet in the beginning of his Reign, presently after the death of Lazarus the Despot, slain in the Battle of Calvora won part of Servia, (as is aforesaid) the other part being still holden by Lazarus his Son, called Stephen the Despot; who about this time sent an honourable Ambassador to Bajazet with loving Letters, and Royal Presents; by which Ambassador also the old Princess Lazarus his Widow, offered her her fair Daughter Dolima, Stephens Sister, a Lady of incomparable Beauty, in marriage to him, if it should please him to vouchsafe his Hand-maid (as he termed her) to him. To which this Lady was long before presented him, whilst his Father Amurath yet lived. Of this Ambassador Bajazet was very glad, but especially for the fair Ladies sake; which being known to the Princess her Mother, and the Despot her Brother, she was forthwith honourably sent to Bajazet, to be married to him with solemnity and triumph shortly after married. Of all his Wives he held her dearest, and for her sake restored to her Brother Stephen the City and Castle of Semendrar (otherwise called S. Andrew) and Combarbarium in Servia; he allured him to drink Wine, forbidden the Turks by their Law; and caused him to delight in sumptuous Banquets, which his Predecessors, Orkhan, Orchamus, and Amurath, never used.

As the Turkish Kingdom grew in greatness, so Corruption, the Canker of great States and Commonwealths, increased likewise; but especially in the Men of Law, and Judges of his Courts. Wherewith Bajazet grievously offended, commanded divers of the same Judges to be apprehended, determining (to the terror of others) to have executed them; whose dangerous Estate was much pitied, and also favoured of Ala Basha, and the other Kings great Councilors; yet for so much as Bajazet was of a furious Nature, and in his rage was ready to be spoken unto, none of them durst adventure to treat him in their behalf; so not Ala Basha, Cheradya Basha his Son, sometime Judge of Prusa, although he were a man in fish special Favour with him, that he was therefore of the Common People more than reverenced, but as the King himself honourable.

There was at that time in the Court an  Ethiopian Jester, who under some covert pleasant Jest, would many times bolt out that to the King in his greatest heat, which his gravest Councilors durst not once speak to him of in secret; this Jester, Ala Basha, requested to devise some means to treat with the angry King in the behalf of these Judges; promising to give him what he would reasonably desire, if he could appease the Kings Displeasure. The  Ethiopian without fear undertook the matter, and presently putting upon his Head a rich Hat all wrought over with Gold, after the manner of the Turks Embassadors, and fitting himself with other Apparel better becoming an Ambassador than a Jester; thus attired presented himself before the King, with a great counterfeit gravity. Whereat Bajazet marveling, asked him the cause why he was so gay. I have a request unto your Majesty (said he) and wish to find Favour in your sight. Bajazet more desirous than before to know the matter, asked what his request was. If it stand with your pleasure (said the Jester) I would feign go as your Ambassador to the Emperor of Constantinople. In hope whereof I have put my self in this readiness. To what purpose wouldst thou go? (said Bajazet) To crave of the Emperor (said he) some forty or fifty of his old grave Monks and Fryers to bring with me hither to the Court. And what shall they do there? (said Bajazet) I would have them executed (said the Jester) in the rooms of the old doting Judges, whom you intend (as I hear) to put to death. Why (said Bajazet) I can place others of my own People in their rooms. True (said the  Ethiopian) for gravity of looks and countenance, and so would the old Monks and Fryers serve as well; but not so learned in your Laws and Customs of your Kingdom, as are those in your Displeasure. If they be learned (said Bajazet) why do they then contrary to their Learning, pervert Justice, and take Bribes? There is a good reason for that too (said the Jester). What reason? (said the King) That can be that there standeth by better tall than I, (said the Jester, pointing to Ala Basha) who forthwith commanded by Bajazet to give the reason; with great reverence before done, shewed; That those Judges so in displeasure, were not conveniently provided for, and were therefore enforced many times for their necessary maintenance to take rewards, to the staying of the due course of Justice. Which Bajazet understanding to be true, commanded Ala Basha to appoint them convenient Stipends for their maintenance, and forthwith granted their pardon. Whereupon the Basha left under order, That of every matter in suit exceeding one thousand Alpers, the Judge should have twenty Alpers Fee for Judgment; and for every Writing and Infrument out of the Court, twelve Alpers; which Fee they yet take in those Courts at this day.

Not long after, Bajazet in his fury sent for certain of his Captains and Commanders of his Men of War, with whom he was for some small occasion grievously offended, intending in his rage to have put them all to death, which was with him to great manner. These Captains being brought before him, the Counsellors seeing him all in Choler, sat looking on the ground, hanging down their Heads, as the manner of the Turks is, not daring to look him in the Face, nor to speak a good word for them. When suddenly the stoutest Ethiopian Jester stept forth, earnestly requesting the King, not to shew them any favour, but to execute them presently, as Villains and Traitors; railing upon them, as if he had known some great Fault by them. Bajazet thinking he could have accused them of some great Crime, because of his earnestness, asked what reason he had so to exclaim against them. Reason (quoth the Jester) because the Knaves be good for nothing; and they say that Tamerlane is with a great Army coming against us; if you will but take up an Ensign in your Hand, and I go before you with a Drum, I will strike up such a terrible march, and you make such a dreadful shew, that we shall need none of these bad Fellows or their Souldiers in the Field to get the Victory over our Enemies. This conceit of the Jester struck such a melancholy imagination into Bajazet his Head, that he stood musing a great while as it were in a deep study; at last having well considered the drift of the Jesters Speech, and his fury now somewhat assuaged, granted them pardon, which they looked not for.

This  Ethiopian Jester, Bajazet upon a time sent unto the old Queen his Mother, to bring her news of the good success of his Wars against the Christians, for that the had so desired; who coming unto her, was by her commanded to sit down, she began to demand of him, how the King her Son did, and of the success of his Wars. Whereunto he answered, That he did very well, and had won the Kingdom of the Christians a great Country, and greatly enriched his Souldiers. But after a little more talk, the Queen Mother desirous to hear again the good news, (or else after the manner of some, which think nothing sufficiently told, except it be told an hundred times) asked him again, how the King her Son did, and how he sped in his Wars. Whereupon he answered every word as before; but asking him the third time the very same question, how her Son did? Doft thou ask me to offend (faid the Chriftian) how he doth? Be Caepe (O Where, faid he) thou haft brought forth a Son like a Divel, who roaming up and down, doth nothing but burn and deftroy the World where he cometh. Whereat the Queen crying out, up ftarted the Chriftian, and bethinking himfelf to his Heels, was never more afterwards feen.

In the Wars which Bajazet had againft Sigifmund, the Vayvod of Valachia had given aid to the Hungarian King; wherewith Bajazet being offended, determined now at length to be revenged; and therefore intending to make War upon the Valachian Prince, left Tamerslane his great Lieutenant at Anagria in Afia, and fo paffed over Hellefontus himfelf againft the Valachian.

Upon whose departure, Aladin his Sifters Son the young King of Caramania, with a great Power came fuddenly in the night to Anagria, and took Tamerslane Prifoner; who then feared nothing left, than in time of Peace to be fo ftartled, and carried away in bonds into Caramania. But when he understood that Bajazet had ended his Wars in Valachia, and was with Victory returned to Prufia, he fearing his heavy indignation for fo great an outrage, prefently releafed Tamerslane out of Prifon, and appeared to him richly after the manner of that Nation, craved pardon for the wrong he had done him, and fet him at liberty to go whither he would, and withal fent one of his Noblemen with great Gifts and Prefents to Bajazet, to make his excuse in the beft manner he could; unto which Embaffador Bajazet gave in choler no other anfwer, but that he would fuffer him to come in his fight; but at the fame time levied a great Army to invade Caramania. Which Aladin understanding, and now out of all hope to appeafe this mighty Enemy, levied all the Forces he could in his own Kingdom, and withal entertained all the Mercenary Soldiers he could get, intending to try his Fortune in the Field, as a man of Valour, rather than to be thrust out of his Kingdom like a Coward; and fo in readinefs, hearing of the coming of Bajazet, met him upon the way, and at a place called Azeac gave him Battel; but being too weak, he was overcome and put to flight; and fo he fled with a horrid thumping, and he falling to the ground, was there before he could recover himfelf, taken by his Enemies which had him in chafe, and fo brought bound to Bajazet; his two Sons Muhamed Beg and Alia Beg, being taken in that Battel alfo, were fent Prifoners to Prufia. Aladin himfelf was by Bajazet's command delivered to his Enemy Tamerslane, who in revenge of the wrong he had before done him, prefently caufed him to be hanged; which when Bajazet understood, he feemed very forry that he had fo put him to death; for that he was his own Sifters Son. Bajazet following the counfel of his Victory, won Iconium, Larnide, Nigde, with the reft of Aladin his Kingdom. About this time alfo, Amafia the great Metropolitane City of Capadocia, was by the Prince thereof delivered unto Bajazet, being too weak himfelf to defend the fame againft the force of Caf-Burachanidin, Prince of the great and strong City of Schabafia, his Enemy; now grown to be a man of great Power in that part of Afia, and had folicited the Sultan of Egypt to aid him againft Bajazet. Whereupon Bajazet returning from the Conqueft of Caramania, led his Army towards Schabafia, where the Citizens had a little before deprived Caf-Burachanidin of his Government, for his Cruelty, and placed his Son in his ftead; but in fhort time no lefs weary of the Son, than before of the Father, they with like incontinency fent word to Bajazet, That if he would come that way, they would yield unto him the City; upon whose approach, Cafia (his Son) for fear fled out of the City, to Prince Nafiradin his Brother-in-Law. After whose departure, the Citizens according to their promise, delivered the City unto Bajazet at his coming, wherein he left Solyman his eldest Son Governor. And fo having in this notable expedition conquered the Kingdom of Caramania, and taken the great Cities of Amafia and Schabafia, with fome parts of Capadocia, and all that part of Afia which the Turks call Rumelia Afatica, he returned to Prufia and there wintered.

The next Spring, Bajazet hearing that his old Enemy Curran Bajazet Prince of Cafhamna and Pontus, was dead, came to Cafhamna with a great Army; which Isfendar (Curran Bajazet's Son, and then Prince of that Country) hearing, fled out of the City of Synope, a little City upon the coaft of the Euxine; from whence he fent an Embaffador to Bajazet, humbly requefting him, to fuffer him to have that little City, as his Servant to live in, (which he was fure he would otherwife fuffer to be the fame of his Servants) and not to feek the innocent blood of the Son for the Fathers offence. Which his request Bajazet, moved with pity, eafily granted; yet nevertheless took from him Cafhamna, with the greateft part of his Dominion in Pontus, which he gave to his Son Solyman. At the fame time he fent out his Army, which Prince German, and took from him the Cities of Defpoufia and Mitropoli, with all the reft of his Dominion.

The Prince of Menefia, long before driven out of his Country by Bajazet, (as is before declared) and having all this while made his abode at Cafhamna, doubting now of his own fafety, after the death of his good Friend Curran Bajazet, in the Habit of an Hermit fled to the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane.

Bajazet returning to Prufia, there built a magnificent Mahometan Temple; during which work he with great Superftition forbore drinking of Wine, repofing himfelf with the Company of grave and learned men, and the administration of Juftice; whereby he greatly won the Hearts of his Subjects, and had now fo enlarged his Kingdom, that all Kings and Princes bordering upon him flood in great fear of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmet King of Bagdat (or New Babylon), and Ereaceti, with Jefeph Niger King of Calche, enforced with the violent incursions of Tamerlane and his Tartars, for fafeguard of their Lives were glad to flee into Syria: where they being difcovered, were both caft in Prifon by the commandment of the Egyptian Sultan, who then commanded over Syria: from whence they afterwards hardly efcaping, fled to Bajazet's Court. Where after Achmet had ftaid two months, he by the aid of Bajazet recovered the poffeffion of Eiracum part of his own Inheritance. Jefeph the other Mahometan King having tarried in Bajazet's Court eight Months, at length procured him to invade the Dominions of the Egyptian Sultan; in which expedition he mightily prevailed, and having flain the Egyptian Sultans General, and difcomfited his Forces, took the City of Malaty or Maletime in Armenia, with Dirigie, Derende, Derende, and Bezene, taken from the Turcomans, and fpoiled all the Country thereabouts. From thence marching with his Army toward Erzmitzane, the Prince thereof called Tachmetin met him upon the way, yielding him the City and Country into his Power; which Bajazet prefently gave to Jefeph Niger; who after he had fix days enjoyed this new Government, finding the People unwilling to be governed by him a Stranger, furrendered the fame again into the Hands of him that gave it. Whereupon the Citizens of Erzmitzane humbly requefted of Bajazet, That they might be again governed by their old Prince Tachmetin, now his Vaffal. Which thing he at their earneft requeft granted; but taking his Wife and Children as a Pledge of Loyalty, fent them away to Prufia, where they were all not long after made away.

When Bajazet had now many years thus mightily prevailed againft the Chriftian Princes in Romania, Bulgaria, Bofnia, Tieflia, Valachia, and other places of Europe, as is before declared, and inflamed with infatiable Ambition, had in worfe manner oppreffed the Mahometan Kings and Princes of Afia (of whom fome were by him flain, fome driven into exile, fome imprifoned, and otherfome brought into fuch fubjection) that they lived as it were but at his Devotion; and was now grown to that greatness, that in the Pride of his Heart he flood in fear of no man, but was (as he thought) a terror unto the World, having under his obedience great and large Dominions in Europe, but far greater in Afia; it fortuned that divers of thefe miserable and difcontented Mahometan Princes, by great fortune, as if it had been by appointment, to meet together at the Court of the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane, where they were fled for Relief and Succor. The Prince German Ogh, after long imprifonment in the Caffe of Igala in Europe, brake Prifon, and with Hiffar Beg his great Counfellor and Prifon-Fellow, confortd themfelves with a Company of loytring Companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the Country People with their Apish Toys; in which Company he paffed Hellefontus, as a Bearward, and at length with much ado came to Tamerlane his Court; whither the Prince of Menefia was come before in the habit of an Hermit (as is aforefaid) with his Head and Beard flaven; Aladin Ogh paffing through the Country as a Pedlar, with a Pack at his Back, came thither alfo; the Prince Tachmetin as a Servingman, came attending upon the Prince Isfendar; who came alfo, but in fome better fation than the reft, as an Embaffador from fome other Prince. All thefe poor Princes, with divers others in like mifery, in fhort time arrived at Samarand the Great Tartarian Court; every one particularly complaining of his own Private grief, and altogether earneftly requefting that mighty Prince to take upon them their defence, and to revenge the wrong done unto them by the Turkifh Tyrant Bajazet. Whole pitiful complaints much moved the Noble Tartarian; but difpleafed by Nature in the diftreffed, and in relieving of the diftreffed, and chaffing of the proud; but coldly answered thefe Princes, That he could not tell whether all were fo as they had reported of Bajazet, or not; but that he well knew him to be a very zealous King in ferving forth of the Mahometan Religion; and that he had therefore made great Wars upon the Chriftians, in which godly caufe (he faid) perhaps they had refufed to affift him, or elfe had given him fome other greater occafion of offence, to him unknown; For I can hardly believe (faid he) that fo great and religious a Prince as he, would without juft and righteous caufe, do fuch violence as you complain of, efpecially upon your Neighbour Princes, and of the fame Religion with himfelf; nevertheless, whatever I intend concerning your requeft (faid Tamerlane) I will fend firft an Embaffador unto him, to enquire further of him and his proceedings, before I refolve upon any thing; with which anfwer he willed them until then to hold themfelves contented. But as Tamerlane was about to have difpatched his Embaffador to Bajazet, he was advifed, that Achmet late King of New Babylon, and Jefeph King of Calche, both by him driven out of their Kingdoms, having broken out of Prifon from the Sultan of Egypt, were now come to Bajazet's his Court, to crave his aid and affiftance; wherefore he deferred to fend his Embaffador, fufpecting that Bajazet incited by thefe two exiled Kings, would firft in their quarrel begin to make War upon him; and not long after, understanding that they were both again departed from his Court, as is before declared, he then difpatched his Embaffador to Bajazet, with many rich Gifts and Prefents; courteoufly requefting him, the rather for his fake to deal kindly with thefe poor Mahometan Princes, his Friends; as alfo with thofe Tartarian Princes, who were his Allies; for whom he was now become an Interceder unto him. Some report alfo, that he befides this, requefted to have the two aforefaid Mahometan Kings of Bagdat and Calche delivered unto him; and which feemed not a little to diflike of Bajazet his proceedings againft the Turcomans his Friends. But Bajazet being a Prince of a great and haughty Spirit, and unaccustomed to hear of any thing that ftirred not his humor, highly offended with this Embaffage, in great scorn rejected the Prefents by Tamerlane fent unto him, and fpecially certain Garments which Tamerlane offered the manner of thefe Eaftern Nations; and in kindnefs amongst other things fent him; willing the Embaffador to bid his Mafter meddle with his own matters, and to prefcribe Laws unto his own Subjects, and not unto him, with whom he had nought to do; and to fend his Rags for Prefents unto his Inferiors, and not to Princes of greater Power and State than himfelf. Adding thereto many other words full of difpight and diffdain, affording him no better Sile than the plain name of Tamerlane; calling him the Husband of a Whore, if he met him not in the Field; and wifhing unto himfelf again, to take unto him his thrice divorced Wife, after he had been mollified by another man (as the greateft difhonour that might be) if he failed to meet him whereforever he durft to dare him Battel. Which proud anfwer of the Turk, by the Embaffador reported unto Tamerlane, and aggravated by Asalla (a Chriftian of the Race of the Gemawites, born at Capos, and then one of the greateft Counfellors about him, and the Greek Emperors great Friend) was fo evil taken by him, that all other things for apart, he refolved to go againft the Turk, and to take in hand that War, as of all other the

himself for the increase of his Honour and Glory. Besides that, he thought it not in reason fit for the Greatness of the Tartarian Empire, to suffer such an under Neighbour to grow great; as till encroaching upon other the weak Princes confining to him, and adding Conquests unto Conquests; and yet never the more contented, might in the end prove dangerous unto his own Estate and Sovereignty; a common care to such as be themselves great, and mounted unto the highest degrees of Honour to grow, to have in Jealousie and Distrust the fiddling rising of others near or farther off, as perilous or disgraceful to themselves, or their Estate; whose growing Greatness they therefore seek by all means to hinder; as did now the mighty Tamerlane the proceedings and increasing of the great Osman King, Bajazet; and the rather being continually pricked forward to do so, by the sollicitation of the Greek Emperor Emanuel, the other oppressed Mahometan Princes, and by the great Captain Axalla (as is aforesaid) a Christian; of whom for all that Tamerlane himself, a Mahometan, for the great Fidelity, Valor and Virtue he found in him, made no small reckoning, but was contented even in his great and most weighty Affairs to be by him advised, disliking of no man for his Religion whatsoever, so as he did worship but one only God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, and of all that therein is; being himself of opinion, That God in Effusion of his Spirit, made him to be of other change or diversity; yet for the manifesting of his Omnipotency and Power, as he had created in the World sundry kinds of People, much differing both in Nature, Manners and Condition, and yet all framed to the Image of himself, so was he also contented to be of them diversely served, according to the diversity of their Natures and Manners; so that they worship none other strange Gods, but him alone, the Maker and Creator of all things; which was the cause that he suffered the use of all Religions within the Countries subject to his Obedience, were they not meer Atheists, Idolaters, or Worshipers of strange and vain gods.

Neither was proud Bajazet as one ignorant of the Power or Purpose of Tamerlane, in the mean time idle, but still prosecuted his good Fortune for the enlarging of his Empire, and increasing of his Strength; wisely deeming (as the truth was, whatsoever Messages were sent to him from Tamerlane, to be no other than meer Threatenings and Forewarnings of his more dangerous Purposes and Designs against him and his State; which he was so far from fearing as that to provoke him the more, he spared no intemperate Speech, which might move him to Wrath; wishing (as it should seem) for nothing more, than to meet him in the Field, there to try the fortune of a Battle with him. So weak is our foresight of our Fortunes to come, and the reach of our Understanding for the apprehension or declining of the fatal doom even presently hanging over our Heads; as that we overlooking that high ignorance most desirously with for those things which are unto us the chief occasions of our utter ruin and overthrow.

But here before we enter into farther Discourse of the mortal War betwixt these two puissant Princes, it shall not be much from our purpose to stop a little out of the way, to let what this mighty Tamerlane (of whose many Princes craved Aid) was, who living, held the East in such awe, as that he was commonly called, The Wrath of God, and Terror of the World; which he then filled with the glory of his Name. Most Historiographers report him to have been poorly born, of base and obscure Parents; and so himself also in his Youth to have lived as a poor Shepherd, or Herdsman in the Mountains; where comforting himself with other sturdy Companions of like quality and disposition, such as there lived by robbing of Merchants and other Passengers, he became a masterful Thief amongst them; unto whom these such low Mates daily flew more and more resorting, he in due time grew (as they say) to that greatness, that he reported to have been of such power, as never man but he ever yet came unto. A matter almost incredible; for albeit that the Roman Empire, yea and this great Empire of the Turks also, with some others, had their birth and growth much better or greater, the one under Kamulus, and the other under Osman; yet grew they not as on the sudden, in their times to any great lustre (neither was it possible for them of so small beginnings to do so) but by many degrees, and that in long time; every of the succeeding Princes, according to their Fortunes, adding something to their State, before it could be made great; whereas he (by their report) contrary to the course of things both natural and civil (which from their small beginnings grow to no notable perfection or greatness, but by degrees, and that in the long revolution of time) taking his beginning of nothing, grew upon the sudden to be the greatest and greatest unto the World. Wherein our late Historiographers seem too much to have followed the report of the Turks, who by him brought low, and their Kingdom almost in one Battle subverted, report nothing simply of him; but with what they may, detracting from his worthy praises, wrongfully charge him with many untruths, not concerning his Parentage only, but even in the course of his whole life also, making him (as they would have the World to believe) first to have been a very abject among men; and then for his inhumane Cruelty a very Monster in Nature, or (as it was long before, but more truly said of another great one much like himself) a Lump of Earth tempered with Blood. Which incredible Reports concerning so great a Monarch, I list not to follow, as too full of dishonour, especially whereas others of no less credit than they, with far more modesty and greater probability report of him the greatest honour that may be. He was (as they and the others also say) born at Samarcand, the chief City of the Zagataian Tartars, pleasantly situated upon the River Jaxartes; his Father was called Zain Cham, or as some others will, Og, Prince of the Zagataian Tartars, and of the Country of Sachetay (some part of the famous Kingdom of Parthia) third in descent from Zingis, the great and fortunate Leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this History remembered. Which Og, as a Prince of a peaceable Nature (accounting it no less honour quietly to keep the Countries left him by his Father, than with much trouble and the less danger to seek how to enlarge the same) long lived in most happy rest with his Subjects no less happy than himself; not so much seeking after the hoarding up of Gold and Silver (things of that Nation not regarded) as contenting himself with the increase and service of his Flocks of Sheep, and Herds of Cattle, then, and yet also, the principal revenues of the Tartar Kings and Princes; which happily gave occasion to some, ignorant of the manner and custom custom of those Northern Nations and Countries, to account them all for Shepherds and Herds-men; and so also to have reported of this mighty Prince, as of a Shepherd Son, or Herdsman himself; vainly misreading his Nobility by the homely manner of his People and Subjects, and not by the Honour of his House, and Heroical Vertues, such as were hardly to be found greater in any Prince of that or other former Ages. His peaceable Father now well stricken in years and weary of the World, delivered up unto him (not yet past fifteen years old) by Government of his Kingdom, joining unto him two of his most faithful Counsellors, Odmar and Ali, to assist him in the Government of his State (retiring himself unto a solitary life, the more at quiet to serve God, and to end his days in Peace); which two his trusty Sonward and grave Counsellors he dearly loved whilst they lived, and much honoured the remembrance of them being dead. The first proof of his Fortune and Valour, was against the Mulcovite, for spoiling of a City which had put it self under his protection; and for entering of his Country; and for proclaiming of War against him; whom he in a great Battle overthrow, having slain five and twenty thousand of the Mulcovite Footmen, and between fifteen and sixteen thousand Horsemen, with the loss of scarce eight thousand Horsemen, and four thousand Footmen of his own. After which Battle he beholding so many thousands of men slain, upon the ground was so far from rejoicing thereat, that turning himself to one of his Familiars, he lamented the condition of such as commanded over great Armies, commending his Fathers quiet course of life; accounting him happy in seeking for rest, and the other most unhappy, which was the case of him; for even King sought to procure their own glory; protesting himself even from his Heart to be grieved to see such bad tokens of his Victory. With this overthrow the Mulcovite discouraged, sent Embassadors to him for peace, which upon such honorable Conditions as pleased him to set down, was by him granted, and so the Peace concluded. Now the great Cham of Tartaria (his Fathers Brother) being grown old, and out of hope of any more Children, moved with the Fame of his Nephew, after this Victory sent him divers Presents, and withal offering him his only Daughter in marriage, and with her to proclaim him his Son, as he did unto his Empire; as in right he was; being his Brothers Son, and the Daughters not at all succeeding in those Empires. Which so great an offer Tamerlane gladly accepted, and so the marriage was afterwards with great Triumph at the old Emperors Court solemnized; and he proclaimed His apparent unto that great Empire. Thus was Tamerlane indeed made great, being ever after this marriage by the old Emperor his Uncle, and now his Father-in-Law, so long as he lived, notably supported, and after his death succeeding him also in that so mighty an Empire. Yet in the mean time wanted not this worthy Prince the envious Competitors of these his so great Honours; insumuch, that whilst by the advice and persuasion of the old Emperor, he was taking in hand to make War against the great King of China (who had as then gon far beyond his bounds), and so was now gone on onwards in his way, he was by the conspiracy of Calix (a man of greatest Power and Authority in the great Cham his Court) almost thrust out of his new Empire; Calix with a right puissant Army having already seized upon the great City of Cambalu, and the Citizens also generally favouring those his traitorous proceedings, as disdaining to be governed by the Zagataian Tartars. For redress whereof, Tamerlane was enforced with the greatest part of his Army to return, and meeting with the Rebel (who then had in his Army fourscore thousand Horse, and an hundred thousand Foot) in a great and mortal Battle (wherein of the one side and of the other were more than fifty thousand men slain) overthrow him, though not without the great danger of his own Person, as being there himself beaten down to the ground) took him Prisoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Which so dangerous a Rebellion, with the death of the Traitor, and the chief of the Conspirators repressed, and his State in the newness thereof by this Victory well confirmed, he proceeded in his intended War against the great King of China; brake down the strong Wall, which the Chinoises had made four hundred Leagues long betwixt the Mountains, for the repressing of the incursions of the Tartars, entered their Country, and meeting with the King, leading after him three hundred and fifty thousand Men (whereof there were an hundred and fifty thousand Horsemen, and the rest on Foot) in a great and dreadful Battle, with the slaughter of fifty thousand of his Men, overcame him, and took him Prisoner; whom for all that he (in the course of so great a Victory wisely moderating his fury, and showing great regard at liberty; yet so, as that having before taken from him the one half of his Kingdom, and therein left Odmar his trusty Lieutenant, with a sufficient Power for the restraining of the proud King, if he should again begin to raise any new things; and withal imposed such other conditions as pleased himself, within the year after let again three hundred thousand Crows, he well provided for the assuring of those his new Conquests; and so in Triumph returned with Victory unto the old Emperor his Father-in-Law at Cambalu, not a little glad to see both him and his Daughter, who had in all those Wars still accompanied him. But leaving him, now thus by Birth great, by his Fortune greater, but by his Virtue greatest of all, (as able now to draw after him almost the whole Power of the East) let us again return thither from whence we have for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digressed.

The cause why only few have reported him to have been a Shepherd or Herdsman.

The War against the Turkish Sultan Bajazet (as is aforesaid) by Tamerlane resolved upon, he sent Axalla the great Captain to his Country of Sachetay (called of some Zagatay) to give beginning to the assembling of his Forces from all parts; to the end, that with the first of the Spring he might set forward for the relief of so many distressed Princes, and the abating of the Pride of so great and mighty a Tyrant as was Bajazet. Now had Tamerlane procured from the great Tartarian Emperor, his Uncle and Father-in-Law, an hundred thousand Footmen, and fourscore thousand Horsemen, hoping to have as many more from the rest of his own Country, besides the Lords that for his honours sake would accompany him in that his so honourable an expedition, from whom he made account also of fifty thousand men more which they would bring unto him, and divers other great supplies which he expected from other places also; with which he doubted not well to perform what he had so honourably determined to take in hand, for the abating of the Osman Pride; for which and other such like, he was (as he would oftentimes say) by God himself appointed; so taking his leave of the old Emperor his Father-in-Law, and of the Princess his Wife (then left behind him for the comfort of her aged Father,) he departed from Constantinople towards Samarand, the place of his Birth and Seat of his Empire; leaving behind him the Forces brought from the great Emperor his Uncle, to come after him to Osara, where he had appointed the general meeting of his Army. At which time amongst other Princes that thither brought their own Rites, the great Mulcovite being requested to do so, promised to send him fifteen thousand Horse, with a certain sum of Money, and leave for his Army to pass through so much of his Territories as should be necessary; all which he afterwards performed unto Tamerlane, being glad that he did set upon others, rather than upon himself; and that to great a preparation should fall upon them, whose greatness was as dreadful and dangerous unto him as unto any other. All the Earth almost at that time being affrighted at the fuddain greatness of this Osoborn King, and the happy success he had in all his Wars; not the least cause that moved Tamerlane to set himself against him, deeming it much better to go and for upon him in his new Conquests; than to stay until he therein settled, were come nearer to him, and so should debate the quarrel within his own Empire, to his damage. A good and sound resolution; first in that it tended to the destruction of the Enemies part of himself, that if any thing should fall out otherwise with him than well, his Country should not thereby receive any such astonishment as if the danger were nearer or within the Bowels of the same. Now in the mean time that Tamerlane lay at Samarand, Asalla the great Captain and Tamerlane's Lieutenant General, had taken the Army at Osara. Whereof Tamerlane understanding, sent for him to Samarand, to confer with him about the setting forward of his Army. For although he were still accompanied with great renowned Princes, yet were they no body in comparison of Asalla, whose found Counsel Master, as by his advice he did all things, and without him nothing; which his great Authority and Favour with his Prince, wanted not the envy of the Court, but that his great Vertues, and rare found Counsellor (in fo great Fortune) together with so many worthy services as he had done, supported him against the envy of the same. He by the commandment of Tamerlane, leaving the charge of the Army at Osara, with the Prince of Thana, another of Tamerlane's great Captains, came himself to Samarand, and there at large discoursed with him, about the estate and order of his Army. And shortly after, departing with Asalla and the rest from Samarand, for to go to Osara the place where all his Army met; being come thither, entered into a great consultation with his most expert Captains, about the taking of his journey and conducting of his Army; as whether it were better to lead the same by the Coasts of the Mulcovite directly towards Capla, or else on the other side of the Caspian Sea, by the skirts of Perfia; where after long discourse and sundry opinions with their reasons delivered, it was at last resolved (although the way were the longer) to pass by the Mulcovite, so to come to the Georgians, and to Trebizanda, and from thence to enter into the Osoborn King his Country. And fo setting forward from Osara, he came at length to Masoun, where he staid three days looking for the Forces which Prince Osman should send him from Chine, not long before by him conquered; whereof he there received news, and there caused his Army to be paid, and a general Muster thereof to be taken. He had also there news of the aid the Mulcovite did send him; and caused an infinite quantity of Victuals, and most part of his Furniture to be conveyed by the Caspian Sea, being a great commodity and ease to his Army, which marching by Land, was of necessity to pass some twenty Leagues through the middle of both of Victuals and Water. Tamerlane all the way coasting along the Sea shore, passed the time in hunting, his Army not coming near him by ten Leagues, which was fo great, that it extended it fell full twenty Leagues. Coming to the River of Edis, he staid at Zaravich whilst his Army passed the River at Melut, and two other Bridges which he had caused to be made for that purpose. Now the Circassians, and Georgians, hearing of the approach of Tamerlane with his huge Army, by their Embassadors offered him all the help and assistance they could in his journey as he passed that way. These Georgians were and yet are Christians, a great and warlike People, of long time Tributaries unto the Greek Emperors; and afterwards sometimes Tributaries, and sometimes Confederates unto the Persians; but always Enemies unto the Turks, by whom of late (and in our remembrance) but especially by Amurat the Third, they together with some part of the Persian Kingdom, have been grievously oppressed; in the process of this History may appear. Of these warlike People, glad of Tamerlane's coming for the repressing of the Turks, Asalla drew great numbers unto the service of his Prince, who not a little esteemed of them, being all tall men, very beautiful, of great strength, and of great and wilful most expert Soldiers; as having oftentimes redified the Power of the Osoborn Kings, by reason of the advantage their Country afforded them, being very rough and hard to come into. By these kind People, Tamerlane was in every place honourably entertained, and his great Army with all necessities plentifully relieved. In passing through which Country and the rest as he marched, he took such order with his Soldiers, that none of the People whereby he passed, were any thing by them injured; inasmuch that if a Soldier had taken but an Apple, or other thing of like value from any man, he died therefore by his own or other's Commands. It is reported that one of his Soldiers, having taken a little Milk from a Country Woman, and the thereof complaining, he caused the said Soldier to be presently killed, and his Stomach to be ripe; where the Milk that he had of late drunk being found, he contented the Woman, and so sent her away; who had otherwise undoubtedly died for her false accusation, had it not so appeared. Which his fo great severity, and in other like cases, was of many accounted for extreme Cruelty; yet was it indeed the wholesome preservation of his Army, being fo great, as that it was thought almost impossible to have found sufficient Victuals for the relief thereof; whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing else necessary for the use of man, his Camp being still as a most populous and well governed City, stored with all manner of things; whereunto both Artificers and Merchants, from far Countries resorted with their Commodities and Merchandise, as to some famous Mart; and the Country People, without fear from every place brought in their Country Commodities, for which they received present Money; and so in safety again departed.

departed. So marching on, he at length came to Bachibech where he staid to refresh his Army eight days, and there again took a general Muster thereof, wherein were found (as most writers say) four hundred thousand Horse, and six hundred thousand Foot; or as some others that were there present affirm, three hundred thousand Horsemen, and five hundred thousand Foot of all Nations. Unto whom he gave there a general Pay, and as his manner was, made them an Oration, in which he gave them such orders as he would have kept, to the end they might the better observe the same; with much other Military Discipline, whereof he was very curious with his Captains. At which time also, it was lawful for every common Soldier to behold him with more boldness than on other days so much as he did for that time, and such like, lay aside his Imperial Majesty, and shew himself more familiar unto them.

Now could he hardly be persuaded, that Bajazet having subdued the most part of Greece, distressed the Greek Emperors, and fo a great means to recover whatsoever he should desire in Asia, would be so adventurous as to come over the Straits out of Europe, to try the Fortune of a Battle with him; but rather warily protracted the time, to weary him at length with Wants, that in a strange Country drew such a world of People after him. Wherein he found himself much deceived; for having sent his new Conquests, and being come to Bajabich, Asalla (whom he had not seen in eight days before, because he led the Head of the Army) came unto him with such News as the knew would be right welcome unto him; which was, that Bajazet had raised his Siege of Constantinople (as indeed he had) and for to defend his new Conquests in Asia, and that he was certainly resolved, to come to a day of Battle, not fo much trifled, unto the multitude of his Army, as to the Valour and Experience of his Soldiers, being all men of long time well trained up in the Wars. At which unexpected news, Tamerlane greatly rejoiced; yet without insolence or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of such an one as judged the events of Battles to be (as they are) always doubtful; saying sometimes, that a small number well conducted, did oftentimes carry away the Victory from the confuted multitude. Three days he staid at Bajabich, and then ordered his Army to march forward, which at Garga, and Chingis passed over the River Euphrates; which he did the rather to maintain his Army upon the Spoil of the Enemy, in attending his coming, than upon himself, or his Allies. All the Cities that yielded unto him by the way as he marched, he favourably received; the other that refused to submit themselves unto his Obedience, he used with all extremity; especially the great and strong City of Sebahia, where certain of the Fore-runners of his Army were by the Turks there in Garrison cut off and slain, and the Gates of the City as it were in contempt of him, he burnt down; whereupon Tamerlane offended, sent our certain of his Tartarian Horsemen, commanding them on pain of his Displeasure, fo to bear themselves against their Enemies, as that he might at his coming either find the City taken, or the Gates thereof shut against him; for he had his men at fo great command, that he dared not be unto more dreadful than his Displeasure, neither did he punish any thing so severely as Cowardise; inasmuch that if in his disposal of hunting the wild Beast, any did for fear give way to the Lyon or Bear, and flew him not, was sure to die therefore himself; and to turn his Back upon the Enemy, was no less danger than to run upon his own place of New Turks in Garrison at Sebahia, facing the Tartarian Horsemen marching towards the City, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, issued out for to meet them; where they were fo furiously charged by these few Horsemen, that they were glad to retire, and for half their place of their own men out of the City, left the Enemy following them at their Heels, though he entered the Gates together with them. Which Turks fo shut out were by the Tartarians slain at the Gates of the City. Shortly after came Tamerlane with all his Army, and first down before the City, where he lay full seven days, not making them of any violence at all; the Defendants because the City was of great Strength, all that while thinking that he had intended by long Siege to distress the same, and the more because of his long lying still. But about the eighth day, the Walls and Towers of the City in many places undermined, were suddenly overthrown, leaving large breaches for the Enemy to enter. Whereupon the Turks in the City dismayed, forthwith yielded the City to Tamerlane, in hope so to have saved their lives; but he (as the Turks report) being entered the City, commanded a great number of those who were to be digged, and all the People of the City, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition, to be thrown into the same, and there buried quick. Which done, the City was by his commandment utterly raised aloft. After that, calling unto him Malcozesin, the Governor of the City, whom he had for that purpose only desired, he commanded him to go and tell his Master what was happened to his strong City of Sebahia, and what he had there himself seen. Of which tragical action, Malcozesin having made true relation unto Bajazet, as by him demanded, whether of the two Armies he thought bigger or stronger; for now Bajazet had assembled a mighty Army of three hundred thousand men, or as some report of three hundred thousand Horsemen, and two hundred thousand Foot. Whereunto Malcozesin having before craved pardon, answered, that it could not be, but that Tamerlane might in reason have the greater number, for that he was a Commander of far greater Countries. Whereupon proud Bajazet offended, in great choler replied, Out of doubt, the sight of the Tartarian host made this Coward fo afraid, that he thinketh every Enemy to be two.

Most of the Latine Historians report, that when Tamerlane had taken Sebahia, he put all the men to the Sword, and bringing the Women and Children into the Fields, without the City, there over-ran them with his Horsemen, excepting some few which were reserved for Prisoners. As also that Bajazet there lost his eldest Son Ertogrul (or some call Ortobolus) whose death with the loss of the City, fo much grieved him (as is reported) that marching with his great Army against Tamerlane, and by the way hearing a Country Shepherd merrily reposing himself with his homely Pipe, as he sat upon the side of a Mountain feeding his poor Flock; standing still a great while listening unto him, to the great admiration of many, at last jerking a cry, broke forth into these words; O happy Shepherd, which haddest neither Ortobolus, nor Sebahia to lose; bewraying therein his own discontentment; and yet wishing shewing, That worldly Bliss consisteth not so much in possessing of much, subject unto danger, as joyning in a little, contentment devoid of fear. Howbeit the Turks themselves reporting the taking of Scobitia, speak not of Orbiculo at all, but give him loft five years before, in the War against Caffa Barchanides, and lieth buried by his Father, Caffa Prinse. In this City of Scobitia was loft twelve thousand Turks, Men, Women and Children, as their Histories report. The rest of the Cities all the way as Tamerlane marched, warned by the destruction of Scobitia, yielded themselves for fear of like danger: Citizens whereof he courtously used, especially the Christians, whom he set at liberty, in respect of Emmanuel the Greek Emperor, whom he scorned wholly therein to gratify. But he had not gon far into the Turks Dominion, but that he was certainly advertised, how that Bajazet, with a great Army was coming against him, and now within thirty Leagues of him; which caused him after that time, to march with his Army more closely. Asalla leading the Vanguard, sent forth Chianfon Prince of Caracian, with four thousand Parthian Horsemen, to get knowledge of the Turks Army, and where Bajazet lay, as also what Country that was beyond Sennar, and if he could learn any thing thereof, to make relation of it unto him. This Prince of Caracian was Tamerlane near Kinman, a man of great reputation, and next unto Asalla, in whose absence he had the commanding of the Vanguard, his charge; who also sent before him another Parthian Captain with five hundred Horsemen. So he had not ridden ten Leagues but that he heard news of Bajazet coming, and having surprised Sennar, understood there the certain estate of the Turks Army, which was then at Tatais, and so marching forward. Whereof Tamerlane certified, commanded him not to retire from that place, but to did for the arrival of the Enemy, and thereof to give him advertisement every hour; being himself resolved to pass on no further, as come to a fair large Plain, and a Country of advantage for the order of his Battel; for he knew that his Army was far greater than Bajazet's, and therefore he made choice of those great Plains. Yet for that his Army consisted of divers Nations, and wital considering that he was not to fight against the Chinois, a soft effeminate People, (as of late) but against the Turks, a most warlike Nation, and well acquainted with all manner of Fights and Martial Stratagems, he thought it good, to be well advised how he proceeded against them. Wherefore he presently sent for Asalla, with him view the said place, and to have his opinion, Whether it would be for his advantage or not, there to stay? who not misliking of the choice of the place, yet advised him also to keep Sennar so long as he possibly could; and so to fight with them, where they were, upon the approach of the Enemy to let lie upon the fame, and so to withdraw themselves from thence, to the end that the Enemy should not have any desire to incamp there, but come fill forward near to those Plains where Tamerlane desired to fight, especially for that he was stronger in Horse than Bajazet. Thus the Turks fill marching on, thought to have surprised some of their Enemies in Sennar; who as soon as they drew near, retired all, excepting some hundred left of purpose to fire the Town; who having performed the same, retired out of the place in great order. Now the Prince of Caracian had divided his Forces into two parts, and given commandment to the first, that as soon as they perceived the Enemies to pursue the hundred Horse that so disorderly of purpose fled, they should receive them, and fo retire all together. He in the mean time with the rest of his Power stood close in a Valley, near to a Wood file, unseen at all. Where having suffered two thousand of the Enemies Horse (the Vancouriers of the Turks Army) to pass by him, he following them in the tail, charged them home, the other which before retired, now turning upon them also; so that the Turks seeing themselves thus beset, and hardly laid unto both before and behind, as men discouraged fled; in which File most of them were slain, and the rest taken Prisoners. This was the first encounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians; all the Prisoners there taken, were by the Prince as a Present sent to Tamerlane, and among the rest the Bassa of Natalia who led these Troops; of whom Tamerlane earnestly demanded, what caused Bajazet to little to esteem of him, as to flew to great contempt of his Army, which he should find strong enough to abate his Pride. Whereunto the Bassa answered, That his Lord was the Sun upon Earth, which could not endure any equal; and that he rather was astonished to see, how he from to far had engaged so dangerous a journey, to hinder the fortune of his Lord, in whose favour the Heavens (as he said) did bend themselves to further his greatness, and unto whom all the world subjected it self; and that he committed great folly in going about to resist the fame. Unto which to proud a Speech Tamerlane replied, that he was sent from Heaven to punish his rashness, and to teach him, That the Proud are hated of God, whose promise is to pluck down the mighty, and raise up the lowly. As for thy self (said he) thou hast already felt (although I pity thy mishap) what the Valor of my Parthian Horse is against thy Turks; and thy Master has well rewarded me for the service of my Lord. And for refusing to raise his Siege of Constantinople, and to look to his own things here in Asia. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his Speech demanded, If his Master did come resolved to bid him Battel? Affure your self (said he) there is nothing he more desirous and would to God I might acknowledge your greatness, in giving me leave to assist my Lord at that Battel. Good leave have thou, (said Tamerlane) go thy ways and tell thy Lord that thou hast seen me, and that he shall in the Battel find me on horseback, where he shall see a green Ensign displayed. The Bassa thanking him, swore, that next unto his Lord he vowed unto him his Service. And for returning, declared unto Bajazet, how that he had seen Tamerlane and truly reported unto him all that he had willed him to say; not forgetting over all, to publish his Courtesy and Bounty; who besides that he had frankly let him at liberty, had also given him a very fair Horse well furnished, although he well knew he was to fight against himself. Whereunto Bajazet answered no more, but that he would shortly make trial of him, and that he well hoped before the march were ended, to make him acknowledge his own folly. The next day the two Armies drew near together, and incamped within a League the one of the other; where all the night long you might have heard such noise of Horses, as that it seemed the Heavens were full of Voices, the Air did fo rebound, and every man thought the Night long, to come to the trial of his Valour, and the gaining of his desires. The Syrians (a People not so greedy than needy talkers of nothing but the Spoil) the proud Parthians, of their Honour; and the poor Christians, of their deliverance, all to be gained by the next Days Victory; every man during the Night time speaking speaking according to his own humour. All which Tamerlane walking this Night up and down in his Camp heard, and much rejoiced to see the hope that his Soldiers had already in general conceived of the Victory. Who after the second watch returning unto his Pavilion, and there calling himself unto a Carpet, had thought to have slept a while; but his Cares not suffering him so to do, he then as his manner was, called for a Book, wherein was contained the lives of his Fathers and Ancestors, and of other valiant Worthies, the which he used ordinarily to read, as he then did; not as therewith vainly to deceive the time, but to make use thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, and declining of such dangers as they by their Rashness or Over-sight fell into. And afterwards having a little flumbered, he commanded Asalla to be sent for, who forthwith came unto him, with divers other great Lords and Captains the chief Commanders of his Army; with whom after he had a while consulted of the order of the Battel, he mounted on Horseback himself, and sent every one of them to their own Charges, to put the fame in readiness. At which very instant he received News, that the Enemy marched forward, and came to take his ground for the Battel; whole order of march Tamerlane was desirous to see, that so accordingly he might marshal his own. And having called three thousand Horsemen to advance forward, with charge to begin the skirmish, himself followed after to lodge every part of his Forces in such places as he had foreseen to be fittest for his advantage. Now seeing the Tanzaries march in a square Battel in the midst, and upon the two Fronts two great Squadrons of Horsemen, which seemed to be thirty thousand Horse; and another which advanced and covered the Battalion of the Tanzaries; he thought this order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himself to Asalla, who was near unto him, said, I had thought this Day to have fought on Foot, but I see that it behoveth me now to fight on Horseback, to give Courage unto my Soldiers, to open the great Battalion of our Enemies. And my Will is, That my men come forward unto me as soon as they may, for I will advance forward with an hundred thousand Footmen, fifty thousand upon each of my two Wings, and in the midst of them forty thousand of my best Horsemen. My Pleasure is, that after they have tried the force of these men, that they come unto my Vanguard, of whom I will dispose, and fifty thousand Horse more in three Bodies, whom thou shalt command; which I will assist with eighty thousand Horse, wherein shall be mine own Person; having an hundred thousand Footmen behind me, who shall march in two Squadrons; and for my Reward I appoint forty thousand Horse, and fifty thousand Footmen, who shall not march but to my aid. And I will make choice of ten thousand of my best Horse, whom I will send into every place where I shall think needful within my Army, for to impart my Commands. Over the first forty thousand Horse the Prince Caracian commanded; over the foremost Footmen was the Lord Synaps; a Goussie, Kinman to Asalla, and his Lieutenant over the Footmen, a Captain of great estimation; the Prince Asalla his own charge consisted of five Squadrons of Horsemen. Bajazet his Army being also both fair and great, came bravely forth, and forward towards the Enemies; who stirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the Battel; except certain light Horsemen, Scythians, Parthians and Mulgoonies, who sent out as loofe men, hotly skirmished betwixt the two Armies. Now was Tamerlane by an Elyp advertised, that Bajazet having before given order for the disposing of his Army, was on foot in the midst of thirty thousand Tanzaries, his principal men of War, and greatest Strength; wherein he meant that day to fight, and in whom he had reposed his greatest hope. His Battel of Horse was very fair, amounting to the number of an hundred and forty thousand Horse, all old Soldiers. The Sultan of Egypt, having also sent unto his Aid thirty thousand Tanzaries, his principal men of War, with thirty thousand Foot. So that his Army marching all in one Front, in form of an Half-Moon (but not so well knit together as was Tamerlane, whose Squadrons directly followed one another) seemed almost as great as his; and so with injuries in terms of most horribles Outcries still advanced forward; Tamerlane his Soldiers all the while standing still, with great silence.

There was not possible to be seen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks given upon the Prince of Caracian, who had commandment not to fight before the Enemy came unto him; neither could have been chosen a fairer Plain, and where the skilful choice of the place was of less advantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the River on the left hand of his Army, serving him to some small advantage. Now this young Prince of Caracian with his forty thousand Horse, was in his first encounter almost wholly overthrown; yet having fought right valiantly, and entered even into the midst of the Tanzaries, (where the Person of Bajazet was) putting them in disorder, was himself there slain. About which time Asalla set upon them with the Vanguard, but not with like danger; for having overthrown one of the Enemies Wings, and cut it all to pieces, and his Footmen coming to join with him, as they had been commanded, he faced the Battalion of the Tanzaries, who right valiantly behaved themselves for the safety of their Prince. This hard fight continued one hour, and yet you could not have seen any feattered, but the one full resolutely fighting against the other. You might there have seen the Horsemen like Mountains rise together, and infinite numbers of Men die, cry, lament and threaten all at one instant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to see the event of this mortal Fight; but perceiving his men at length to give ground, he sent ten thousand of his Horse to join again with the ten thousand appointed for the Rereward, and commanded them to assist him at such time as he should have need of them; and at the very time time charged himself, and made them to give him room; causing the Footmen to charge also, over whom the Prince of Thomas commanded, who gave a furious onset upon the Battalion of the Tanzaries, wherein was yet the Person of Bajazet, who had sustained a great burden. Now Bajazet had in his Army a great number of Mercenary Tatars, called Defenses, with many thousands of other Soldiers taken up in the Countries of the poor exiled Moslemans Princes; in whose just quarrel, and the Greek Emperors, Tamerlane had chiefly undertaken that War; these Tartarians and other Soldiers, seeing some of their Friends, and other some their natural and loving Princes in the Army of Tamerlane; stricken with the terror of Disloyalty, and abhorring the Cruelty of the proud Tyrant, in the heat of the Battel revolted from Bajazet to their own Princes; which which their revolt much weakened Bajazet's Forces. Who nevertheless with his own men of War, especially the Janizaries, and the help of the Christian Soldiers brought to his aid from Servia and other places of Europe, with great Courage maintained the Fight; but the Multitude and true Valour prevailed; for, as much as might be done by valiant and courageous men, was by the Janizaries and the rest performed, both for the preservation of the Person of their Prince, and the gaining of the Victory. But in the end, the Horsemen with whom Tamerlane himself was, giving a fresh Charge, and his Avantgarde volly knit again unto him, reinforcing the Charge, he with much ado obtained the Victory. Bajazet himself wounded, and now mounted on Horback, thinking to have escaped by Flight, fell into the hands of Almas, unto whom he yielded himself, thinking he had been Tamerlane, who for a face knew him not, but took him for some other great Commander of the Turks. Majsa (surnamed Zelibi, or the Noble) one of Bajazet's Sons, with divers others of Bajazet's great Captains, were there taken also; and amongst the rest, George the Despot of Servia, who notwithstanding this misfortune, had that day gained unto himself the reputation of a great and worthy Captain, inasmuch that Tamerlane even in the very heat of the Battle marvelling to see him and the Servians, with the other Christians which he had brought to the aid of Bajazet, so valiantly to fight, said unto some of the Captains that were near unto him, See he countenance unto himself religious fight; supposing them by their strange Attire to have been some of the Turks superstitious Votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, he was by him courteously welcomed; but yet virtual reproved, for that he had fought for Bajazet against him, who was come in favour to the Christian Emperor, and the other poor oppressed Princes, such as the Despot himself was. Who thereunto boldly answered, That indeed it was not according to his duty, but according to the unwisdom of Bajazet, unto whom it seemed that all the World did bend; and that his own fidelity had caused him, though against his Will, to take part with him. Whereupon Tamerlane held him excused; and so without more ado gave him leave at his own pleasure to depart.

Bajazet also himself being afterwards brought unto Tamerlane as a Prisoner, and by him courteously entertained, never showed any token of Submission at all, but according to his proud Nature, without respect of his present state, presumptuously answered him with whatsoever he demanded. Wherewith Tamerlane moved, told him, That it was now in his power to make him to lose his life. Whereunto he answered no more, but, Do it for that, that loss should be his greatest happiness. Tamerlane afterwards demanded of him, What made him so proud as to enterprise to bring into his Subjection to Noble a Prince as was the Greek Emperor? he answered, Even the fame thing that hath moved thee to invade me, namely the desire of Glory and Sovereignty. But wherefore then (said Tamerlane) dost thou use to great cruelty towards men thou hast overcomen, without respect of Age or Sex? That did I (said he) to give the greater terror unto my Enemies. And what wouldst thou have done with me (said Tamerlane) had it been my fortune to have fallen into thy Hands, as thou art now in mine? I would (said Bajazet) have included thee in a Cage of Iron, and so in triumph have carried thee up and down my Kingdom. Even so (said Tamerlane) shalt thou be served. And so causing him to be taken out of his presence, turning unto his Followers, said, Behold a proud and cruel Man, he deserveth to be chastised accordingly, and to be made an Example unto all the proud and cruel of the World, of the just Wrath of God against them. I acknowledge, that God hath this day delivered into my Hands a great Enemy; to whom we must therefore give thanks. Which he performed the same day; for the Battle was won at four of the Clock, and there was yet five hours of day-light. The next day Tamerlane commanded the dead to be buried; where among the rest they found the body of the Prince of Circass, dead in the midst of the Janizaries, where he lay inclosed with their dead bodies, in token he died not unrevenged; whose unclimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented, for he was his Kinsman, and like enough one day to have done great service. Whose dead Body Tamerlane caused to be embalmed, and with two thousand Horcs (and divers of the Turks Prisoners chained and tied together) to be conveyed to Semercand, until his coming thither. All the other dead Bodies were with all honour that might be, buried at Semercand.

This great and bloody Battle fought in the year of our Lord 1397. not far from the Mount Stella, (where sometime the great King Mitridates was by Pompey the Great in a great Battle overthrowen) was fought from seven a Clock in the Morning, until four in the afternoon. Victory was that day wholly, as it were with double Wings, hovering over both Armies, as uncertain where to light; until at length the fortune of Tamerlane prevailed. Whose Wisdom, next unto God, gave that days Victory unto his Soldiers; for that the policy tying of the strong Forces of Bajazet, was the safeguard of his own; whereas if he had gone unto the Battle in one Front, as surely the multitude finding such strong resistance, had put it self into confusion, whereas this successive manner of aiding of his men, made them all unto him profitable. The number of them that were in this Battle slain, is of divers diversly reported; the Turks themselves reporting, That Bajazet there lost the Noble Mahmud's Son, with two hundred thousand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer; and some other speaking of a far less number, as that there should be slain of the Turks about threecore thousand, and of Tamerlane's his Army not past twenty thousand. But leaving the certainty of the number unto the credit of the Reporters, like enough it is, that the Slaughter was exceeding great in so long a Fight, betwixt two such Armies as never before (as I suppose) met in Field together.

By this one days event is plainly to be seen the uncertainty of worldly things, and what small assurance even the greatest have in them. Bajazet, the terror of the World, and as he thought, superior to Fortune, in an instant with his fate in one Battle overthrowen into the bottom of misery and despair; and that at such time as he thought leave, even in the midst of his greatest Strength. It was three days (as they report) before he could be persuaded, but as a desperate man still seeking after death, and calling for it; neither did Tamerlane after he had once spoken with him, at all afterwards courteously use him, but as of a proud man caused him account to be made of him; and to manifest that he knew how to punish the haughty, made him to be shackled in Fetters and Chains of Gold, and to be shut up in an Iron Cage made like a Grotto, in such sort as that he might on every side side be seen; and so carried him up and down as he passed through Asia; to be of his own Power scorned and derided. And to his further disgrace, upon Festival days used him for a Footstool to tread upon, when he mounted to Horse; and at other times scornfully fed him like a Dog, with crumbs fallen from his Table. A rare Example of the uncertainty of worldly Honour, that he unto whose ambitious mind Asia and Europe, two great parts of the World, were too little, should be now carried up and down cooped up a little Iron Cage, like some perillous wild Beast. All which Tamerlane did not do, much to his hatred to the man, as to manifest the just judgment of God against the arrogant Folly of the Proud. It is reported, that Tamerlane being requested by one of his Noblemen that might be bold to speak unto him, to remit some part of his Severity against the person of so great a Prince, answered, That he did not use that Rigor against him as a King, but rather did punish him as a proud ambitious Tyrant, polluted with the blood of his own Brother.

Now this so great an overthrow brought such a fear upon all the Countries possessed by Bajazet in Asia, that Asakia sent before by Tamerlane with forty thousand Horcs, and an infinite thousand Foot, without delay, to prosecute the Victory came without resistance to Prusa, whither all the remainder of Bajazet's Army retired, with the Bassa Mahmud, the Country as he went still yielding unto him. Yea, the great Bassa with the rest hearing of his coming, and thinking themselves not now able to stand against such a great Strat of Ellipantia to Caspia, and so to Hadracopia, carrying with them out of the Battle, Solyman, Bajazet's his eldest Son, whom they fit up in his Fathers place; Mahmud his younger Brother presently upon the overthrow being fled to Asakia; of whom, and the rest of Bajazet's his Children, more shall be said hereafter. Asakia coming to Prusa, had the City without resistance yielded unto him, which he stiled; and there with other of Bajazet's his Wives and Concubines, took Prisoner the fair Dopsia, Bajazet's his best beloved Wife, to the doubting of his grief.

Enacted the Greek Emperor now hearing of Tamerlane's coming to Prusa, sent his Embassadors (the most honorable of his Court) thither before to Asakia, by whom they were there staid until the coming of Tamerlane, who received them with all the Honour that might be, showing unto them all his magnificence, and the order of his Camp, to their great admiration; for it resembled a most populous and well governed City, for the order of his Wars, which brought unto it plenty of all kind of Victuals and other Merchandises, as well for pleasure as for use. By these Embassadors the Greek Emperor submitted all his Empire, together with his Person, unto Tamerlane the great Conqueror, as his most faithful Subject and Vassal; which he did for the sake of his life, for that he was by him delivered from the most cruel Tyrant of the World; as also for that the long journey he had passed, and the difformities he had endured, with the loss of his People, and the danger of his Person, could not be recompensed but by the offer of his own Life and his Subjects; which he did for to dedicate unto his Service, with all the Fidelity and Loyalty that so great a benefit might deserve; besides that, his so many Vertues and rare Accomplishments, which made him famous through the World, did bind him to do so. And that therefore he would attend him in his chief City to deliver it into his Hands as his own, with all the Empire of Greece. Now the Greek Embassa-dors looked for no less than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane; thinking that which they offered to be so great and delicate a Morfel, as that it would not be refused, especially of such a conquering Prince as was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindness and Friendship, was the best bargain they could make therein. But they received answer from this worthy Prince, far beyond their expectation; for he with a mild countenance beholding them, answered them, That he was not come from so far a Country, or undertaken so much pain, for the enlargement of his Kingdom, as to make himself a slave, to be a thing for him to put himself into great danger and travel for; but rather to win Honour, and thereby to make his name famous unto all Posterity for ever; And that therefore it should well appear unto the World, that he was come to aid him, being requested as his Friend and Ally; and that his upright meaning therein was the greatest cause, that God from above had beheld his power, and thereby bruised the Head of the greatest and fiercest Enemy of mankind that was under Heaven; and now to get him an immortal name, would make free to great and flourishing a City as Constantinople, governed by so noble and ancient an House as the Emperors; That unto his Courage he had always Faith jeyned, such as should never suffer him to make so great a breach in his reputation, as that it should be reported of him, That in the colour of a Friend he came to invade the Dominions of his Allies; That he desired no more, but that the service he had done, should be to the Greek Emper, might for ever be engraven in the Memory of his Posterity, to the end they might for ever with well unto him and his Successors, by remembering the good he had done them; That long night the noble Emperor live, happily to govern his Estate; and that before his return he would take care to consider for the relieving of the same, as that he should not lightly fall again into the like jeopardy, always assuring himself of his good Will and Favour towards him. Lastly it is to judge what Joy these Greek Embassadors received, to hear this so kind an answer from the mouth of Tamerlane himself; who rather than he would seem to break his Faith, refused an Empire offered unto him, with one of the most stately and magnificent Cities of the World. Few Princes (I suppose) would perform such a part; but so there be likewise but few Tamerlanes in the World. These Embassadors by this commandment of Tamerlane, were by Asakia Royally bidden, and all the next day after, they might be seen. One of them being first back to carry these unexpected news unto the Greek Emperor, filled both him and all the City of Constantinople with exceeding joy and gladness, which both he and his Subjects in general shared not with Bonfires and all other signs of Joy and Pleasure to manifest him of the Joy that he showed his goodness, shortly after by the advice of his grave Counsellors, passed over the Strait into Asia, to see Tamerlane at Prusa, and in Person himself to give him thanks; who hearing of his coming, and very glad thereof, presently upon the first days journey fed the Prince Asakia to meet him, and to satisfy him of the Joy that he conceived to have the good hap for to see him, as also to conduct him to Prusa; where those two great Princes, with the greatest magnificence that might be, met, and so spent one whole day together. The Greek Emperor the next day taking his leave, was by Tamerlane with much Honour conducted out of the City. Now had Tamerlane had himself conceived a secret desire to see this famous famous a City as was Constantinople, from which he was not now far, yet would he not go thither as a Conqueror, but as a private person; which by the means of Asalla was accomplished, and he thenceforth by the Greek Emperor privily received, and with all Familiarity possible entertained; the Emperor shewing unto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be seen; and the other Greek Princes desiring all the means they could to do him pleasure, and them which did accompany him; who were in a manner all appalled after the Greek Fashion. At which time the Greek Emperor himself was curious to shew unto him all the fair Gardens along the Sea Coast, a League or two from Constantinople, and so privately conducting him, spent five or six days with all the Mirth that might be possible; Tamerlane by the way oftentimes saying, That he had never seen a fairer City, and that it was indeed the City (considering the fair and rich Situation thereof) of right worthy to command all the World. He wondered at the costly Buildings of the Temples, the fair ingraven Pillars, the high Pyramids, and the making of the fair Gardens; and oftentimes afterwards said, That he had nothing repented him of his so long and dangerous voyage, if it had been only but to have perferred from Fire and Sword to noble a City as that was. In the Greek Emperor he commended greatly his mild Nature and Courteise; who knowing him above all things to take pleasure in fair serviceable Horses, gave unto him thirty, and amongst them, some of richly furnished; and sent likewise fair Presents unto all the Princes and great Commanders of the Army, and bountifully caused to be delivered unto them all things which he thought to be necessary for the Army. So after many great kindnesses in short time passed, and a true bond of Friendship made by solemn Oath confirmed betwixt the two great Princes, Tamerlane with great contentment took his leave of the Emperor, and returned again to his Army at Prusa. Wherewith he now at his pleasure without resistance waisted and spoiled all Bajazet his Dominion in Asia, no man daring to make head against him.

The year being now well spent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane dispersed his Army into divers of the Provinces of the lesser Asia, expecting till when some of Bajazet his Sons or other Friends should make suit or means unto him for his deliverance, but none came; none fearing Tamerlane his heavy indignation, and other not less dreading the fierce Nature of Bajazet himself, who if he had been delivered, was like enough (as was thought) to have taken sharp revenge upon all them which forsook him in the late Battle; and therefore never made intercession for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day passing by him, said unto him, I marvel that none of thy Sons or Friends either come to see thee, or to intreat for thee, it must needs be that thou hast evilly deserved of them, as thou hast of others; yet how thinkest thou, if I should for thee at liberty, would they again receive thee as their Lord and Sovereign, or not? To whom Bajazet boldly answered, Were I at liberty, thou shouldst well see, how that I would neither Court nor means to revenge all my Wrongs and to make those disobedient and forgetful to know their Duties better. Which his proud answer, made Tamerlane to keep a straighter hand over him.

In this great and bloody War, wherein the Osman Empire had almost taken end, the Sultan of Egypt had (as is aforesaid) given aid unto

Bajazet; which Tamerlane took to be evil part, as that he relolved to be thereof revenged; for as he was unto his Friends of all others most kind and courteous, so was he to his Enemies most terrible and dreadful. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the lesser Asia, to take some good order with these his new Conquies; and finding nothing more honourable to refuse upon, he restored unto the poor Mahometan Princes (Tachutin, Isfendiar, German, and the rest before he led him for refuge) all their ancient Inheritance, with something more; as he did also divers Cities and Countries of Natalia unto the Greek Emperour, for the yearly Tribute of four hundred thousand Ducats of Gold, and eight hundred thousand Flocks of Silver, which the Emperor promised to pay unto him yearly. And so having enriched his Army with the Spoils of the Osman Empire in Asia, he turned his Forces against the Egyptian Sultan, and so passing through Assyria, entered into Syria, then part of the Sultan's Kingdom; where near unto Aleppo (being before yielded unto him) was fought betwixt them a great and mortal Battle, the Sultan having in his Army an hundred thousand Foot, and seventy four thousand Horse; whereof there were thirty thousand Adamlukes, account the Horse of Egypt and men in the World. In which Battle Asalla the great Captain, with the Vanguard of Tamerlane his Army, was hardly distressed, and Asalla himself taken; but forthwith again rescued by Tamerlane; who had he not by his coming on with new Forces, speedily restored the Battle, cunningly outbraced by Asalla, that was not enough to have made an end of his good Fortune. But the Victory after a long and cruel Fight (wherein were fourscore thousand men on both sides slain) inclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane pursuing him by the space of three Leagues. After which Victory, Tamerlane dividing his Army, sent Asalla with forty thousand Horse and fifty thousand Foot to pursue the Sultan along the Coast of Arabia; who oftentimes shewed himself with some four thousand Horse to have hindered Asalla, who having the smallest Forces, followed him the nearest.

Tamerlane himself in the mean time, with three score thousand Horse, and an hundred thousand Foot, marching along the Sea Coast, had all the Cities as he went yielded unto him; as Magata, Aman, otherwise called Apamea, Torissae, Barrusa, and Nephthalin; only the strong City of Damascus refused to receive him, whereinto the Sultan had put the Prince Zamaden, with a strong Garrison, who did what he might to have defended the same; But all in vain, for Tamerlane having by Battery overthrown a great part of the Wall, by Assault won the City, only the Castle yet remaining, as being of a wonderful Strength, and almost impregnable; whereinto such a multitude had at the taking of the City retired themselves, as was not possible there to live long; who in short time pinched with Hunger, and many of them dead, the rest upon safeguard of their Lives offered to yield; whom for all that Tamerlane would not receive to mercy, to make them feel what it was to hold out against him; so that most of them dying of Famine, the rest yielded without Condition, and were for their Obstinacy almost all slain. With which Serenity towards them of Damascus, caused that thirty Leagues off they brought the Keys of their Cities unto him, in token of their Submission; whom he no way molested, more than in contributing unto the charge of his Army. From Damascus, he turned directly towards Jerusalem, at which time time they of the City had driven out the Sultan's Garrison, as had almost all they of Judea, submitting themselves unto Tamerlane. At Chebrasin the Sultan had left six thousand men in Garrison for the defence of the place, who at the first seemed to stand upon their Guard; but afterwards dismayed to see so great an Army before it, and that Tamerlane having approached the Walls, was set down to have it, they submitted themselves and found mercy. In which City Tamerlane left certain of his men in Garrison for the better keeping of the Mamelukes, who with often incursions troubled his Army. So marching on, he himself with certain Horsemen for his Guard, rode to Jerusalem to visit the Sepulchre so much revered of all Nations, and there to make his Oblations; where he was of the Inhabitants joyfully received, and having sought out all the Antiquities of the ancient City, would be conducted unto all the places thereabouts, where Jesus Christ had preached, even as the Pilgrims do; and coming to the Sepulchre, gave thereunto, and the devout there, many rich and precious Gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to see him honour those holy places) but of the Jews only, who greatly blamed him for so doing; of whom of all others, Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accursed of God. There had he news that the Sultan had gathered all his Forces, and being come into Egypt, was fortifying of his Cities, especially the great Cities of Andria and Cairo. Tamerlane his Army in the mean time by his commandment came towards Egypt to Damiat; which strong City he thought not good to leave behind him, although he was by some persuaded, as well in respect of the Castle, as of the strong Garrison that the Sultan had put therein; but he, whose Fortune nothing could hinder, would needs go thither; and so having commanded Asalla to set upon it, followed himself after with the rest of his Army. Now Asalla having summoned the City, and declared unto the Inhabitants (who were most of them Christians) the mildness and courtesie of Tamerlane, as also who himself was, and what Religion he held; causing many of the Greek Captains to speak unto them, and to tell them of the misery they endured under the Mos and Mamelukes; to be prevailed with them, that they all determined to adventure their Lives, to put the Mamelukes out of the City, with all them that favoured the Sultan. And so in the night taking up Arms, made themselves Masters of one quarter of the City, and delivered one of the Gates to Asalla; whereby he entering put all the Mamelukes to the sword, or took them Prisoners, and so gained the City. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, being as yet upon his march, was in good hope of so prosperous a beginning, to find an happy end of all his Designs in Egypt. For besides the good Fortune thereof, he knew that this Haven of Damiat might serve him with Victuals out of all the parts of Greece; as the Emperor Emanuel had promised him, and wherein he nothing failed him. Into which Port Tamerlane having made his entry, left there in Garrison two thousand of the Emperor Emanuel his Soldiers, with a Governor, of whom he took an Oath for their Obedience. So having staid a space at Damiat, he caused his Vanguard to march towards Alexandria; and having passed over the River, even in an instant turned directly unto Cairo, to the great astonishment of the Sultan, who made provision for the defence of Alexandria, as the nearest unto danger.

But understanding of these news, used such diligence, that he entered into the City with forty thousand Horse, and three score thousand Foot, even as Tamerlane his Army approached, purposing in Person himself to defend it. By whose coming the great City ready before he was revolted, was again in his obedience confirmed; to the great hindrance of Tamerlane his Affairs; for to remain long before it, was impossible, for so many Victuals for so great an Army in the Enemies Country. Yet notwithstanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbear to draw near unto it, and with all his Army to encamp near unto the same, having caused a great Trench to be made for to cover his Horsemen, and thereby to lodge his Army more safely; during which time he caused divers onsets to be given, as well to try what confidence the Enemy had in himself, as to see how the People of the City, especially the Slaves (which in that populous City are infinite) were affected towards him; who certainly informed him of the state of the City, and the Army; as glad to see the same by him shut up, and the proud Mamelukes fill put to the worst. But thus lying still at the Siege, one day he thought it good to shew his Army before the City, to try whether the Enemy had a desire to come to a day of Battle or not; as also to view what Forces he had, and so indeed to seek occasion to fight; in hope also, that if the Sultan came forth with all his Army into the Field, some revolt might happen within the City, as well by the Slaves (unto whom Liberty was him promised) as by the Citizens themselves (discontented with the infolency of the Adamlukes entered of late into the City with the Sultan) unto whom he had made it known by certain Slaves (for that purpose sent as Fugitives out of his Army into the City) how that he was not come to hurt them, but only for the destruction of the Mamelukes, both his and their Enemies. But betimes standing so in Battle array, no man came forth, neither was there any tumult or stir raised in the City, as he had expected. For the Sultan in so great a City well provided of all things, was resolved to weary him out with lying still, and not to put all to the hazard of a Battle. Which Tamerlane perceiving, and set down not to depart from thence, but victorious, resolved likewise to force him even in his greatest Strength, in the Heart of his greatest City; although it were not to be done, but with great adventure; such confidence he had in the Strength and Multitude of his Army. Now his purpose was, first to take one of the Cities (for Cairo is divided into three) and therein incamping himself by little and little to advance forward as he might, till fighting with the Enemy. Upon which resolution, he began his Footmen to be given, and having bidden his Footmen to give the onset (for the City was not walled, but only fortified with Ditches and Trenches) he commanded the Prince of Thamais with fifty thousand Footmen to begin the Assault, even in the performed, and the most valiantly fought Fight, Asalla in the mean time, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greatest Forces to the place where the Prince of Thamais fought to enter, as unto a place of greatest danger; set a compass about, and upon another quarter of the City, with final resistance passed the Trenches; where he presently left thirty thousand men to fill up the Ditches, and to make way for the Horsemen to enter; advancing forward himself, against twenty thousand sent by the Sultan to have stopp'd his further passage; the Prince of Thanaus being at that time almost beaten back by the Mamelukes. But the way being made plain, by them that were for that purpose left by Asalla, and ten thousand Horse entered, which charged upon the Backs of the Mamelukes, where the Sultan himself was; and they seconded by ten thousand more sent in by Tamerlane, following himself at the Head of his Strength, which he had made in the next City. The Fight endured full the space of seven hours; wherein were slain of the Sultan his men above sixteen thousand; and of Tamerlane betwixt seven and eight thousand. Who contented to have dislodged the Enemy, and gained a third part of the City, caused a Retreat to be founded in hope the next day to win all the rest, as indeed he did. For the Prince of Thanaus the next day forcing the Enemies Trenches in one place, and Asalla in another, the Sultan after a great Fight finding himself hardly pressed by the obstinate Enemy, and too weak long to hold out, retired, and forthwith abandoned the City, and encamped himself along the side of the River Nilus, with purpose to pals the Tame, and to flee to Alexandria his second Strength and Refuge. Which Tamerlane suspecting, followed after him with his Horsemen (who only were in order), and when their Heliots were in spilling; so as he was glad to promise them especially, to regard and reward their good service. Against whom the Sultan upon a narrow Causeway, had opposed twelve or fifteen thousand men, whom he called his Slaves (to favour his passage) but were in fact dead his best Soldiers, and flood fast, the place forcing greatly for their advantage; who for at that length forced by their Enemies, still increasing upon them, (though not without great loss) cast themselves into the great River, and made a most honourable Retreat; every man having his Weapon in the one Hand, and some mingling with the other to the further Bank. The Sultan flying with some eighteen thousand Horse (for the rest were sundry waies fled or dispersed) is reported in his Flight to have comforted his men, by telling of them, that they were not men that had vanquished them, but that they were men that had great Wisdom, Force, and appeared in them to be great Warriors, and Valour; divers of the Mamelukes taken in the late Fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him courteously used, were of him demanded, if they could be content to serve him, now that their Master was fled and gone? which they all utterly refused; where notwithstanding for their Fidelity, Tamerlane gave them liberty to go again to their Sultan; as no less desirous to be admired of his Enemies for his Bounty and Courtesy, than feared for his Force and Valour. The wonderful Wealth of this great and famous City became a Prey unto his Soldiers; who for the space of four and twenty hours had the Spoil thereof, every man being then by open Proclamation commanded to repair to his Quarter. The Citizens he let at liberty, not suffering any of them to be taken Prisoners; and to leaving ten thousand good Soldiers, with a great number of others (whereof he carried a great multitude in his Army, planting every where as he passed as if they were new Colonies) and carrying away from him such of the Inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things necessary for the keeping of such a City, he caused his Army to pass over the River for to follow the Sultan to Alexandria, to the end not to leave his Victory unperpetrated; Asalla having before with the Avantgard, for to hinder the Sultan for joyning his Forces again together, and the rest of his Army conducted by the Prince of Thanaus; he himself with an infinite number of Boats and Soldiers to attend upon him, going by Water, taking great pleasure to behold the fair River, and his swift course sometimes; and in an instant to become so calm as if it scarce moved. The Citizens of Alexandria hearing of his coming, and fearing what might betide them, besought the Sultan to have compassion of their Estate, and to withdraw himself into Lybia, whither Tamerlane for the Barrenness of the Country could not with any great Power follow him; resolved for their parts to give place unto Fortune, and to do as the time required, and no more to resist so great a force, whereof they had already made sufficient trial; promising yet to remain in Heart till his, and upon the first occasion offered, to make the same to him appear. Whereupon the Sultan seeing all things desperate, determined for a time to retire, in hope, that time would bring some change; as also that Tamerlane his populous Army would not long remain there. And so departing out of Alexandria with tears standing in his Eyes, offending his People, and was angry with him and his People, and that he must of necessity suffer the fatal overthrow of his Estate, himself having done as much as in him lay, according to his Charge and the Expectation the World had of him; and yet that he hoped at length to return again, and deliver his People from the Bondage, whereunto they must now needs submit themselves. Tamerlane coming to Alexandria (before yielded to Asalla) there staid a great while, sending Asalla to pursue the Sultan, exceedingly grieved that he could not get him into his Hands; and therefore still fearing some innovation to be by him raised, which caused him to deal the more hardly with them whom he suspected to favour him. Now the bruit of these Victories having with Asalla passed beyond Alexandria into Lybia, had brought such a fear, not only upon the People adjoining unto these Conquests, but also upon all Africa (they supposing that Tamerlane did follow) that two and twenty of the Moor Kings sent their Embassadors unto him, to offer unto him their Obedience; the Sultan as a man forsaken of Fortune, still flying before him. Of the nearest of which Kings Tamerlane took Hottages; as for the other farther off, he contented himself with their Faith given, and with the other outward signs of their good Wills.

Now after this long travel and pains taken, was Tamerlane more desirous than he had before used, to see the pleasures of his own Native Country; the rather thereunto moved by the request of his Wife, then longing for his return; and the News he heard of the Sickness of the old Turkish Emperor his Father-in-Law; besides that, Age it self began to bring unto him a desire of rest; with whom also, the desires of his Soldiers well agreed, as men now weary to have run so many and divers Fortunes. The only stay was, that he expected for the coming of Calicut, an old and faithful Servant of his, whom he for his good desert had of his own accord appointed Governor of all his new Conquests in Egypt and Syria; a great Honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had so well deserved. So mindful was he of the good desert of his faithful Servants, as that he needed not by others to be of them put in remembrance, brance, were they never so far off, as was now Calicut, who at this time was with the third part of his Army making way for him along the great River Euphrates, for the Conquest of Mesopotamia, and Perfia; whose coming was now with great devotion looked for of the whole Army, desirous to return. Which their expectation he long delayed not, but being sent for, came to Alexandria, whither the whole Army was now by the commandment of Tamerlane again assembled. Upon whose coming, Tamerlane departed from Alexandria, having there left the Prince Zamalek (a man of great reputation) with six thousand Horsemen, and six thousand Foot, as Governor of that place, and Lieutenant General under Calicut; whom Tamerlane (as I have said) had now appointed to command over all Egypt and Syria, together with the Countries newly conquered in Lybia and Barbary; and now conducting him unto the great City of Cairo, and there taking the best order he could for the preservation of his new Conquest, left him with forty thousand Horse and fifty thousand Foot. And so having sufficiently instructed him how he would have those Kingdoms governed, dismissed him, not like a Master, but as a Companion, seeming very sorry to leave him destitute of his presence. So setting forward with his Army, conducted by the Prince of Thanaus, Tamerlane himself, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aside unto Jerusalem; Where he remained eleven days, daily visiting the Sepulchre of Christ Jesus (whom he called the God of the Christians) and the ruins of Solomon his Temple; much wondering thereat, and at Jerusalem, the Seat of David Kingdom, and of that great Solomon; but grieved that he could not see them fully in their former Beauty. He only despoiled the Jews, which had committed so cruel a Murder against him that came to save them. And to show his devotion towards the Holy City, commanded it to be free from all Subsidies and Garrisons of men of War; and gave great Gifts unto the Monasteries, and honoured them so long as he remained there. Departing from Jerusalem, he came to Damascus; which great City, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of Jesides (accounted an arch Heretic among the Mahometans) as also evil affected to his proceedings, he caused to be rased, and the Bones of Jesides the false Prophet to be digged up and burnt, and his Grave before much honoured, in despite to be filled with Dung. So marching on, and blasting the World before him as he went (for long it were and from our purpose, to recount all his Victories) he passed over the River Euphrates, and having conquered Mesopotamia, with the great City of Babylon, and all the Kingdoms of Perfia, laden with the Spoil of the World, and extorized for ever, he returned at length to Samarand, the famous place of his Birth, and glorious Seat of his Empire.

Now had Bajazet (but a little before one of the greatest Princes on Earth, and now the scorn of Fortune, and a By-word to the World) with great with patience lain two years in most miserable Thraldom, for most part shut up in an Iron Cage, as some dangerous Wild Beast; and having no better means to end his loath'd Life, did violently beat out his Brains against the Bars of the Iron Grate wherein he was inclosed, and so died about the year of our Lord 1399. Yet of his Death are divers other Reports; some saying, that he died of an Ague, proceeding of Sorrow and Grief; others, that he poisoned himself; and the Turks affirming, that he was set at Liberty by Tamerlane, being by him before-hand poisoned, whereof he dyed three days after he was inclosed (a Report not like to be true); but howsoever it was, his end appeareth to have been right miserable. His dead Body at the request of his Son Mahomet, was by Tamerlane sent to Aspraphia, from whence it was afterwards conveyed to Prusa, and there lieth buried in a Chapel near unto the great Mahometan Temple without the City Eastward; where also lieth his beloved Wife Deflane, with his eldest Son Ertogrul. And lastly in a little Chapel lieth buried his Brother Tacup, whom he in the beginning of his Reign murdered.

These two great and mighty Princes, Tamerlane and Bajazet, (both of them whilst they lived, a burthen to the World) as they took their beginning from the Scythians or Tartars, so were they of like honourable Progenitors descended; Bajazet being the fourth in descent from the Warlike Osman, the raiser of his Family; and Tamerlane in like degrees from the great Zingis, the first and most fortunate Leader of the Tartars (his Countrymen) unto the pleasures of the East; both Princes of great Power and like Spirit; wild, hardy, painful, resolute, and most skillful in Martial Affairs; but ambitious above measure, the ground of all the former troubles by them raised, to the astonishment of the World. Howbeit, the great Vertues and other the honourable qualities of Bajazet, were in him by his choleick and warlike Nature much obscured; which made him to exceed both in Cruelty and Pride; being also much more hand-fast than were his honourable Predecessors. For which causes he was much feared and less beloved of his Soldiers and Men of War in general, and of them at his most need forsaken; He used commonly to say, That his Treasures were his Childrens Meat, and not his Soldiers Pay; which by way of reproach was a Common Soldier cast in his Teeth, when he rag'd to see himself by them forsaken in the great Battle against Tamerlane; telling him as he fled, that he ran not away, but went to seek his Pay, wherewith to provide his Children Bread. Whereas all the aforesaid Vertues in Tamerlane were graced with divers other of like Nature, no man being to his Friends more courteous or kind, either unto his Enemies more dreadful or terrible. The good service of his Servants he never forgot, either left the same long unrewarded; being thereof so mindful, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalf, to be put in remembrance thereof; having always by him a Catalogue both of their Names and good Deserts, which he daily perused. Oftentimes saying that day to be lost, wherein he had not given them something; and yet never bestowing his Preferences on such as ambitiously sought the fame (as deeming them in so doing unworthy thereof) but upon such as whose Modesty or Deserts he thought worthy those his great Favours; so tempering the Severity of his Commands with the Greatness of his Bounty, as that it is hard to say, whether he was of his Nobility and Men of War, for the one more feared, or for the other beloved; both of the greatest of Princes States; Fear keeping the Obstinat in Obedience and Love, the Dutiful in Devotion. But with

with Bajazet it was not so, who deeming all done for him but Duty, and by Nature cholerick and proud (after the manner of Tyrants) desired above all to be of his Subjects feared, not much regarding how little he was of them beloved; not the least cause of his great fall and misery, and that therein he was of his own so finally regarded; wherein for all that he is to be accounted more fortunate than the other great Conqueror his Enemy, having ever since in the lineal descent of himself, had one of the greatest Monarchs of the World to succeed still in his Kingdom and Empire; as he hath even at this day. Whereas the glory of Tamerlane his Empire, even in his own time grown to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatness of it self, and by him divided amongst his Sons, shortly after his death decayed, rent in sunder by Ambition and Civil Difcord; and not long after, together with his Posterity, rooted out by Uzun-Casim the Perfian King, to the World's wonder, took end; nothing of the huge greatness thereof now or since then remaining, more than the fame thereof; as doth also the misery of the other so brought low. But leaving this mirror of mishap (Bajazet) unto his rest, and Tamerlane for a while to triumph in Samarcand; let us now proceed in the course of our History, yet not forgetting by the way to remember such Christian Princes as then lived together with these two great Monarchs.

MAHOMET,

Fifth King of the Turks,

And RESTORER of their fore shaken Kingdom.

*Vindicibus Mahomet patrium sibi vindicat armis Imperium, et fractas feruidus augeat opes.
Quod patri abstulerat violentia Tamberlani, Imperio reddidit Marte favente suo.
Ille sagittiferosque Dacos, validosque Triballes
Contudit, et populos iter amane tuos.
Turcica sic rursus sublata potentia stragem
Attulit imperio. Romule magne tuo.*

*His Fathers Throne by chance, of War impair'd, Bold Mahomet, with gallantry repair'd,
That from the Father Tamberlane had won:
Was wrested from him by the valiant Sonne.
The Davians, and the Servians strength he broke,
And thou (fair iter) feltst the dreadfull Stroke:
Prosperity to the Turkish State is come,
And now great Romulus attend thy doom.*

*Divers opinions concerning

How wonderfully the Turkish Kingdom was by the Violence of Tamerlane shaken, and the Majesty thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Histories of that time, as well those of the Greeks, as of the Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the Successors of Bajazet, their late unfortunate King. Some writing, that he had two Sons, Orchanes (otherwise called Calepinus) and Mahomet; and that Calepinus in the second year of his Reign was slain, and his Kingdom possessed by Mahomet his Brother. Others reporting, that Bajazet had two Sons, namely, Calepinus and Musapha; and that Calepinus succeeding his Father in the Turkish Kingdom, when he had reigned six years, died, leaving behind him two Sons Orchanes and Mahomet; and that Orchanes being young, was slain by his Uncle; whom Mahomet in revenge of his Brothers death, afterwards slew, and possessed the Kingdom himself. Others reckon up seven Sons of Bajazet: Jofua, Musulmanes, Mafes, Calepinus, Jofua the younger, Musapha and Halas; with an uncertain Succession amongst them also. This diversity of Opinions, full of no less uncertainty; as I mean not to follow in report of this History, so will I not spend any time in refuting the same, although much might be said in the matter, but leave these Reports, together with the History following, to such credit as they shall hap to find with the considerate Readers.

The Greek Historiographers (best like to know the Turkish Succession, as well by reason of their nearness, as in that they were by them as their bad Neighbours, so much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Historie Musulmana Turcorum, diligently gathered out of the Turks own Histories by Jo. Leunclavius (a learned Physitian, and himself a great Traveller amongst them, and therefore deserving the more credit) do not so much as name the Succession of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the Captivity of Bajazet, but rejecteth them both as Counterfeits. But in my opinion (without prejudice to any, that upon better reason may deem otherwise) the great confusion of the Turkish Kingdom, in short time wrought by the mighty Tamerlane and his Tartars, with the civil Discord and War afterwards arising among the Sons of Bajazet, striving all as it were at once, for the restless room of Sovereignty, which suffereth no Partners; and every one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand upon some one part or other thereof, and bearing himself therein for a time as King, in Countries so far distant; never leaving, until they had like the Earth-born Brethren, wrought one anothers destruction; might give just occasion of such diversity of Reports as is before spoken of, concerning the Succession of that time, in that troubled and rent Kingdom; some reckoning one, some another; and some, such as never were, to have succeeded in the Government, and so truly augmenting the number of the Turkish Kings. Wherefore leaving Calepinus and Orchanes unto them that first found them, with that little, which without any good ground and less probability is written of their supposed Reigns; I (following the authority of the Turkish History) reckon this Mahomet one of the youngest Sons of Bajazet (of whom we are now to treat) Fifth King of the Turks; who after great and dangerous Wars as well against his own Brethren, as his foreign Enemies; was at length solely invested in the Turkish Kingdom, about ten years after the Captivity of his Father Bajazet, as shall hereafter be declared.

Bajazet after the manner of the Turkish Kings, having laid up the hope of his Pottery in the common Treasure-house of Nature, rather than in the body of one lawful Wife, had by divers Wives and Concubins seven Sons, Ertoghul, otherwise called Orkhanides, Emur-Solyman, Musapha-Zelebi, (that is to say, the Noble) Jofa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Cafan-Zelebi. Of whom Ertoghul the eldest was lost in the Wars against Caf Burchanden, as is before said in the life of Bajazet. Musapha was slain in the great battle against Tamerlane, and there buried in the Bed of Fame. Cafan the youngest was a Child in Bajazet's Court, when his Father was taken, and afterwards with his sister Fatime delivered as Hostages, by their Brother Solyman, unto Emanuel the Emperor of Constantinople, where they both happily became Christians, and so shortly after died.

Solyman was by Alius Bassa President of Bajazet his Council, and other great Captains, conveyed out of the battle against Tamerlane, into Europe, and so by them at Hadrinople saluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the same battle to Amasia in Capadocia, where he was in his Fathers time Governor. Jofa hearing of his Fathers Captivity, after the departing of Tamerlane with his Tartars, settled upon Prusa a City of Bithynia, the ancient Seat of the Turkish Kings, with the Country adjoining, and there reigned as King. Musapha-Zelebi was taken Prisoner with Bajazet his Father, and afterwards fed at liberty by Tamerlane. But of their Fortunes more shall be said in this History following.

Mahomet

Mahomet
General
of Armia.

Mahomet was but fifteen years old when his Father Bajazet in the unfortunate battle of Mount Stella was taken Prisoner, and was at the same time by his appointment Governor of Amasia, with a great part of Capadocia adjoining; which places became so troublesome after the great Victory of Tamurlane, that the Turks in that Country were glad day and night for the favour of themselves, their Wives, and Children, to keep continual Watch and Ward; inasmuch that many of them wearied with those Troubles, and desiring of better Times, went into voluntary Exile, because they were not free from Grievances; which thing much grieved young Mahomet. Wherefore calling unto him his most faithful Counsellors, to consult what course to take in the midst of so many dangers, it was by general consent thought best (for so much as they could not without apparent danger continue near unto Tamurlane's Forces), to get themselves further off into places of more strength, and from thence to expect the departure of their Enemies, and in the mean time to content themselves with such advantages as occasion and chance of War might minister; cutting them thence by policy, whom they were not able to meet in the plain Field, and so by little and little to weaken or weary their mighty Enemies. For albeit that Tamurlane himself was not near him, as then lying in Caria; yet did the Captains of his great and victorious Army, at their pleasure spoil and forage the Countries far and near all over the lesser Asia. Upon this Resolution he with all his Forces departed from Amasia, to Dady in Phrygia; where by reason he was incommode with Caria Fabia a young King-friend to the Prince Lisandrus of Cassimonia, his Enemy; whom he put to flight with great slaughter of his Men. This was the beginning of Mahomet's good Fortune. From thence he went to Kereken, and there staying certain days, sent a Spy into Tamurlane's Camp, to see how all things went there; and afterwards entered again into their Council with his Captains, concerning his further proceedings. In which Consultation some were of opinion, That it was best for him to withdraw himself into the Mountains of the lesser Asia, as a place of good safety, until the departure of Tamurlane, which was shortly hoped for; for that it was not to be thought that Tamurlane would with his huge Army pursue him in that Mountain-Country, lying from Hill to Hill, and as it were from strength to strength. Others better advised, thought those Mountains to be no places to trust unto, and therefore that it were more honourable, and as free from danger, for him to return again to Amasia, thence to live amongst his Subjects, proceeding then in their sort as he might, and not to leave them to a prey to every stragling Company of the rude Tartarians; which counsel he followed, as most reasonable; and being ready to set forward, the Spy returned by him sent into Tamurlane's Camp, returned, certifying him that he had seen his Father Bajazet in good health in the Tartars Camp, but could not by any means speak with him, by reason of the straight Guard set over him; and that all that part of Asia was by Tamurlane possessed, who then with his Army wintered in Caria and Licia; whereupon Mahomet returned back again into Amasia; where he had not long fled, but that News was brought unto him, That one of the Tartarian Princes called Caru Dulet (which is to say, the fortunate black King) was with an Army of twenty thousand coming to spoil his Country, being given him by Tamurlane. With which News he was exceedingly troubled; wherefore with all speed calling together his Forces for the safeguard of his Country, sent before a Spy to discover the Enemies' doings. This diligent Spy returning in all haste, told Mahomet, That Caru Dulet lay at the Town of Asigul in Galaria, in great security, having about him but a small Force; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time dispersed his Army, to seek after Pillage abroad in the Country. Mahomet taking hold of this opportunity, marched thither with great celerity, and suddenly setting upon Caru Dulet, overcame him. In which conflict Caru Dulet himself was thro' through the Heart with an Arrow and slain, and his Army utterly discomfited. Mahomet returning back to Amasia with Victory, refreshed and rewarded his Souldiers, yet no less careful for the safety of his Kingdom than before.

Shortly after, he was advertised that Cubad Oglu with a great Army laid siege to the City of Cesaria in Capadocia, and was like in short time to take it, if it were not speedily relieved. By taking of which City, that Tartar Prince was like to make a great Entrance, to the hazzarding of the whole Country. Wherefore Mahomet having his Army always in readiness, marched day and night with such speed to Cesaria, as that he was upon Cubad Oglu before he was aware of his coming, and there flew most of his Souldiers, and put him with the rest to flight. After that, he returned into Cubad Oglu's his Country in Pontus, and grievously spoiled and destroyed the same; at which time he also by force won the strong Castle Pelie in the Confines of Phrygia.

Immediately after that, Inal Oglu another of Tamurlane's Captains (which at their pleasure without let foraged all the Countries of the lesser Asia, during the time that Tamurlane made his abode within the Turks Dominions) upon the sudden entered into Capadocia with an Army of twenty thousand fighting men, killing the Inhabitants, and spoiling the Country before him; so that the people for fear left their dwellings, and fled into the Woods and Mountains to hide themselves from his fury. Whereof Mahomet hearing, was therewith exceedingly grieved, and wrote unto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, unto the Prince Inal Oglu.

Whereas without any just or lawful Cause, or any War proclaimed, you have invaded our Kingdom, and cease not cruelly to kill our Subjects, to spoil our Cities; but Pretending a name to live Wealth and Labours, to the great disturbance of the Mahometan Commonwealth; and make no end of your malice and cruelty; you do therein quite differ from the Manners and Laws of the true Mahometans, or right Believers. For if thou wouldst not only be accounted, but indeed be a true Muslim-man, thou shouldst forthwith depart out of my Kingdom with some Army; then shouldst thou immediately return, or without cause thus wrong my people; but forasmuch as thou knowest not what belongeth thee, neither wilt listen unto good Counsel, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpose, falsely persuading thyself, that my Kingdom to be despoiled of a lawful Inhabitant, and therefore dost I great Wrong and Injury unto the Defenders of true Religion; I would thou shouldst know, that I with my so often Victorious Army will shortly by the Power of God come against thee, and in plain Field, according to thy desert, chastise thee. Therefore whilst thou art maist, reclaim thy Self, and proceed not too far in thine obstinacy.

Caru Dulet slain.

Inal Oglu his answer to Mahomet.

obstinacy; too late Repentance did never man yet good. Thus much We thought good to advise thee, that thou shouldst not be ignorant of Our purpose, but mightest so better consider and dispose both of thy self and thine affairs. In the year after the departure of the great Prophet Mahomet 806.

Unto which Letters Inal Oglu returned this Answer in writing:

Prince Inal Oglu, to Mahomet.

Why dost thou Mahomet with such Letters threaten me, being thy self but a Boy, and in truth a very Child? It belongeth thee not to have entered into these Countries, or to lay hands thereon, wrongfully grasping thyself with the Title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cause why thou shouldst complain, that I should be in wait or seek after thy Life, thy Kingdom, or any thing that thou art. I challenge unto my self this Kingdom, but none of thine, one of which is it reason for thee, as a wrongful intruder of thy self, to depart; whom otherwise I will forthwith thrust out, and join the same unto the rest of my Territories. Wherefore except thou without delay get thee packing, and cease to oppose thyself against my designs, I denounce unto thee all the Cruelties of War, and with thee will proceed to prepare thy self to battle, for that I mean shortly to meet with thee. This year of our great Prophet, 806.

Inal Oglu ever thrown by Mahomet.

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promise meeting with this Tartar Prince, by plain force overthrew him, and had of him a notable Victory.

The like good hap he had also not long after, against Coslu Oglu and Kusku Oglu, two other Tartarian Captains, at the Battle of Cheba-chisar and the Plain of Aruck-Oza. And hearing that one Majlus a Turk, had fortified himself in the Ruins of Schafnia, and from thence spoiled the Country round about, he sent Bajazet one of his Baffians against him; who in short time took him and brought him bound unto him; by whom he was adjudged to die. But seeing in the man an invincible courage, and contempt of death at such time as he should have been executed, moved thereon he gave him his pardon, for which he ever after continued unto him faithful, and did him great Service.

Mahomet having many times thus vanquished the stragling Tartarian Princes, which had fought the spoil of his Country, became thereby famous amongst the great Commanders of Tamurlane's Army; inasmuch that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamurlane's Ear, yet lying in the lesser Asia; who as he thought it not worth his Greatness and Labour, himself in Person to go against so great an Enemy; so he thought it not good or convenient quite to neglect him, but by some other means (if he could) to overcome him. For which purpose he began to name many times very honourably of him, highly commending his great valour and forwardness in so tender years. And calling for Bajazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his Son Mahomet, and that he was therefore very desirous to see him; where if he found that true which was reported of his great Vertues, he would bestow one of his Daughters upon him in Marriage, with many other great Preferences; and therefore willed Bajazet to write unto him, Nor to doubt to come unto him, to the great good both of himself and his Father. Which thing Bajazet at the first doubting the worth, requested Tamurlane not to believe that of his Son, being yet so young, and not worthy of so great a Favour. Nevertheless partly perwaded by Tamurlane's Protestsations, and importuned by him that might now command him; he with an evil will wrote to his Son Mahomet to such effect as Tamurlane required. With which Letters, and letters of like purport from himself, with many rich Presents, Tamurlane sent Hozza Mahomet (one of his secret Counsellors) Embassador to Mahomet, of whom he was right honourably received, and likewise entertained. But having read the aforesaid Letters, and thereby understood the cause of his coming, he entered into Council with the great Baffians about him, whether he were left to go to Tamurlane or not. Where his Counsellors were all clear of one Opinion, that it was not good for him to adventure his Person to the danger of such a Journey, or the mercy of so mighty an Enemy, of whose Faith he had no assurance. And if he (said they) should go, the thing which will by force seek to have you, we at his coming will take the refuge of the Woods and Mountains, and there shroud our selves until he be departed again; for that he with his huge Army cannot here long stay in this bare Country, for want of Necessaries. Nevertheless Mahomet hoping that his Journey might be to the good of his Father, and his own Advancement; contrary to the mind of all his Counsellors, resolved to go; and so having prepared all things needfull for the honour and safety of his Journey, set forward. But as he was upon the way in the Matches of Pontus, Caru Fabia whom he had before overthrown, by the hearing of his coming that way, thinking now to be revenged, and having got unto some of the Prince Lisandrus's Forces, set upon him by the way; but with as evil Success as before, most of his Men being there by Mahomet slain, and himself glad shamefully to fly. So travelling on further, he understood that Alu Beg, a great Lord in those Countries, went about to intercept him also; which caused him in such haste to go on, that he was upon Alu before he was aware of his coming, or well provided for him; so that for fear he was glad to betake himself to flight. Mahomet considering the danger he had escaped in that Journey, and that he was now come to Tamurlane, the more like he was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamurlane's knowledge; by the advice of his grave and faithful Counsellors, resolved to go no further. Wherefore calling unto him Tamurlane's Embassador, he thus spake unto him:

You see the Dangers and Injuries I endure in this Journey, and my mind forbiddeth greater to ensue; for which cause I pray not you any further, but here return: Commend me therefore I pray you unto the most mighty Tamurlane, with my Father; and tell them what dangers have happened unto me upon the way, which considered, I hope they will have me excused. For which purpose I will also send in your company an Embassador of mine own.

Mahomet at that time had with him a grave, wife, and learned Man, called Sophis Bajazet, sometime his School-Master; whom he sent Embassador to Tamurlane and his Father, to have him unto them both excused; and so departed he homewards, leaving the way he came (for fear of further danger) and they towards Tamurlane, who honourably received Mahomet's Embassador and Letters. But taking pleasure in the man sent unto him, gave him honourable Entertainment, but would never after suffer him to return again unto his Master.

The great Tamerlane

Egypt.

It was not long after, but that old Bajazet died of impatience (as is aforesaid) whose dead body Tamerlane left at Arpops, with the Prince Germes, to be delivered unto his Son Mahomet; with Adia his elder Brother (who all this while had been kept Prisoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet should require them. And to the mighty Prince Tamerlane, after he had long time waited Phrygia, Caria, Lydia, with the most part of the lesser Asia; and conquered all Syria, Judea, Egypt, and Perth, with many other great Countries and Provinces, returned at last into his own Kingdom, unto the great City of Samarand, which he wonderfully enlarged, and beautified with the Spoils of a great part of the World, before him waited; where he afterwards in great Peace and Glory reigned, no less honoured than feared of all the Princes of the East. To the terror of whom, and for the affuring of his Estate, he kept always a standing Army of forty thousand Horse, and threecore thousand Foot ready at all places; beside other his great Garrisons which he kept in Syria, Egypt, China, and Cambrala; as also against the Moscovites, and Turks, being commonly in every place threecore thousand strong, though not still in field, but as occasion required. Until that at length hearing of the rising again of the Turkish Kingdom, under the Ottoman Princes, the Sons of Bajazet, with whom the oppressed Mamelukes of Egypt, and the Greek Emperors (and doubtless of Asia) had now also for fear of him combined themselves; he by the persuation of Asalla (then General of his Imperial Army) made great preparation for a second Expedition to be made for the utter rooting out of the Ottoman Family, and the Conquest of the Greek Empire. But having now all things in readiness, and also given a good beginning unto these his intended Conquests, (one of the great Turks Baffles being by Asalla his Lieutenant in a great battle overthrow, and thirty thousand of the Turks slain) he in the midst of these his great hopes, as also of his greatest Power, died of an Ague the 27th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1402. A little before whose death, appeared a great and terrible Blazing-Star, portending as it were to the World the death of so great a Prince. He was a man of a middle stature, somewhat narrow in the shoulders, otherwise well limbed, and of a great strength. In his eyes shone such a rare Majesty, as a man could hardly endure to behold them without clotting of his own; and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him became dumb; which caused him oftentimes with a comely modesty to abstain from looking too earnestly, such as spake such a him, or discomfited with him. All the rest of his Village was amiable and well proportioned; he had but little hair on his Chin; and wore the hair of his Head long and curled, contrary to the manner of the Tartars, who have their Heads, having the face always covered; whereas he contrariwise was for the most part bare headed, commanding his Son also to be so by his Tutors brought up; his hair was of a dark colour; somewhat drawing toward a Violet, right beautiful to behold; which his Mother coming of the Race of Sampson (as he gave it out) willed him to nourish, in token of his descent; the cause that made him to be so much respected of his Men of War; most part of them believing that in those hairs was some rare virtue, or rather some fatal destiny; an old practise of many great Commanders of former Ages, to fill the heads of their Soldiers with some strange Opinion conceived of them, to be the more of them honoured; as if in them had been some one thing or other more than in other men.

This great Empire by himself divided betwixt his Sons, was by their discord, and the ambition of some of their disloyal Subjects, in short time after brought to great confusion, and his Posterity utterly rooted out by Ufyn-Cajames, the Armenian Prince, as in the process of this History may appear. But to return again to our purpose; Mahomet delivered of his greatest fear, by the departure of Tamerlane out of those Countries, determined to go to Prusa in Bithynia, where his Brother Ila as then reigned; but understanding that Ila had before taken the Straits whereby he should pass the Mount Horminus, he took another way about, and came to Pado-Caffas, where the valiant Captain Eimelech Sub-bajazet then remained; who with all honour and gladness received him, and there for certain days refreshed both him and his Army. Afterwards greater Forces still repairing unto him, he marched thence to Ulakad, called in ancient time Lopadum. Of whose coming Ila before understanding, and having assembled his Army, marched thither also, and encamped on the other side of the Town towards Prusa, ready to give him battle. But Mahomet seeing his Brother so forward, consulted with his Captains what were best to be done; where Eimelech Sub-bajazet a man of great experience, and of late one of his great Councilors and Captains, told him, That it was not for their Honours, being Brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others blood; but to assay if the quarrel might by some other good means be compased, and they made Friends. For which purpose, Mahomet presently sent Letters unto his Brother Ila, concerning the partition of their Fathers Kingdom in Asia betwixt them: offering unto him the Provinces of Adidia, Saruchania, Germania, Charsia, Choramania, with other Countries to them belonging; so that he might have Prusa with all other Provinces about the same. Which Letters, when Ila had read, and saw that Mahomet offered him but Titles for Kingdoms, and such Countries as were rather sometimes Tributaries unto their Father Bajazet, than any part of his Kingdom, and now of late by Tamerlane again reformed unto their ancient Liberty and Governors, shaming out the best and strongest part thereof unto himself, he brake forth into choler and said:

What, dost my Fathers Kingdom of right belong unto me being the elder Brother? Mahomet is yet of Ila but a Youth, and scarce exempt out of the swill; by what right then can he claim my Fathers Kingdom as his Inheritance? If he can by the Sword win it, let him take it, and so hold it.

Mahomet having received his Answer, prepared himself to the field, where his Brother as ready as himself stood expecting his coming; and having first Army in order of battle, gave the first Charge; which was the beginning of a most cruel and bloody fight, wherein, as it commonly falleth out in doubtful Battles, many were on both sides slain. At last the fortune of Mahomet prevailing, Ila his Army began to retire; which he seeing, left nothing undone for the encouraging of his fainting Soldiers, which belonged to a poltroon General, or valiant Slave to do so; but pressing into the thickets of his Enemies there with his own hand flew the ancient and valiant Captain Eimelech Sub-bajazet, who had many times been General of the Footmen in old Bajazet his Wars. But what prevaileth courage against evil fortune? Ila must either fly or die. And therefore having done what he could in so desperate desperate a case, being himself on every side forsaken, in the end was glad himself to fly to the Sea-side; where finding a Ship ready bound for Constantinople, he passed over thither in safety, and there yielded himself unto the Protection of the Greek Emperor Emanuel. In this chafe Mahomet his Soldiers took the valiant Captain Temurais Prisoner, another of Bajazet his great Commanders, and brought him to his great Brother Mahomet; who in revenge of the death of Eimelech, commanded his Head presently to be smitten off, and his Body to be hanged upon a Tree by the High-way side. Of this Victory, Mahomet certified his Brother Solyman at Hadrinople, and in token thereof sent him many of his Head. This battle was much spoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two Brethren; and also for the death of the two famous and old Captains Eimelech and Temurais, who both together as loving Friends had fortunately fought many great battles under Bajazet his Ensigns; and now as it were by predestiny, and against their wills, without any private grudge, were both drawn into contrary Factions and slain; both whilst they lived withing a good Peace betwixt the ambitious Brethren. But as the Turks like to say, What is by God written in a mans forehead before his Birth, cannot in his life be avoided.

After this Victory, Mahomet thinking himself now in full possession of all his Fathers Dominions in Asia, led his Army to Prusa, where he was of the Citizens joyfully received as their Sultan; and for his great bounty, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to Nice, and so to Negropolis, and there reformed unto him all the Garrisons of Carafina, Saruchania, and Adidia, with other the Inhabitants of those Countries, with all Loyalty submitting themselves unto him, with such Honour and Reverence as belonged to their King.

All things thus sorting according to his desire in Asia, he sent to the Prince Germes for the Body of his Father Bajazet, and for his Brother Musa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This Body was by the same Prince at the request of Mahomet, with great Solemnity sent to Prusa, and there sumptuously buried, with all the Turkish Obsequies and Ceremony, being read seven days upon his Tomb. All which time great cheer was kept for all Commers, and much given to the Poor (upon the Turkish devotion) for Bajazet his Soul; but above all others, exceeding bounty was extended to the Posterity of their Prophet Mahomet, which are known from others amongst the Mahometans, by the colour of their Apparel, which is all green, and not lawful to be worn of any but of them; so that they were by the bounty of Mahomet, at that time greatly desired. He also endowed the Abbey which his Father had there lately built, with great Lands and Possessions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the Solemnity past, he went in Progress to all parts of his Kingdom, and was in every place joyfully received; and so afterward returned to Amasia; and there in great pleasure spent the Summer. Where we will see a while leave him, to see what Solyman his eldest Brother in the mean time doth at Hadrinople.

Solyman the eldest Son of Bajazet (who kept his Court at Hadrinople, there peaceably Reigning all this while over the Countries which his Father Bajazet sometime possessed in Europe) hearing what his Brother Mahomet had done, and how violently against all Right he had driven

Ila out of Prusa, and made him glad to fly to Constantinople; was with this his outrageous dealing much offended, and thereupon calling unto him his Baffles and faithful Counsellors, declared unto them the unnatural proceedings of Mahomet against his Brother Ila. Wherein (said he) he doth me also great wrong in taking upon him the Sovereignty over those great Dominions and Countries in Asia, which of right belong to me his elder Brother, and not to him the youngest of six. In revenge of which Injury and Wrong, I intend in mine own Right, to pass over into Asia with a strong Army, and by force of Arms to recover mine inheritance there, if I may not otherwise come to it. Unto which Speech one of his grave Counsellors replied, That in his opinion it was not the best course for himself to go in Person into those Wars. For although (said he) your Brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatness left accounted of; yet is his Prime great, and his experience above his years. None have yet had to do with him, but they have had enough of him; yet it is worth the noting, how politically he hath bin himself for his own safety, and the safeguard of the Countries which he governed all the while that the great and mighty Tamerlane with his innumerable Forces covered the face of the Country full by him; most part valiant. Mahomet hath now since his departure, again recovered. Wherefore it were best for you to send for your angry Brother Ila, to Constantinople, and to make him General of the Army you intend to send into Asia against Mahomet. In which War, it is not unlike, but that one of your Brethren will be lost, whereby you shall have one Competitor of your Kingdom the less. So shall you afterwards with less trouble subdue him that is left, or at leastwise please him with some part of that which they have so mightily feared from this. This Counsel was of Solyman and all the rest well liked of, and approved. So was Ila presently sent for unto Constantinople, and a great Army levied. Who being come to Hadrinople, was by Solyman courteously welcomed, and made General of his Army; and therewith shipped over the Strait of Helluspontus into Asia. Where at his first coming, he possessed the whole Country of Carafina or Lydia; and passing further; in all places where he came, was received of the people with great Reverence, they all promising him their Obedience, if it were his fortune to prevail against his younger Brother Mahomet; wherewith he held himself well contented. So coming to the City of Beg-Racer, otherwise called Deopolis, he there wintered with his Army. In which time, he wrote many kind and loving Letters still directed to Mahomet as his younger Brother, seemed to be glad that he was so well obeyed and liked of by his Subjects; and that presuming of his Love and Favour, he was as his loving Brother, and not as an Enemy come into Asia to intrate with him in such matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diffimulation answered, That he was right glad of his coming; for which he needed not (as he said) to make any excuse, for that he was entered into a Kingdom, in part his own, and the rest open before him; in token whereof he commanded a rich Garment to be cast upon the Messenger as a favour, finding also divers rich Presents unto his Brother, with great Provisions of Victuals, and other necessities for his Soldiers.

But Winter past, and the Spring come, Ila marched with his Army to Prusa; and there shewed unto the Citizens the loving Letters he had at sundry times before received from Mahomet; and telling them that he was in good hope that they should in short time right well agree; requelted to have the Cattle delivered unto him, sometime their Sovereign; whereinto the better fort of the Citizens had retired themselves, and made fast the Gates against him; but when he saw that he could by no fair words or policy gain the possession of the Cattle, enraged with that repulse, he set fire upon that goodly City, and burnt it down to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his Brother Ifa roamed up and down his Kingdom, using all kindness to such as yielded unto him; and exercising no less cruelty upon such as refused his Obedience; and now that he had rased the Royal City of Prusfa; having gathered a strong Army, marched in ten days from Amasia to Prusfa, and by the way meeting with his Brother Ifa, in a great battle overthrew him with all his Forces. Ifa himself accompanied with no more than ten persons, fled unto Castamona, Prince Ispendiar his City; who hearing of his arrival there, entertained him with all the Honor he could in recompence of the great Friendship he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble Suitor in his Father Bajazet his Court.

Mahomet coming to Prusfa, grieved exceedingly to see that fair City so destroyed; yet to comfort the poor Citizens, he gave exceeding Sums of Money to be bestowed amongst them, and took order for the new building of the City, and there continued certain days himself to see the Work begun.

Ifa in the mean time having incited the Prince Ispendiar in his quarrel to invade his Brother Mahomet, and going thither himself in Person, was by him now the third time overthrown and put to flight. Nevertheless he with some small Forces twice afterwards entered into Mahomet's Dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his evil Fortune, was glad at last to fly to the Prince of Smyrnia, by whom he was both honourably entertained, and comforted.

This Prince of Smyrnia moved with Ifa his pitiful Complaints in so manifest a wrong, did not only promise him what help he could of himself, but also by his Embassadors solicited the Princes of Adimia, Saruchania, and Montesia, to give him Aid in so just a quarrel, for the relief of Ifa, against his usurping Brother. These Princes pitying the case of the distressed Prince, and moved with the Request of the Prince of Smyrnia, and fearing also the ambitious Ambitions of Mahomet, amongst them sent first Aid, that being all assembled together, Ifa had now twenty thousand men in Arms. Mahomet understanding of this great Preparation made against him, and having raised a strong Army, thought it not best to expect his Brothers coming into his Country (where perhaps many might join themselves unto him, being so strong in the field) but entered the Prince of Smyrnia his Country, with swift speed, that he was upon him and the rest of his Enemies before he was looked for; where after a great and bloody Fight he obtained of them a notable Victory. Ifa having lost the battle, and therewith his hope also, fled into Caramania, and there in such obscurity ended his days, that no man can tell where nor how he died. This was the end of this noble Prince, always of greater courage than fortune. The Prince of Smyrnia the chief Author of this War, humbling himself to Mahomet, obtained his Favour. The other Considerate Princes which gave Aid to Ifa, were shortly after by Mahomet for most part spoiled of their Dominions. Which done, he returned with Victory to the building of Prusfa, hoping now to live more at quiet.

But whilst Mahomet after this Victory dreading

no danger, was in the midst of his Pleasures at Prusfa, he was certainly advertised, That his Brother Solyman had raised a great Army in Europe, to invade him in Asia. Upon which advertisement he furnished the Cattle of Prusfa with a strong Garrison, and all things needful for the enduring of a long Siege, and placed Jacup-Beg the Son of Firofiz, Captain therein; and afterwards departed himself, because that City (lately before burnt by Ifa) was not as yet to be defended, much less to be accounted of as a place to retire unto if need should so require. From Prusfa he came to Ancyra, and from thence directed Commissions for the taking up of Soldiers in all parts of his Kingdom. At which time he wrote Letters also to Doiran a Tartar Prince (whom he had many times greatly pleased) for Aid; who presently came unto him with certain Troops of brave Horse, promising him his faithful Service.

Not long after, hearing that his Brother Solyman was with a puissant Army now come over Hellepontus, he consulted with his best Leaders, what course first to take; being himself of opinion, without delay to meet his Brother in the Field, deeming it great shame, not to offer him present battle. But he was by his more expert Captains advised, to consider that he was to fight against his eldest Brother, of whose good or bad Fortune he had as yet no experience; and many secretly favoured his Quarrel and Claim, as the eldest Son and right Heir of his Father Bajazet; and therefore it were better for him to retire further off into the strength of his Kingdom; and so temporizing, to await all good opportunities that might chance, as it doth in nothing more than in Martial Affairs; rather than to commit all to the hazard of one battle, wherein if Fortune failed him, all were then utterly lost. Upon which Reflection he retired from Ancyra towards Amasia, which time Doiran the false Tartarian, marching out at the other side of the City, fell to robbing and spoiling of Mahomet's Subjects as an Enemy, burning the Country Villages as they went; which thing when Mahomet understood, he with his Horsemen pursued him, and overtaking him before he was looked for, slew most part of his men, and recovered all the spoil which he had before taken; at which Mahomet gave to his Soldiers. Doiran himself fled escaping by flight. And so Mahomet having revenged himself upon his dissembling Friend, held on his way towards Amasia.

Solyman being come into Asia, led his Army towards Prusfa, where the Citizens understanding of his coming, went out of the City to meet him, and having done unto him such honour and Reverence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the City. But Jacup-Beg stood upon his guard, and would by no means deliver unto him the Cattle, which was before by Mahomet committed to his charge; for which cause Solyman laid hard siege unto it, and gave thereunto divers sharp Assaults, whereby the Defendants were greatly weakened, many of them being slain, and the rest for the most part wounded. Whereupon Jacup by Letters sent by one Ene Hozze, certified Mahomet how things stood, and that the Cattle could not long be holden against the furious Assaults of Solyman, except it were with speed relieved; upon which News he in all haste made towards Prusfa, recovering the same Messenger before him, with Letters to the Captain of the Cattle, if happily he could find means to deliver the same; wherein he highly commended him for faithful Service, and

and promised him speedy relief. This Messenger with his Letters chanced by Solyman his Soldiers to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Bassa, Solyman his chief Counsellor, a man of a sharp conceit, who of nothing could make something, but having any thing to work upon could do wonders; and having frantically examined the Messenger, and perused the Letters, suppressed the fame, and presently wrote others in the name of Mahomet, commending the Captain for that he had already done in his Service; but yet so far as he could possibly in time relieve him, he would him therefore to deliver up the Cattle, and to provide for the safeguard of himself and his Garrison, by such conditions as he could best obtain. These counterfeit Letters Alis Bassa found means to be as cunningly delivered unto the Captain, as they were craftily indited; who having read the fame, and now out of all hope of relief, expecting also every hour to be assaulted by the furious Enemy; upon reasonable conditions yielded the Cattle to Solyman. The news whereof being brought unto Mahomet, now come within one days march of Prusfa, exceedingly grieved him; but seeing no remedy, he returned back again to Amasia, whither Solyman (now possessed of the City and Cattle of Prusfa, and having thereby got a great Name in Asia) shortly after came with his Army, and hardly besieged his Brother in Amasia, but seeing no hope to win the City, he retired back again to Prusfa, and there after his wonted manner spent his time in riot and excess, whereunto he was exceedingly given. Jacup-Beg for yielding of the Cattle, was afterward by Mahomet frantically imprisoned, and in danger to have been put to death, had not the great Baffles become earnest Intercessors for him.

Mahomet lying at Amasia, was by his secret Espies advertised, That his Brother Solyman having dispersed his Army, lay in great security at Prusfa, guarded but with a small Power, pursuing his time in all voluptuous pleasure, his common Exercise. Whereupon he in all haste marched with his Army thitherwards, to have surprised him before he should be able to call together his dispersed Forces. But when he was come to the River Sangarius, he was discovered by Solyman Sulbasla a great Captain, whom Sultan Solyman had sent for the taking up of men in that side of the Country. Who reported in all haste, gave Solyman knowledge of his Brothers coming, with which sudden news he was so dismayed, being now of small strength, that for the avoiding of the imminent danger, he would presently have fled into Europe, had not Alis Bassa otherwise persuaded him; telling him, That if he should so cowardly fly away, it would not only blemish and defame his Honour, but discourage his Friends also in Asia, and encourage his Enemies to pursue him, perhaps unto the Gates of Hedemania; and that therefore it were better with swift Forces as he had to take the Straits of Neapolis, and so to stay his Brothers further passage into that Country, until such time as he might assemble the rest of his Army. According to which good Council he first took the beforenamed Straits and Passages, whereby Mahomet was of necessity to pass, and there strongly fortified himself. Mahomet coming thither, with great force entered the Straits, but was still valiantly by Solyman repulsed. The like attempt he many times valiantly gave, for that he knew himself to be at that time too strong for his Brother; but Solyman having the advantage of the place, with little danger or loss frustrated those his Brothers brave Attempts, although he were then a great deal the weaker. Alis Bassa, whose wild head, fraught with long experience, could (with nothing) effect great matters, in the mean time was not idle, but (making Solyman before acquainted with his doings) gave a secret Messenger (one of his own truly Servants) to Mahomet with Letters; certifying him, That most of his Nobility and great Captains had secretly conspired to betray him into the hands of his elder Brother Solyman, as the undoubted Heir of his Father Bajazet; and so with the price of his Head, to make their own Peace and Atone-ment with him; and that for the performance thereof they had bound themselves first unto Solyman, and afterwards one to another, by solemn Oath. Which Treason he discovered unto him, with great protestation of his love and good will, as he that had a long time eaten Bread and Salt (as the Turks use to say) in his Fathers Court, and therefore could not but with well unto him, being one of his Lord and Masters Sons. These Letters something troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a jealous conceit; for all that, he ceased not for six or seven days space, to give many a hot Skirmish for the gaining of those trait passages, but all in vain. In which time it chanced, one of his Servants near about his Person, to fly unto the Enemy; which caused him the more to suspect all that to be true, whereof Alis Bassa had forewarned him. Which consideration, and that by lying there he prevailed nothing, but lost and sweated his Men (for it was all that while exceeding foul Weather), and withal doubting to be betrayed, returned as he came, to Amasia. And Solyman glad also of his departure, retired to Prusfa, giving order into all parts of his Kingdom, for the assembling of a great Army; but understanding that the King of Caramania had made a League with his Brother Mahomet, and that they were agreed to join their Forces against him, for the driving of him out of Asia, he forthwith drew all his Forces to Ancyra, as a place of more safety.

Whilst Solyman thus lay at Ancyra, it befell that Masfa (which had all this while remained with his Brother Mahomet, since he was set at Liberty by Tamerlane, though not altogether well pleased with his own estate) one day by way of talk, thus spake unto his Brother; *I see (said he) how our elder Brother Solyman cautieth not to leave his own duty, and is not unlike in this to prevail against us, to our utter destruction: Now if it might please you to give me leave, I would go to Ispendiar Prince of Castamona and Pontus, our Brothers Enemy, and of him procure shipping to pass over the Euxine Sea into Europe; where I doubt not to find opportunity to make some great Innovation in that Kingdom, now in my Brothers absence; by reason whereof Solyman shall of necessity be driven to leave Asia, to be again by you solely possessed; or else be brought in danger there to lose his Kingdom in Europe. Which if I find be my good hap, to gain out of his hands, by your supportation, I promise you faithfully to hold the same of you as of my Lord and Sovereign. This greatly pleased Mahomet, and thereupon not long after they concluded betwix themselves, one to stand fast unto another, and the one to help the other in what they could, during life; confirming the same with great Solemnity of their Turkish Faith given and taken. Whereupon Mahomet furnished his Brother Masfa with a great Sum of Money, and other things for the taking in hand of so great an Enterprise.*

Masfa thus furnished, taking his leave of his Brother, set forwards towards the Prince Ispendiar; who hearing of his coming, met him on the

the way, and entertained him as a great Prince. But after that Muſa had made him acquainted with his purpose for paſſing into Europe, and had obtained grant of his help therein, he took his leave of him for a time, and went to viſit the King of Carmania; who alſo moſt honourably entertained him, and the rather in deſpight of Solyman. But whilſt Muſa was thus paſſing the time in Carmania, it happened that Mark, Coſt of ſome called Mereus, Prince of Valachia, having his Country much ſpoiled by Solyman his Garriſons; and hearing that Muſa one of Bajazet his Sons was with the Prince Iſſendiar, he writ unto him, promiſing to beſtow his Daughter and Heir in marriage upon Muſa, if he would come over into Europe, and revenge the wrong done unto him by Solyman. Whereof Muſa advertiſed by the Prince Iſſendiar, gladly returned out of Carmania, and was by him tranſported over the Euxine or Black-Sea, into Europe; where the Prince of Valachia glad of his coming, received him with great Honour, and according to his promiſe gave him his Daughter in marriage.

The fame of Muſa's coming into Europe and of his Marriage, was in ſhort time bruſhed through all Solyman his Kingdom in Europe, and wrought ſuch effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (always deſirous of Novelty) that they all as it were with one conſent ſubmitted themſelves unto him, as unto their Lord and Sovereign; in ſo much that coming to the Royal City of Hadrianople, in the abſence of his Brother Solyman he was there received as their King.

Solyman now lying at Ancrea in Aſia, underſtanding theſe proceedings of Muſa in Europe, and that he was poſſeſſed of a great part of his Kingdom there, was thereupon exceedingly troubled. Wherefore leaving his Deputy in Ancrea, he with all his Army came to the Strait of Bosphorus, and there of Emanuel the Greek Emperor obtained paſſage, promiſing for the ſame to reſtore unto him certain places before taken from him in Aſia; for Muſa had ſo provided, that he could have no help of the Turkiſh ſhipping, which was by his Commandment all before brought over unto Europe ſide. Muſa hearing of Solyman his arrival in Europe, made towards him with a great Power; but after that both their Armies were come the one within view of the other, and now ready to joyn battel, many of Muſa his Captains forſook him, and fled to Solyman the elder Brother, and their undoubted King; which Muſa beholding, was glad to fly, and to take the ſafeguard of the Woods and Mountains for his Refuge. After which Victory, Solyman returning to Hadrianople, took again poſſeſſion of his Kingdom, and there without meaſure gave himſelf to riot and exceſs, according to his wonted manner.

After the departure of Solyman out of Aſia Jacop-Beg (but lately before again received into Mahomet his Favour, and now left as Solyman his Deputy) delivered Ancrea, with the Caſtle of Pruiſa, and all the reſt that Solyman had gained in Aſia, to Mahomet; who theroſely after led his Army through the Countries of Carolia, Aydin, Savacania, Tekeliſ, and Germania, reducing them once again unto his Obedience; and afterwards returned to Pruiſa, where he now the ſecond time took poſſeſſion of his Fathers Kingdom in Aſia.

Muſa ſtill aided by the Valachian Prince his Father in law, gave many great Attempts againſt him, but was ſtill put to the worſt. At length having gathered ſome good ſtrength, and diligently attending the leaſt ſmile of better Fortune, drew near unto the place where Soly-

man lay; who at that time was (as his manner was) banquetting with great pleaſure in his Camp, and full of Wine. Infomuch that when News was brought unto him, that his Brother Muſa was at hand with a great Power, he in his Drunkenneſs cauſed the Meſſenger that brought the News, to be beaten; and when he had with greater earneſtneſs than was to his liking, affirmed that his Report to be true, he commanded him to be ſlain for troubling his Mirth. But ſhortly after, Muſa was come ſo near, that the Vantcouriers of his Army did Skirmiſh with ſome of Solyman his Soldiers; when as Chafis Eurenjes one of his Fathers old Captains, preſſing in, told him that Muſa was at hand, and had ſkirmiſhed with part of his Army. Whereof Solyman (now far in Wine) had no regard, but ſaid, Good Tutor do not trouble me no more; my Brother Muſa dares not come ſo nigh me; if I do but hold up my Cap, he is gone. With which anſwer the old Captain going out difcontented, ſent in Chafan, Ağa of the Femizaris; who boldly coming unto him, told him plainly of the imminent danger, and ſharply reproved him for his Intemperance and Security. With whole free Speech Solyman moved, in great rage commanded his Beard to be cut off, then no ſmall diſſage amongſt the Turks. Chafan preſently coming forth thus diſgraced, ſaid to them that ſtood waiting without, This is the Honour wherewith Sultan Solyman in his Exceſs rewards his moſt faithful Servants. Wherefore be it known to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cauſe) ſerve Muſa, a Prince of greater Temperance and Diſcretion; who ſo will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to Horſe, and accompanied with a number of his Janizaries (of whom he was greatly beloved) went over to Muſa; as did many other great Captains alſo with their Companies, moved by his Example ſo to do. But when Solyman underſtood that Chafan with moſt part of the Janizaries, and many other worthy Captains, with the greateſt ſtrength of his Army, were revolted to Muſa, then ſaſt by, and ready to ſet upon him; it then repented him too late of his diſſolute folly; and finding no other remedy now to eſcape, hid himſelf until it was dark night; then taking Horſe, accompanied only with Caratz-Beg and Carra Muſchil, two of his Noblemen, and one Country Turk whom they had retained for their Guid, thought to have fled to Conſtantinople. This malicious Clown having of purpoſe led him by unknown ways all that night to and fro, as it were in a maze, (obſcuringly miſmanaging unto them the place where they paſſed by, as if they had been in the right way) brought them in the morning to a Village not far from the place from whence they departed the evening before; and there riding a little before them of purpoſe, gave warning to a ſturdy Peaſant or two of his Acquaintance, that Solyman was coming after him; willing them to make way of him. The rude Country Churls, with ſome other of like breed, running out with Bars and Staves, and ſuch other homely Tools as firſt came to hand, ſlew Caratz and Carra Muſchil, which would not yield unto them, but ſtood upon their Guard, and took Solyman alive; where, as it commonly falleth out in the vulgar peoples fury, ſome cried out to kill him, and ſo to end the Wars; ſome like wiſe to burn him and ſome to hang him; and ſome few to ſave him; every one ſo his rude affection led him. In the heat of this Country uproar Muſa, who glad to find his Brother Solyman ſo hardly beſet, cauſed him preſently to be there ſtrangled, when he had reigned in Hadrianople fix year and ten months.

Solyman begg'd by his Brother Muſa.

This Solyman is that ſame whom ſome call Celeſtine, and other ſort, Caliphan, and when him for the fifth King of the Turks.

This was the miſerable end of Solyman, the eldeſt Son that Bajazet left alive. A man much given to Exceſs, otherwiſe indued with many great Vertues, being both of great valour, and exceeding bountiful. In his time lived the learned Doctor Achmetes, which wrote the Hiſtory of Alexander the Great in Turkiſh Verſe, and publiſhed it in the name of Solyman himſelf; for which he was by him bounteouſly rewarded. The dead body of Solyman himſelf, was by the commandment of Muſa conveyed to Pruiſa, and there lieth buried ſaſt by the body of his Grandfather Amurath. So now of theſe Ademian Brethren remained none but Mahomet and Muſa, the one reigning in Aſia, and the other in Europe, divers parts of the World, and well bounded with the ſureſt bounds of Nature; yet not ſufficient to content their ambitious minds, until that the younger had moſt unaturally devoured the elder.

Muſa preſently after the death of his Brother Solyman, took upon him the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europe; who in the beginning of his Reign diſplaced moſt of them which had born great Offices before in the time of his Brother Solyman, and had now of late revolted to him; fearing to be by them betrayed or forſaken, as his Brother was, and in their rooms placed other of his own Creatures. And not ſo content, proceeded further, upon ſmall cauſes moſt unkindly to impriſon and put to death many of them who had of him well deſerved. Which cruel dealing diſalienated the minds of his Nobility, that many of them kept themſelves out of the way, doubtfully expecting the end of ſuch his Tyranny. Government. Chafis Eurenjes the old and renowned Captain, to eſcape his hands, was glad to feign himſelf blind, fo to abſent himſelf from Court. At this time he alſo by his Embaſſadors demanded of divers Chriſtian Princes his Neighbours, ſuch Tribute as they had in times paſt either payed or promiſed to pay unto his Father Bajazet; and in that Quarrel invaded many of them, namely the Princes of Servia and Bulgaria. Amongſt other he ſent Bradam Baſſa (a learned man of great experience, and ſometimes one of his Fathers grave Counſellors) unto Emanuel Paleologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, to demand the like Tribute of him. Who ſo ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, from thence by Letters advertiſed Mahomet of the undiſcreet Government of his Brother Muſa in his new gotten Kingdom; and what untimely this he began to make here he was therein well ſetled, loſing the love both of his Subjects and Neighbour Princes; with much other matter concerning his miſgovernment. Which things when Mahomet underſtood, he ſent a Meſſenger with Letters back again to Conſtantinople, requeſting the Baſſa to come over unto him into Aſia, and in token of his great Favour ſent him divers rich Garments, with many great and princely Promiſes; wherewith the Baſſa moved, and deteſting the cruel Government of Muſa, went over unto him to Pruiſa, and there was to him honourably entertained, and ſworn one of his Privy Council; in which Place of Honour he long time afterwards ſerved him faithfully; and after him, his Son Amurath alſo.

Mahomet thinking upon the advantage of his Brothers evil Government, to find means to thruſt him out of his Kingdom, and ſo to draw the whole Government of the Turkiſh Empire unto himſelf, as well in Europe as in Aſia; aſſembled an Army of fifteen thouſand choice Soldiers to invade his Brother in Europe, before he were there well eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom.

And ſo ſhocking down towards the Straits of Bosphorus, by his Embaſſador concluded a League with Emanuel the Greek Emperor, That one of them ſhould never wrong or damage the other; and that if Mahomet ſhould hap to obtain the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europe, he ſhould always Honour and Reverence the Emperor as his ſpecial good Friend; but if he ſhould chance him to be diſtreſſed or overthrow by his Brother Muſa, that then the Emperor ſhould preſently tranſport him and his Army back again unto Aſia. This League was with great Solemnity of words on both parts confirmed. And ſhortly after, Mahomet with all his Army was by the Emperors ſhipping at the Strait of Bosphorus near unto Conſtantinople, tranſported over unto Europe; for Muſa poſſeſſed of Callipolis, had ſtooped all the other paſſages.

Muſa having before knowledge of his Brothers coming, was forthwith in readineſs to meet him with a ſtrong Army. So that Mahomet had not marched far from the Sea-ſide, but that the Vantcouriers of his Army met with his Brothers, at a place called Unages, and there began a light Skirmiſh; wherein Muſa's Fore-runners were by Mahomet put to flight, and chaled unto Muſa his Camp. Whereof ſuch a ſudden fear aroſe in the Army, that they were almoſt ready to fly, thinking Mahomet had been upon them with all his Power; but underſtanding the truth of the matter, both Armies reſted that night, which as then drew ſaſt on. The next day theſe two Brethren, armed with equal hope, brought their Armies into the Field, and gave the ſignal the barrel, whereupon began a mortal and bloody Fight; in the Fury whereof Michael, old Baſſa of Romania, and certain other of Muſa's great Captains, upon ſeveral difcontentment revolted to Mahomet; wherewith many of Muſa his Soldiers diſcouraged, fled. Which Mahomet his Soldiers ſeeing, purſued the chafe with ſuch earneſtneſs and fury, that few were left with himſelf; yet with ſuch as were left, in hope of good hap, he ſet upon his Brothers who although he was half difcontented with the ſigue of the greater part of his Army, whom the Euxines had yet in chase, yet ſtood he ſaſt himſelf with 7000 Janizaries, his beſt Soldiers; ſo taking the unexpected good hap, preſented unto him by his Brothers cowardneſs, valiantly received his Charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, and himſelf too weak to withſtand the fury of the Janizaries, becauſe moſt of his men alſo were following the Charge, was now for ſafeguard of his life glad to fly himſelf to Conſtantinople; whither he came accompanied ſcarcely with two hundred men; and was from thence, according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the Emperor, ſpeedily ſhipped over unto Aſia. Muſa having thus put his Brother to flight, with great laughter of his men, preſently took his Tents with all that was therein, and there encamped himſelf. They of Hadrianople and Ancrea, which enjoyed the Chance of ſuch a ſaſt flight in the beginning of the barrel, not knowing what had happened to Mahomet, returning to the Camp, doubting no peril, and finding it at their return poſſible by their Enemies, ſtood as men amazed, and utterly diſcouraged; at which time Muſa would not ſuffer his Soldiers to put them to the Sword, as they would ſaſt have done, but commanded them to be diſpoſed of their Tents and ſuch other things as they had, and ſo with life ſuffered them to depart.

After this Overthrow, whilſt Mahomet lay ſaſt at Pruiſa, the Prince of Smyrna privately entred into Aidin.

The battle betwixt the two brethren, Mahomet and Muſa.

Adina, purposing to pass through into Sarmacia; which thing Mahomet hearing, gathered a great Army, and entering into the Princes Country, made much spoil as he went, and so disaffected the Prince himself, that he was glad to submit himself unto him; and from thenceforth to his Dominion of him, as of his Lord and Sovereign, and so returned Mahomet into Asia.

Mahomet could not well digest the loss he had lately received in Europe, and therefore levied an Army of choice Souldiers out of all parts of his Kingdom, once again to try his fortune against his elder Brother Musa. For the better Success whereof, he by his Letters craved Aid of the Prince Dulghader Oglis, written to this effect:

Sultan Mahomet unto the Prince Dulghader Oglis, his Father in Law.

*M*Y purpose is to lead mine Army into Romania in Europe, and there again to try my quarrel with my Brother Musa. My hope is, that you will not writ your Aid be wanting unto me your Son in Law, in my so great Affairs, neither for want of good will to binder this my purpose. Fare you well. In the year of our great Prophet Mahomet, 814. From Amalia.

Whereunto the Prince returned this kind Answer:

Prince Dulghader Oglis unto the great Sultan Mahomet.

I Doubt not most mighty Monarch, but that whithersoever our desires shall draw you for the undertaking of any great Exploit, be that ruleth above in Heaven, will be always your Aid, prosper your Attempts, minister unto you by Occasions, and bring all your Actions unto a most happy end, with most approved Victory. Wherefore (seeing God so disposing our Affairs) I cannot my self in Person come unto you with my Power, and give you my truly help in this your intended War; yet will I in no self safe with all speed to send my Son your Servant, to Aid you with our Forces, in this War. Fare you well. This same Year of our Prophet, 814.

And so shortly after, the Prince sent unto him his Son, according to his Promise, with a Company of brave Souldiers, excellently furnished; for the welcoming of whom, Mahomet his Brother in Law made a great and royal Feast; and there in his mirth gave unto the young Prince the rich Apparel he wore himself, with the Horse he rode upon, and all the rich Plate of Gold and Silver wherein they were served at that Feast, a matter of great value. And to every one of his Noblemen he gave a rich Garment, made for that purpose, with some other Gift, as a Favour; and afterwards gave them all to understand, That he intended forthwith to pass over into Europe, and there to recover all his Fathers Kingdom, or else there to end his days; as for the spoil and prey (said he) it shall be theirs that can win it; one Horse, one Sword, one Horsemans Mace shall content my self. So having furnished his Army with all things needful for so great an Enterprize, he set forward and came to the Strait of Bosphorus; and from thence gave knowledge of his coming to the Emperor of Constantinople; who glad thereof (for the displeasure he bare to Musa) transported him and all his Army over that Strait into Europe, and there in one of his Country-Palaces royally feasted him. At which time Mahomet requested the Emperor to join with him in that War against their common Enemy; but he excused himself by reason of his great age; yet nevertheless, afflicted him with certain Companies of valiant Christians, whose Service afterward stood the Turk in great stead.

So Mahomet taking his leave of the Emperor, marched with his Army to the River Wyzan in Thracia, where by the way he received Letters from the ancient Captain Chaspi Eurenjes, advising him to be very circumspect in his marching, and not to make too much halt to join batel with his Brother; counselling him also (if he could by any means) to allure Jegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forsake his Brother, and to follow his Ensigns; for that in those men consisted Musa's his greatest strength; and promised in good time to come unto him himself also, if he were not too halty. This Messenger that brought this News, Mahomet bountyfully rewarded, and so sent him away. Shortly after, as he was marching towards Hadriampole, part of the Enemies Army began to show it self under the leading of Cara Calis, and was presently charged by Michael Oglis, and put to flight. So holding on his way to Hadriampole, he laid siege to the City; where the Citizens sent out to him certain of their gravest and most substantial Burgeesses, to certify him, That by reason of the Garrison there left by Musa, they could not as then deliver the City unto him; but if it should please him to go and try his Fortune in the Field against his Brother, who should be the Commander thereof, he should find them ready to follow his good Fortune, and to yield themselves, the City, and all therein, to his pleasure, if it were his good hap to carry away the Victory. With which answer Mahomet contenting himself, raised his Siege, and took the way towards Zagora. In that place Musa is reported to have come secretly disguised unto Mahomet his Camp, and to have taken full view thereof; but perceiving himself too weak to encounter his Brother, withdrew his Army into the safe-guard of the great Woods and strong Places; and so from thence retired with his Army towards Philippolis, and so marched along the River Meritze, called in ancient time Hebrus; where Jegides Bassa, with Hamza Beg, and Ysmir Oglis (three of Musa's his great Captains) set upon Michael Oglis repulsed. Mahomet holding on his way, came to Sophia; where as he went, Musa divers times from the Mountains made shew of his Army, but durst not come down into the Plain to give him batel. Mahomet having refreshed his Army at Sophia, marched to Sarkiroe, where he received Letters from Jegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all secretly perswaded by old Eurenjes to revolt unto him; the tenor whereof in brief was this:

Jegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, unto the great Sultan Mahomet.

WE are three young men (most mighty Monarch) and have with us three thousand choice Souldiers, men of incomparable valour, such as the World hath scarce the like; draw your Forces near unto us with as much speed as you can, and we shall find us ready to come over unto you. Fare you well.

Where-

Whereupon he marched all the next night after, until he came to the River Morava, and there encamped; where the three aforementioned Captains, according to their promise joynted themselves unto him with all their Souldiers. Thither came also old Eurenjes, of all others the most famous Captain amongst the Turks, and now no longer blind, brings with him a great company of most expert Souldiers. Mark the Despot of Servia (for the displeasure he bare unto Musa) sent him Aid thither also. By which Supplies, Mahomet's Army was greatly increased; who after he had courteously welcomed all these new come Captains, he began again to march farther until he came to Ciflova, the unfortunate Plain; where Hamza Beg the Prince of Smyrna his Son, having forsaken Musa, came unto him with five hundred Horse, certifying him, that all the Nobility had forsaken his Father; so, as he march from place to place, his Forces still increased, by the revolt of his Brothers. Musa seeing his Souldiers thus daily fall from him, infomuch that he had almost none now left, but the Souldiers of the Court (which were indeed his best men of War, and always unto him faithful, because he had been since unto them exceeding bountiful) thought it best to attempt something, before he were left himself alone. Wherefore having yet with him five thousand of those expert Souldiers, he drew nearer unto his Brother, seeking to have taken him at some advantage. But Mahomet having knowledge of his purpose, and contented to be advised by his old expert Captains, had ever a vigilant eye unto him. Yet at last, whether it were upon good hope, or else tricked forward with despair, Musa upon the sudden, valiantly set upon his Brothers Army; but his Souldiers oppressed with multitude, rather than overcome with true valour, after a hard and bloody Fight were put to the worst; which he seeing, desperately brake into the midst of his Enemies, seeking there for death amongst the thickest of them. But being known by Bajazet Bassa, Mahomet his Lieutenant General, desirous to take him alive, he was before on every side; where seeing himself in more danger to be taken than slain, he with great courage brake from amongst the midst of them, and fled. In which flight his Horse falling into a deep muddy Ditch (or as some others say) hoaxed by Sarutzes his own Servant, and himself wounded) overthrew him, and there before he could again recover himself, was taken by Bajazet Bassa (the great Lieutenant) Michael Oglis and Barac Beg, which had hardly pursued him out of the batel; and so with his hands bound, by them brought through the midst of the Army. Which pitiful sight, grieved not a little the hearts of many; so to see him but even now so great a King, and one of the Sons of great Bajazet, by the strange change of Fortune, found like a Captive Slave led forth to Execution; yet some most part glad thereof, hoping these long Civil Wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came unto him a Nobleman called Balta Oglis, sent (as they thought) from Mahomet himself; who after he had in few words bitterly reproved him, for the cruelty by him before shewed unto his Brother Solyman, in like case, caused him presently to be strangled with a Bow-string. His dead body was by and by after presented to his Brother Mahomet; who by a secret way, shed a few Catechisms tears over it. He reigned three years seven months, and was afterwards conveyed to Prusa, and there lieth buried by the body of his Brother Solyman, in the same Chappel with his Grandfather Anurath.

Musa strangled.

Mahomet after the death of Musa, now free from all Competitors, took upon him the sole Government of the Turkish Kingdom, as well in Europe as in Asia. And here the Turkish Histories begin the Reign of this Mahomet fifth King of the Turks; accounting the troublesome time from the Captivity of Bajazet, unto the death of Musa, as a time of vacancy or Anarchy, wherein the Turkish Kingdom was not at any time wholly possessed by any one of Bajazet his Sons; Ila possessing one part, whereof he was by Mahomet dispossessed; who afterwards usurped all that part of the Turkish Kingdom in Asia, being the right of his elder Brother Solyman; who at that time reigning in Europe, was deposed and strangled by his Brother Musa, who was in like manner served by his youngest Brother Mahomet, the only Son of Bajazet then left, as is before declared. Which divers Mutations, and interrupted Successions, was the cause that the Historiographers do so greatly differ upon the Successor of Bajazet; some reckoning one, some another; and some more, some fewer; and some, such as never were. But forasmuch as Mahomet held all or most part of the Turkish Kingdom in Asia, during his troublesome reign, and in the end possessed the other part thereof in Europe also, I'vecked him for the fifth King of the Turks, and Successor to his Father Bajazet; including also in this History of his life, all that Intestate and Serpentine-like Tragedy, wherein he himself was the principal Actor.

Whilst Mahomet was (as is aforesaid) thus busied in his Wars in Europe, against his Brother Musa, the King of Caramania taking the advantage of his Troubles there, with a great Army invaded his Kingdom joyning upon him in War, burning and spoiling all before him as he went. Eivades Bassa, Mahomet his Lieutenant, then lying at Prusa, not able to withstand him; and fearing his coming thither, because it was the Seat of the Ottoman Kings in Asia, caused the Citizens to bring the greatest part of their Wealth into the castle, whereinto he also received to many of the Citizens as he conveniently could, willing the rest to shirk for themselves as they might, in such case of extremity. Shortly after, the King of Caramania (according to his expectation) came to Prusa, and without resistance took the City, not as yet fully fortified; which he, without delay caused the second time to be burnt down to the ground; and afterwards laid siege to the Castle, giving many great Assaults there by the space of thirty days, but was always valiantly repulsed by Eivades the Bassa, who ceased not continually to encourage his Souldiers, till putting them in comfort, that Mahomet having now overcome his Enemies in Europe, would in few days undoubtedly come to their Relief. It chanced at the same time that the dead body of Musa, sent to Prusa to be buried, was honourably conveyed upon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian King hearing of the coming of such a multitude, and fearing it to have been Mahomet with his Power, raised his Siege, and with speed departed; whereas the Turks long time after jeffed, saying, If the Caramanian King run away for fear of the dead body of the Ottoman King, what would he do if he had come against him alive? But the truth was, he feared Mahomet his Power.

Orismes the Son of Solyman (yet a Boy) having lived at Constantinople ever since the death of his Father, about this time departed thence, because of the League lately made between the Emperor and his Uncle Mahomet, purposing to have gone into Valachia; but by the way as he was travelling, the Turkish voluntary Soldiers underriding that he was the Son of their late King Solyman, reformed unto him in great numbers, offering him his Quarrel to spend their lives. Of which Inturrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all haste, with a great Power to suppress the fame, of whose coming the Soldiers with Orchane understanding, dispersed themselves and fled. As for Orchane himself, he was by the unlawful Tutor Zagoras betrayed unto his Uncle Mahomet, who recently caused his Eyes to be put out, and so sent him to Prusa; allowing him great Revenues to live upon, and ever after used him with great Honour. The Sister of this Orchane he gave in marriage to one of his Noblemen, with a great Dowry. This is that Orchane, whom former Historiographers reckon up among the Turkish Kings, as one of the Successors of Bajazet; and that he was betrayed to his Uncle Mahomet, erring as I suppose, both in Succession and the Name, mistaking Moses for Mahomet.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the Injury which the Caramanian King had done to him in his absence, returning to Prusa, assembled a great Army to revenge himself of that wrong. At which time, he sent to the Prince Ispendiar for Aid, who sent him his Son Cafama. He commanded also the Prince German Oglu, to make provision for the Victuals of his Army, as he should pass by his Country, which was accordingly done. And so provided of all things necessary, he with his Army entered into the Caramanian Country; where he took the Cities Aspropolis, Delphopolis, Hierapolis, and besieged Iconium; but by reason of the immoderate rain which at that time fell, he was glad to make Peace with the Caramanian King, called also Mahomet. And so raising his Siege, departed towards Pontus, where he had not long layed, but that News was brought unto him, That the Caramanian King renouncing his League, was again up in Arms. Wherefore returning into Caramania, and to Iconium, he there overthrew the King in battle, and took both him and his Son Mahmud Prisoners; who redeemed themselves by delivering many of their strong Cities and Castles into his hands; and afterward concluded a Peace, they receiving from him an Engage (as the Turkish manner is) in token they were now become his Vassals.

The Caramanian War thus happily ended, he went over into Europe, and passing over Danubius, foraged the Country of Valachia Tamali-pina, making there great spoil; for redress whereof, the Valachian Prince by his Embassadors sent him such Tribute as he demanded, and himself also to leave him in his Court. About which time happened a great Earthquake in Prusa, and other places of Asia; whereby many Houses and Towns were overthrown; after which ensued great troubles in most parts of Asia; howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his presence kept all his Dominions in peace and quietness.

Ispendiar Prince of Cassanania and part of Pontus, refusing unto himself Cassanania, with a little part more of his Dominion, gave the rest unto Mahomet, upon condition, that he should restore no part thereof again unto his Son Cafama; who having long time served in Mahomet his Court and Wars, could not be persuaded to return again unto his Father's; and therefore was by him thus disinherited. Which great Gift, Mahomet thankfully accepted, and in lieu thereof assigned unto Cafama other great and large Possessions within his own Kingdom.

Mahomet, after the death of his Brother Musa, had sent Scheichs Bedredin (his Brother Adelischer) to Nice in Asia, as unto a place of exile, allowing him nevertheless a great Pension whereunto to live. This Bedredin had in his house one Burgulax, Muslapha his Steward; these two conspired together, how to raise some Tumult or Rebellion to trouble the peaceable Government of Mahomet. For which purpose, Burgulax (according to the Plot by he was laid) came into Adinidia (sometime called Caria) and there pretending great Zeal of Reformed Religion, with a wonderful Gravity began to broach divers new and strange Opinions, far differing from the Turkish ancient Superstition, yet very plausible and well fitting the humour of the vulgar people. By which means he was in short time required for a famous learned devout Man, and had many Followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin some great Innovation. Bedredin glad of his mans success, fled from Nice into the Prince Ispendiar his Country, from whence he took shipping over the Engage into Valachia, and there withdrawing himself into a great Forest, as if he had been some devout and religious Man, allured unto him a great number of Outlaws and Thieves which there lived. When whom he had sufficiently instructed and framed to his purpose, he sent them in the habit of Religious Men into the Country of Zagoras, and other places in the Frontiers of Mahomet's Dominions, near unto him, as his Disciples; who with great boldness and confidence, published Bedredin his Doctrine and Authority; and how that he was by God appointed to be the King of Justice, and Commander of all the World; whose Doctrine in manner of a Government was (as they said) already received (as they gave it out) in Asia, being for forth but by one of his Scholars, Burgulax; whose Fame was now dispersed throughout all the Turks Dominion; and that therefore if any were desirous of Preferment, they should repair to Bedredin, who would in short time show himself to the World, and promote his Followers according to their Deserts. Many of the Country people deluded with this phantastic and crafty of these seditious Seed-Men, resorted to Bedredin in hope of Preferment, and with them some of good Calling also. At last, out of the Forest cometh this great Prophet, who displayed, attended upon with a great multitude of the seditious vulgar people, which daily resorted unto him more and more. Mahomet for the repressing of these dangerous Tumults, sent his Son Amurath, and Bajazet the great Baffa, with two thousand Men to apprehend Burgulax in Adinidia; but when they came thither, they found him guarded with three thousand Men well appointed, ready to adventure their Lives in defence of their foolish Prophet. Nevertheless, Amurath and Bajazet not dismayed with the multitude of those uplandish people, for upon them where was fought a right bloody Battle, for the number, and many fall on both sides; yet at last the Rebels fled; in which flight Burgulax himself was slain, and hewn all to pieces. After which Victory Bajazet from thence hasted to Magnesia, and there executed Torlas Kemal, another seditious Turkish Monk, which with two thousand, by him seduced, did much harm in the Country thereabout. At the same time also, Mahomet sent another Power against Bedredin; but most of his Followers seeing in him no such matter, as was by his Disciples and himself promised, and as they hoped for, were already fallen from him, so that of that great multitude which before followed him, him, few or none were left with him, whereby he was easily apprehended by them that Mahomet sent against him; and so being brought to Mahomet O Serrai, was there in the Market-place before a Tavern-door, fairly hanged, without any further harm.

Mahomet in the short time of his Reign finished the great Mahometan Temple at Hadrianople, before begun by his Brethren Solyman and Musa. With the same he built a Privy Palace, the Seat of the Turkish Kings in Europe, until the taking of Constantinople. He also built another Temple, with a most sumptuous Abbey, and a publick School thiereto adjoining; endowing the same with great Revenues, such as had by him and those his Brethren of late been taken from the Christians. He gave also great Summs of Money, yearly to be paid at Medina and Mecha, for the relief of poor Pilgrims travelling from far to the Sepulchre of their great Prophet Mahomet, at Medina, or his Temple at Mecha.

Shortly after Mahomet fell sick at Hadrianople, and perceiving himself in danger of death, by his last Will appointed his eldest Son Amurath to Succeed him in his Kingdom, and sent Elwan Beg (a man in great Favour with him) in post to Anafia, to will him with all speed to repair to the Court at Hadrianople. But feeling death to approach, and that he could not possibly live until the coming of his Son, he frantically charged his Baffas with all secrecy to conceal his death, until his coming, for fear lest any Trouble should rise upon the bruit thereof, before his coming thither; and so having fed all things in Order, he departed out of this World unto his Prophet Mahomet, about the year of our Saviour Christ, 1522, when he reigned seven and twenty years; accounting in his Reign that troublesome ten years next after the Captivity of Bajazet, in which time the Turks Kingdom was by his ambitious Sons rent in sunder, (as is aforesaid) until it was at length again by this Mahomet restored to the former Integrity, about seven years before his death, which the Turks account for the whole time of his Reign; and the other troublesome ten years as a vacancy or Anarchy of their Kingdom, as is aforesaid.

Mahomet being dead, the three great Baffas, Eroffis, Bajazet, and Ibrahim (so did themselves of the death of the Janizaries, and such of the Soldiers of the Court) called a Divan or Council for the Wars, as if the King had been alive; wherein it was pretended, That Mahomet had determined to make War upon the Prince of Smyrna; and that for that Service, it was his pleasure, That the Janizaries should forthwith pass over into Asia, to the Castle of Baga. Whereupon Press-money was presently given them, and they set over with Letters directed to the Viceroy of Anatolia, for the assembling of an Army for Baga. In the mean time, the great Baffas of the Court sat daily in Council, placing and displacing, promoting and disgracing whom they thought good, as if the King had yet commanded the Kings Physitians also, to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go to and fro with their Potions and Receipts, as if they still in Cure; and Letters were sent in post to Elwan Beg, for speedy dispatch of the business for which he was sent into Asia. Yet for all this cunning dissimulation, the Pensioners and other Soldiers of the Court, went to be near unto the Kings Person, and some of them always of the Privy-Chamber, began to suspect the matter; and coming to the Baffas, said they marvelled that the King in so long time did never shew himself, as he had always before done. Whereunto the Baffas answered, That he had been dangerously sick, and was now but a little recovered, and that therefore the Physitians would not suffer him to look abroad, or take the Air, for fear of catching him down again. Then will we our selves, said the Pensioners, go and see his Majesty; and with that they were ready to force in upon the Baffas. Eroffis seeing their importunity, desired them to wait themselves contented, and not as then to trouble the King, for that he had that day, as he said, taken Physick; but to morrow (said he) we will request his Majesty, if he so please to shew himself, that you may see him; wherewith they for that time held themselves contented. Now among the Kings Physitians there was one Gowdron, a Persian, a man of a quick spirit and subtle device, which he found means to deceive the Pensioners; he devised, that the dead body of the King being apparelled in Royal large Robes, should be brought betwixt two, as if he had been led into an high open Gallery, and being there set, to have a Boy so neatly placed behind him under his large Robes, as that he unperceived, might move the Kings hand up to his head, as if he should stroke his Face or Beard, as his manner was. The next day the dead King being accordingly brought forth by the Baffas in his robes, and wrapped with Clothes about his Head, as if it had been for fear of the Air, or of taking cold, and so placed in an high open Gallery, as was before devised, suddenly the Physitian came running in, fuming and raging as if he had been half mad, ready to tear his Clothes for anger; and in great choler casting his Coat against the ground, asked the Baffas if they meant to kill the King, by bringing him into the open Air? We (said he) have with great pains, in long time, a little recovered him, and will you thus foolishly cast him down again? Pardon us good Doctor (said Eroffis) for these Gowdemen (pointing to the Pensioners) were so importunate to see his Majesty, that to satisfy their desires, he was content to be led forth of his Chamber; whereof we hope shall ensue no harm. The Pensioners seeing the King many times moving his hand to his face, and as it were stroking his Beard, held themselves well contented, supposing him to have been alive, although but weak, and therefore not willing to break upon them. The Physitians taking him up amongst them, carried him into his Lodging again, which was but fast by, making as if they had carried an extream sick man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and forty days, until the coming of Amurath his Son.

This Mahomet was both wife and valiant, and withal exceeding bountiful, but Ambitious above measure; and may of right be accounted the Restorer of the Turks Kingdom; for he recovered again all those Countries in Asia, which Tamerlan had taken away and given unto other Mahometan Princes, after the Overthrow of Bajazet. And when as the Kingdom of the Turks was rent in pieces, and almost brought to nought by Civil Wars, and the Ambition of himself and his Brethren; he at length got possession of the whole, and so left it to his Son Amurath an entire Kingdom, in the former greatness, although not so much by him augmented. His body being buried in a fair Tomb made of artificial stone, very beautiful to behold, in a Chappel at the East side of Prusa, where we leave him at his rest.

AFTER that the death of Mahomet had been politically concealed one and forty days, by the three great Bassas Bajazet, Ertuques, and Ibrahim, Amurath, or Murat (as the Turks call him) his eldest Son, at that time coming to Prusa, was by them placed in his Fathers Seat, and the death of Mahomet at the same time published, whereupon great Troubles began on every side to arise.

The Princes of Smyrna and Mentese rose up in Arms; and at Thebalonica, an obscure Fellow crept as it were out of a Chimney-corner, took upon him the Name and Person of Mulapha the Son of Bajazet, which was slain many years before, in the great battle against Temurlane at Mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the unfortunate Sultan Bajazet. This counterfeit Mulapha animated by the Grecian Princes, and going from Thebalonica to Vardarium, set so good a Countenance upon the matter, with such a Grace and Majesty, that not only the Country people (apt to believe any thing) but men of greater Place and Calling also, as Temur Beg the Prince of Smyrna his Son, with the Sons of old Eureses Bassa, persuaded that he was the very Son of the great Bajazet, repaired unto him, as unto their natural Prince and Sovereign. From Vardarium he went to Serra, and from thence to Hadrinople, (Amurath being as then at Prusa) where he was received as if it had been that noble Prince Mulapha, whom he feigned himself to be; so that in short time he was honoured as a King in all parts of the Turkish Kingdom in Europe.

Amurath to repress this so great and dangerous a Rebellion, sent Bajazet Bassa a man of great Authority in his Court, with a strong Army into Europe. This great Bassa passing over Hellipontus, found all the Country revolted unto their new Mulapha; but marching on towards Hadrinople, with purpose to have given him battle, he was first forsaken of the European Souldiers which he brought out of Asia, and afterwards of all the rest also; and being left alone, with his Brother Hamze Beg, was for safeguard of his life glad to yield himself to Mulapha; of whom he was graciously entertained, and upon promise of his Loyalty, sworn one of his Privy-Council.

Mulapha thus now possessed of the Turkish Kingdom in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintain his credit, levied a great Army to make War upon Amurath in Asia. And as he was upon his way, at a place which the Turks call Saffiders, or the place of Willows, his other Counsellors repining at the great Honour he gave to Bajazet Bassa, advised him to beware that he trusted him not too far, of whose small Faith he had sufficient trial already, and was like enough when occasion should serve, to revolt from him to Amurath, and to draw after him some great part of his Army, to the great peril both of himself and all them his faithful Servants and Followers. Upon which jealous conceit, this great Bassa Bajazet was there forthwith as a Traytor apprehended, and without further trial executed; at which time his Brother Hamze was with much ado spared. This done, Mulapha proceeded on his Journey, and passed over with his Army at Callipolis into Asia. Amurath understanding of the proceedings of Mulapha in Europe, and of his preparation made for his Invasion of Asia, created three new Bassas, Omer, Urugs, and Alis, all three the Sons of Temurises; these he joyed with his old Bassas Ibrahim and Ertuques. All these five he used as Counsellors for the War; by whose advice he sent for Mahomet Beg, a famous Michael Oghis, who in the time that Musa reigned was Vice-Roy in Europe, and therefore a man well known to most principal men in Mulapha his Army, but had been kept Prisoner in the Castle of Amasia, from the time that Amasia was depopled and put to death by his Brother Mahomet, until now that he was after eight years imprisonment, for this special purpose enlarged and received into Favour.

About the same time that Mulapha set foot in Asia, Amurath having gathered his Army, set forward from Prusa to meet him; yet with such distrust in his Forces, which were thought to be much inferior to the European Souldiers that followed Mulapha, that he was glad upon a superstitious opinion or zeal, to prostrate himself at the feet of an Emir (one of the false Prophet Mahomet's Posterity) to receive at his hypocritical Hands a graceless Blessing for his better speed; by whom he was made to believe, that after two Repulses, he had with much ado at the third time obtained grant of the great Prophet Mahomet, that he should prevail in that War; and thereupon had his Sword girt unto him with the Emir his holy hands, with many other vain and superstitious Ceremonies. Yet for all these Charms, he marched on with his Army in fear enough, until he came to the River of Ulubud (otherwise called Rindac;) where having Intelligence of the approach of Mulapha, he for feared the Bridge over the River there to be broken down, and incamped himself on that side the River. Not long after came Mulphaba and finding the Bridge broken, incamped on the foot thereof on the other side; so that nothing parted the two Armies, but the breadth of the River only. Whilst they lay thus near incamped together, that the Soldiers might on both sides take the full view one of another, and also talk together; Mahomet Beg, firmamed Michael Ogli, but lately delivered out of his long Imprisonment (as is aforesaid) came to the River side, and with a loud Voice called by name upon the great Captains and old Soldiers that were in Mulphaba's Army; asking by name for many of his old Friends and Acquaintance; many of them being there present, rejoicing to see that Honourable Man (whom they supposed to have been dead in prison many years before) came gladly to the side of the River, to hear what he could say.

Then with a loud Voice he began to perfwade them, that the man whom they followed was not the Honourable Mulphaba, but some base high-minded fellow set up by the Grecians, abusing the obscurity of his Birth, as the Vail under the covert whereof he went craftily about to intrude himself into the Honourable descent of Bajazet; and so masking in the counterfeit Titles of stolt Honour, had misled them from their Duty to their natural King and Sovereign, to follow him a meer Deceiver. And further assured them, that Mulphaba, Bajazet's Son, was dead and buried in the Bed of Fame 22 years before; Honourably ending his days in defence of his Country, in the great battle of Mount Stella against Tamercian, wherefore they should do well to forsake that supposed Mulphaba, and again yield their dutiful Obedience unto their true and undoubted Sovereign Amurath. These words delivered unto them by Mahomet, whom they generally both revered and trusted, wrought such effect in their minds, that some presently adventured to swim over the River, and joynted themselves unto him; and many others that stayed still, began now to doubt lest they had worshipped a wrong Saint. At the same time also, Eroafes Bajla, to terrify Mulphaba, sent unto him Letters as in great secret, advertising him, that Amurath had the next night purposed with his Army to pass over the River above the broken Bridge; at which time the chief Captains of his Army being (as he said) corrupted, had promised to deliver Mulphaba into his hands, and with his Head to pay the Ransom of them all. This he coloured with such fair glosses, that Mulphaba partly believed the same. So when the dead time of the night was come, Eroafes with certain Troops of Horsemen passed over the River, at the very same place he had in his Letters named; and that with such a noise and tumult, as if Amurath with his whole Army had been coming. Mulphaba seeing things begin thus to work according as Eroafes Bajla had before written; and with this, doubting also to be presently betrayed, and carrying about him a guilty Conscience (the Mother of Fear and Distrust) took Horse, (flenderly accompanied but with ten persons of his whole Army) and fled in haste, no man pursuing them, until he came to the River of Boga, and there with a great Sum of Money obtained passage, by corrupting the Captain that dwelt in the Castle upon the passage of the River; and the third day after passing over the Strait of Hellefponus, landed at Callipolis. The flight of Mulphaba once known in his Army, they all yielded themselves unto Eroafes Bajla, who taking possession of Mulphaba's Tent, caused the broken Bridge to be repaired; whereby Amurath passing with his Army, joynted himself with Eroafes. The other Bajla Ibrahim, counselled Amurath to put to the Sword all those Rebels that had followed Mulphaba; but by the mediation of Eroafes (to whom they had yielded themselves) they were generally pardoned.

Amurath departing from Ullah or Espadum, came to Boga, and there langed up the Captain that had given Mulphaba passage. From thence he held on his way to Lampacum, intending to pursue Mulphaba into Europe; but being come to the Sea side he could find no passage, for that Mulphaba had caused all the shipping on that side, to be brought over into Europe. Yet at last Amurath by good fortune chanced upon a great Grenavy Ship, which he hired for four thousand Ducats to transport his Army, and so with much ado at length landed in Europe. Mulphaba seeing that Amurath was now come over, fled to Hadrianople, where he found such cold Entertainment, that fearing to be betrayed, he was glad to speed himself thence, thinking all the World too little to hide himself in; and so came to an obscure place in the Country of the Turks, called Kilid-Begaze. Germin, where the Soldiers came to pursue him, overtook him, and brought him bound to Amurath, then being at Hadrianople; by whose Commandment he was shamefully hanged from the Battlements of one of the highest Towers of the City, and there left to the Worlds Wonder.

This Mulphaba is of some Writers reported to have been in deed the Son of the great Sultan Bajazet, and that he was kept in prison all that long time, and thus at length set by the Greeks to trouble the State of the Turkish Kingdom; but the Turkish Histories report as before, calling him Dufne or counterfeit Mulphaba. And it is very likely, that if he had been one of the Sons of Bajazet, he would have found some means to have made some great stir long before that, as all the rest of the unquiet Brood of Bajazet did, which never rested until they had, like the Earth-born Brethren, one destroyed the other's besides that, their bloody Natures considered, it is very like, that Mahomet his younger Brother, who reigned in Hadrianople almost eight years, and was in League all that time with the Emperor of Constantinople, would for his more safety have got him into his own Power, if he had been in prison with the Emperor; or else have dispatched him, if he had been in prison with himself. All which I am the rather persuaded to think, for that Orchame a Child, the Son of Solyman, could find no safe place of abode at Constantinople in the Reign of Mahomet, but flying, was apprehended, and his eyes put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet; much less is it like, that Mulphaba, being a Warlike Prince, and his elder Brother, could have been so long preserved and kept in prison from his fury.

It fortuned in these late Broils (as oftentimes it doth with others in like case) divers of the Rebels Alapi, or Common Soldiers (whom he for his greater Countenance had apparelled and armed like Janizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Janizaries. Amurath his faithful Guard; whose lives indeed they spared, but using them with all the Delight and Indignities possible. Amongst the rest, one of the Janizaries being an hungry, brought two of these Alapi his prisoners unto a Cooks Shop, offering to sell them unto him for a little Victual; which the Cook refused refused to give him, as having no use for such unnecessary Servants. Wherewith the proud Janizary enraged, swore many a great oath, presently to cut off their Heads, and to give them for him, for ought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeem them. And like enough he was to have done, had not the Cooks, moved with pity, offered him for them both a sheep head; which the Janizary took for them, fearing that the Cook had given for them more than indeed they were worth. Which disgrace so long since done unto these Alapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproach in great contempt, by the malterful and insolent Janizaries, objected unto the whole body of the Alapi, the greatest part of the Turks huge Armies; of whom for all that the proud Janizaries make final reckoning, accounting them scarcely for Men, and in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a fadden sheeps head.

Amurath having at length with much ado thus pacified the dangerous Rebellion raised by the counterfeit Mulphaba both in Europe and Asia, was yet not a little grieved, to think how the fame had, to the great hazard of his Estate, been first plotted by the Greeks, and afterwards countenanced by the Greek Emperor, of whom he thought now to be revenged. And therefore sending before him Michael Ogli, his Lieutenant General in Europe, with his European Soldiers to invade the Country about Constantinople, followed himself after with the Janizaries and his Asian Forces; and incamping before the City, filled all that neck of land which lieth before it, from Sea to Sea. And so incamped, began right suddenly to batter the Walls, in hope so to have made a breach, and by the same to have entered the City; but finding the Walls of greater strength than he had before supposed, and the Defendants still repairing whatsoever the fury of his Artillery had beaten down or shaken, he ceased his Battery, and coming on with all his Forces, desperately attempted by Assault to have gained the City; wherein his Fortune was not answerable to his Desires; for approaching the City, with Arrows as showers falling upon the Defendants, and scaling-Ladders in the mean time clapt up to the Walls, and the Janizaries with other of his best Soldiers valiantly mounting the same, they were by the Defendants notably repulsed and beaten down, losing some of their hands, some their Arms, some their Heads, but most their Lives, no Shot falling in vain from the Walls. Which Amurath beholding and grieved to see (though unwilling) commanded a Retreat to be founded, and the Assault given over; and shortly after seeing no hope to prevail, in great rage raised his Siege and departed. Unto whom for all that the Greek Emperor not long after sent his Embassadors to intreat with him for Peace; whereof he would by no means hear, but proudly threatened to be ere long of all his wrongs revenged; which caused the Greek Emperor to devise what he might for the troubling of his Estate, so to keep him otherwise busied; as he did shortly after with the Caramanian King, by countenancing another Mulphaba (surnamed Cutuzog or the Little) Amurath's younger Brother, against him, to the raising of new Stirs, and Amurath his no small trouble.

Mahomet the late King had five Sons and five Daughters, who Amurath was well beloved, and succeeded in his Fathers Kingdom; Mulphaba the second, firmamed the Little, Aschmet the third, who died before his Father; the other two; Joseph and Machmet, both died of the Plague, being but Children, after the death of their Father. Three of their Sisters were married to the three Sons of the King of Caramania, Ibrahim, Aladin, and Ija; the other two were bestowed upon the Sons of the Prince Ispendiar, Ibrahim, and Cajimer; the sixth was given in marriage to Cezar-Beg Vice-Roy of Anatolia; and the seventh, pity, offered him for them both a sheeps head; which the Janizary took for them, fearing that the Cook had given for them more than indeed they were worth. Which disgrace so long since done unto these Alapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproach in great contempt, by the malterful and insolent Janizaries, objected unto the whole body of the Alapi, the greatest part of the Turks huge Armies; of whom for all that the proud Janizaries make final reckoning, accounting them scarcely for Men, and in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a fadden sheeps head.

At such time as Amurath was busied in his Wars in Europe, against Mulphaba the supposed Son of Bajazet; the younger Son of Mahomet (called also Mulphaba) being but thirteen years old, and Amurath his Brother indeed, was set up to raise new Troubles, by the King of Caramania and other Princes, as well Mahometans, as the Christian Princes of Grecia; who thought it good policy, by that means to impeach the greatness of Amurath. This young Prince Mulphaba strengthened with the Forces of his Friends, entered into his Brothers Dominions in Asia, and besieged Nice, which was at length yielded unto him. Amurath advertised of this new Rebellion, by great Gifts and large Promises corrupted Ilan Beg, the young Princes Tutor, to betray the Prince into his hands. Whereupon Amurath with great celerity set forward with his Army from Hadrianople, and in nine days came to Nice, where he entered the City with small resistance, as was to him before promised, where Mulphaba was by his false Tutor to him presented; who because he would not spill one drop of the sacred Osman blood, (as the Turks call it) commanded the Executioner presently to strangle him with a Bow-string; which was done accordingly, and his body afterwards buried by his Father at Praga.

Amurath having suppressed these two Rebellions, and now out of all fear of any Competitor, thought his five Counsellors too many by three, and therefore removed the three Baffaces, Onure, Uruzi, and Alis (the Sons of Temurafes) into honourable Places, retaining of his Council, only the two old Baffaces, Ibrahim and Eroafes. But shortly after, Eroafes was severely accused to Amurath, that he fought by his Favorites, the Soldiers of the Court, to aspire unto the Kingdom himself, and to depose the King; and that intending some such matter, he did usually wear a Privy-Court. This suspicious Report troubled the jealous Tyrant; wherefore on a time as he rid accompanied with Eroafes, he cast his Arm about him, as if it had been in kindness; but finding him secretly armed, would needs know the cause thereof; whereunto Eroafes answered, That it was for fear of some Enemies he had in the Court; but this Excuse could by no means serve his turn; wherefore he was forthwith apprehended by the Commandment of Amurath, and both his Eyes burnt out with a hot Steel glass.

Whilst Amurath was thus busied in fubduing Rebellions at home, Machmet, the Caramanian King besieged Antiochia, a great City in Syria, by the space of six months, which was valiantly defended by Hamza-Beg, Amurath's Lieutenant there; at which Siege the unfortunate King himself, as he was taking view of the City, was slain with a great shot out of the City; whereupon Ibrahim, which succeeded him in the Kingdom, brake up the Siege, and returned home to bury his Father. At this time also, Dracula Prince of Valachia, passing over Danubius, did the Turks much harm about Silistra, but was afterwards enforced to submit himself to Amurath, and become his Tributary.

Smyrna, which had before aided the Rebel Musapha, did by all means could vex and molest Jasir-beg, (Amurath his Lieutenant in Adonia) and having by chance taken his Brother Prisoner, put him to death. This Prince of Smyrna was defended of the ancient Princes of Adonia, and therefore pretended an interest in that Signiory; which his Claim the people of the City, secretly favoured, so far as they durst for fear of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harms that this Prince of Smyrna did, commanded Hamze-beg, Vice-Roy of Anatolia, with all his Power to make War upon him. The Vice-Roy without delay assembled a great Army, and invaded the Princes Country; and the Prince being well provided for his coming, meeting him upon the way, gave him battle; wherein Hafan the Princes Son, leading a great part of his Fathers Army, had put one part of the Turks Army to flight; and pursuing them with too much fury, left his Father at the same time so hardly beset by the Vice-Roy, that he was glad to fly to his Castle of Hafly left by Hafan returning from the chase of the Enemy, not knowing what had happened to his Father; was by the Turks in his return overcome and taken Prisoner. After which Victory the Vice-Roy presently laid Siege to the Castle wherein the Prince was. This Siege continued a great while; at length the Prince brought to extremity, and yielded himself to the Vice-Roy, upon condition he should use no violence against the Person of himself or his Son, but to send them Prisoners unto Amurath; which thing the Vice-Roy by solemn Oath promised, whereupon the Prince came out of the Castle, and yielded himself Prisoner to the Vice-Roy. Jasir-beg, the Count by which the Prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the Vice-Roy to his Tent, where finding Hafan the Princes Son sitting upon the ground, as the manner of the Turks is, took him by the choler with great fury, and drawing him along to the Feet of the Prince his Father, threw most cruelly from off his head; and in the same rage laying his bloody hands upon the aged Prince, struck off his head also, to the great dishonour of the Vice-Roy, who had before given his Faith for their safety. The heads of the Prince and his Son were set upon two Laurels, within the sight of the Castle; which the Defendants seeing, and now despairing of all rescue, yielded themselves with the Castle. This infamous Trajan was the last Prince of Smyrna, after whose death all his Territory was united to the Ottoman Kingdom. After all these Troubles, Amurath with great Triumph married the Daughter of the Prince Isfendiar.

The Thessalonica being.

Amurath having laid up in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian Princes had done, in giving Aid to the Rebels aforesaid, thought it now high time to take revenge of that wrong; and for that purpose gathered a great Army, wherewith he ranged at his pleasure through Macedonia, until he came to Thessalonica, surpising by the way divers Cities and Castles, at that time belonging to the Constantinopolitan Empire. This famous City of Thessalonica, now called Salonica, for beauty and wealth sometime not inferior to any of the greatest and most renowned Cities of Grecia, is situate upon the Borders of Macedonia, close unto a Bay upon the Archipelago of the Sea Egeum; which Bay was in ancient time called Thermaen-Sinus, and now the Bay of Salonica. To the Christian Congregation there dwelling, St. Paul wrote two Epistles, in the latter whereof, he forewarneth them of a great Defection to come before the latter day. Before this Christian City, then in the Protection of the Venetians, Amurath encamped his great Army of misbelieving Turks; and laid hard Siege to it with most terrible Battery; at which time he by secret means corrupted certain of the wicked Citizens, to have betrayed the City by a secret Mine, and to have let him in, which Treason was by the Venetian Governors perceived, and the Plotters thereof for safe-guard of their lives glad to leap over the Walls, and to fly into the Turks Camp.

Amurath having greatly battered the Walls of the City, the more to encourage his Soldiers, promised to give them all the Spoil thereof, if they could by force win it. The greedy desire of this rich Prey, wherein every common Soldier promised unto himself whatsoever his foolish fancy or unbridled affection could desire, so inflamed the minds of these barbarous Soldiers, and especially of the Janizaries, that giving a most terrible Assault to the City, they by force entered the same, and won it. The Venetian Soldiers fled to their Gallies, lying at Anchor in the Haven, and so got to Sea; but the infinite miseries which the poor Christian Citizens endured in the fury of that barbarous Nation, no Tongue is able to express, or Pen describe; death was left pain to them the ignominious Outrages and unfeeling Villanies which many of these Christians there suffered, heartily wishing to die, and could not; and yet the furious Enemies sword devoured all the people, without respect of Age or Sex, except such as for strength of body, or comeliness of person, were reserved for painful labour or beastly lust; which poor souls were afterwards dispersed into most miserable servitude and slavery, through all parts of the Turkish Kingdom. The infinite Riches of that famous City, became a spoil unto the barbarous Soldiers; the goodly Houses were left desolate, void of Inhabitants. Thus the beautiful City of Thessalonica, sometime one of the most glorious Ornaments of Grecia, the late pleasant dwelling-place of many rich Christians, was by the Tyrant given for an habitation to such base Turks, as at their pleasure repaired thither to sat themselves, and to is by them at this day polluted. This Calamity happened to Thessalonica, in the year of our Lord, 1539.

The Thessalonica taken by Amurath.

Thessalonica being thus taken, Amurath returned to Hadrinople himself, and at the same time sent Caratz with the greatest part of his Army into Aetolia. Charles Prince of that Country dying a little before the coming of Amurath to Thessalonica, and having no lawful Issue, had divided the Country of Aetolia amongst his three base Sons, Mamon, Ternus, and Hercules, leaving all the rest of his Dominion to his Brothers Son, called also Charles. But shortly after, such discord fell among these Brethren, that Amurath sending his Turks to Aid one of them against the other, as he was by them requested, in time brought all that Country of Aetolia into Subjection to Himself, leaving nothing for the foolish Brethren to strive for, more than the bare titles of imaginative Honour. The other Grecian Princes of Athens, Phocia, Beotia, and all the rest of Grecia, unto the frast of Corinth, terrified by their Neighbours harms, were glad to submit themselves to the barbarian Yoke, and to become Tributaries unto the Turkish Tyrant; under which slavery they of long time most miserably lived, if intolerable slavery joyed with Infidelity may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians lost their Liberty, which their Ancestors had many times before, to their immortal Praife, Praife, worthily defended against the greatest Monarchs of the World, and are now so degenerate, by the means of the Turkish Oppression, that in all Grecia is hardly to be found any small remembrance of the ancient Glory thereof; inasmuch that whereas they were wont to account all other Nations barbarous in comparison of themselves, they are now become no less barbarous, than those rude Nations whom they before scorned. Whom many with a thousand more, they may justly impute to their own Ambition and Difcord.

At this time, amongst the distressed Princes of Macedonia and Grecia, one John mightily reigned in Epirus; who seeing how mightily the Turk prevailed against the Princes his Neighbours, and considering that he was not able by any means to withstand so puissant an Enemy; to obtain Peace, he was glad to deliver into Amurath his Possession, his four Sons, Stanislaus, Reposius, Constantine, and George, for Hostages; whom Amurath faithfully promised, well and honourably to entertain. But as soon as he had got them within his reach, he falsified his Faith, and caused them to be circumcised after the Turkish manner, and to be intruded in the Turkish Superstition, to the great grief of their Christian Parents; and afterwards, when he understood of the death of John Cyprian their Father, he poisoned all the three elder Brethren; and by Sebaly (one of his great Captains) seized upon Crovia, his chief City, and all the rest of his Territories, as if they had by good right devolved unto him. But George the youngest, whom the Turks named Scander-beg, or Lord Alexander, for his excellent Feature, and pregnant Wit, he always entirely loved, as some thought, more passionately than he should have loved a Boy. Him he caused to be diligently instructed in all kind of activity and feats of War, wherein he excelled all other his Equals in Amurath his Court; and rising by many degrees of Honour, came at last (being yet but very young) to be a great Sanzack or Governor of a Province, and was many times appointed by Amurath to be General of his Armies; in which Service he so behaved himself, that he got the love of all that knew him, and increased his credit with Amurath; until at last he found opportunity by great policy and courage, to deliver both himself and his native Country from the horrible slavery of the Turkish Tyranny, as shall be afterwards declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus danted the Princes of Grecia, he turned his Forces into Servia; but the Prince of Servia unable to withstand so mighty an Enemy, to procure his Favour, sent Embassadors, offering to pay him a yearly Tribute, and to do further what he should reasonably demand. Amurath before the yearly Tribute, required to have Mary (his Princes fair Daughter) in marriage; and that he should not suffer the Hungarians to pass through his Country to invade him; and further, not at any time to deny passage unto the Turkish Army, when he should send forth the same for the Invasion of the Kingdom of Bosnia. All which unreasonable conditions the Prince was glad to agree unto, and sent his fair Daughter by Saratz, who was afterwards married to Amurath.

A Plague among the Turks.

About this time, Josephus and Macchabeus, Amurath his Brethren, and Orchanes the Son of Solyman, who had his Eyes put out by his Uncle Malomet, with many other Men of great account among the Turks, died of the Plague at Prusa.

Whilst Amurath was thus busied in his Wars in Europe, the King of Caramania his Brother in law, invaded his Dominions in Asia; for so it was agreed between the Christian Princes of Europe, and the Mahometan Princes of Asia, to whom the greatness of the Ottoman Kingdom was now become dreadful, That whenever he invaded the Christians in Europe, the Mahometan Princes should invade his Countries in Asia; and that whenever he should turn his Forces into Asia, the Christian Princes should spoil his Countries in Europe. Against this Caramanian King, Amurath transported his Army into Asia; and as he went, seized upon the Countries of Sarcania, Mantolia, and other Princes, which were before but Tributaries unto him, driving out the poor Princes before him; and to enter into Caramania, and enforced the King so far, that he was glad to agree to such conditions of Peace as he pleased him to propound unto him, and to send his Son to wait at his Court. And at the same time picking a Quarrel with Isfendiar Prince of Caspiana, caused him to become his Tributary, and to send his Son to his Court also. By which means the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan Princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his Troubles in Asia, he returned to Hadrinople; and understanding that the Hungarians, having overcome Danubius, had in his absence made divers Incursions into his Dominions, he was therewith greatly offended; and in Revenge thereof first sent Atis Bassa the Son of Eurenjes, with an Army to invade Hungary, which he performed according by the space of a month, and returned from thence with rich Booty. Not long after, he himself in Person made another Road into Hungary, commanding the Prince of Servia his Father in law, to give his Army free passage through his Country; and charging Dracula Prince of Valachia to aid him with his Forces in that Expedition; which his Commandment both the Christian Princes (more for fear, than of good will) diligently performed. So Amurath having enriched his Soldiers with the spoil taken in Hungary, returned home and wintered at his Court at Hadrinople.

The secret Confederation between the Hungarians, and the Mahometan King of Caramania, was not unsuspected of Amurath; which he was rather induced to believe, for that whenever he invaded the one, he was presently set upon by the other, either in Europe or in Asia; of which Plot he doubted not but that George Prince of Servia (his Father in law) was chief Author, although in they he was therein the least Actor. Wherefore Amurath intending to spoil the Play, sent for the Prince his Father in law to come to the Court of Hadrinople; but he doubting some Turkish Tragedy, pretended great occasions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterwards fell out, fortified and manned all his strong Cities and Castles by all means he could possibly, especially his chief City Semendre (otherwise called Spendervia), and left therein his Son Gregory (or as some call him, George) as Governor; for his other Son Stephen was long before in Amurath his Court, with the Queen his Sister. The Prince of Servia himself went into Hungary to procure from thence some Aid, having there also himself certain Territories, which he had in exchange of Sigismundus (late Emperor and King of Hungary) for the City of Belgrade. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the Affinity and League he had with the Prince his Father in law, entered with a great Army into Servia, destroying all before him, and hardly besieged Semendre; where after long Siege the young Governor (the Princes Son) doubting to fall into the Enemies hands by fudden Assault, yielded himself, with the City; which thing discouraged the rest of the Servians, that in short time, Sophia, Novomont, with all the rest of the Cities of Servia, were yielded into the Power of Amurath. After which Conquest he returned to Hadrinople, and hearing that the Prince of Servia with the Hungarians, were making head against him, and that the two young Servian Princes, Gregory and Stephen, his Wives Brethren, had Intelligence with their Father, he commanded them both to be caft in prison at Dydemetium, and their Eyes cruelly to be burnt out with a brazen Baton made red hot; a common unmerciful practice among the Turks.

About this time, Albertus Duke of Austria, having before married Elizabeth the only Daughter of Sigismund the Emperor, and succeeding his Father in law both in the Empire and Kingdom of Hungary (unto which Title of highest Honour nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigismund) in the second year of his Reign, before he was well settled in those new achieved Honours, died of the Flux, as he was making great preparation against Amurath the Turkish King, who having lately driven George Prince of Servia and Rascia out of his Dominions, had now extended the Turkish Kingdom even unto the borders of Hungary. This Albertus dying, left his Wife great with child. The Hungarians, in whose minds the remembrance of Sigismund was yet fresh, could have been contented to have lived under the Government of the Queen his Daughter, the Widow of Albertus (then great with child); but that Turkish King was now grown to great, and come to high, that it was thought more than needfully by John Hunyadi, and other of the Hungarian Nobility, for the defence of that Kingdom, not wholly to rest upon the devotion of the people toward the Queen, and the expectation of her Issue, whereby they should be nothing strengthened; but to make choice of some great Prince, by whose Power they might the better defend themselves and the Kingdom against their dangerous Enemies. Whereupon with consent of the Queen, it was resolved upon, to make choice of Uladislaus, the young King of Polonia, then a Prince of great Power, but of far greater Fame and Expectation; and by Embassadors to offer unto him the marriage of the Queen, and with her, the Kingdom also. This Embassy being sent unto Uladislaus, the matter was to and fro debated in the Polonian Court, Whether it were to be accepted of or not? Some began to speak of the inequality of the Match, considering that the King was but in the prime of his Youth, and the Queen well steep into years, urging favours, that nothing was feared in that Match but Wars; and that the Hungarians therein fought for nothing more, than by the Polonian Forces to defend themselves against the Turks. Others of the contrary opinion, said, That the uniting of those two mighty Kingdoms would be to the great good of them both, and to the great Honour of the King, whose very name would thereby become terrible unto the Turks; and that it were greater policy, by the Forces of both the Kingdoms, to keep the Turkish King from entering into Hungary, than to leave that Kingdom to fight for a prey, and afterward be informed to fight with the same Enemy in the heart of Polonia. And as for inequality of years betwixt the King and the Queen, it was not so great a matter, that in regard thereof to honourable and commodious Alliance should be rejected; for as much as Princes do more regard the Vertues of their Choice, with the increase of their Honour and Wealth of their Kingdoms, than the Summer-Fruit of Youth and Beauty, which of it self in short time doth rot and perish, although it be never so carefully kept and preserved; and that for as much as there can be but one King in a Kingdom, such choice was to be preferred of Kings as had not therein the greatest hope of many Children. After long deliberation, Uladislaus gave answer to the Embassadors, That he would accept of the Offers by them made, whereupon they then returned to make Relation to the Queen, and some of them stayed behind to haften the King forward. But whilst these things were a doing, the Queen in the mean time was delivered of a fair Son, whom she caused to be baptized and named Ladislaus. After the birth of this Child, the Queen moved with a Motherly affection, began to repent her self, that she had given her consent for the calling in of the Polonian King, to the prejudice of her. And being animated by some of the Hungarian Nobility (who presuming of the good Grace they were in with the Queen, hoped to grow great therein, if they might first draw the Government of that Kingdom to the Queen and her young Son) determined now by all means to exclude the Polonian King; but the greater part of the Nobility better considering what was most expedient for the present Estate, and that they could neither with Honour or Safety fly from that which was before (for the common good) by the Embassadors concluded, continued firm in their former Resolution for the bringing in of Uladislaus; so that by this means, some taking part with the Queen and her young Son, and others standing fast for Uladislaus, the Kingdom of Hungary was divided into two Factions, and as it were rent in pieces, and so grew to Civil Wars. The Queen with such as favoured her Claim, the more to gain the minds of the common people (which are many times no less carried away with shews than matter) caused her Son Ladislaus (being then but three months old) solemnly to be Crowned King at Alba Regalis, the usual place for the Coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Polonian King had entered into Hungary with a goodly Army, and joyined his Forces with his Friends, most part of them which before followed the Queen and her Son, revolted unto Uladislaus. So that when the had done what she could, she was glad at last to commit the tuition of her Son, together with the Crown of Hungary, unto Frederick the Third, then Emperor; never ceasing for all that, to the uttermost of her Power, to trouble the Government of Uladislaus, continually uniting a great Wars against him both at home and abroad, until that at the last by her death her quarrel took end, together with his life.

In the middle of these Civil Wars, Amurath thought a fair opportunity presented unto him, to make an Entrance unto the Conquest of Hungary, which Kingdom he had in his ambitious mind already devoured. And therefore gathering a great Army, he marched along the River Danubius, until he came to the strong City of Belgrade, called in ancient time Taurunum, and of some Alba Graeca, but now commonly Grecia Weisenburg. This City is inhabited on the East side with the famous River of Savus or Save, which runs forth into Danubius; and on the other two sides is defended with strong Walls, with deep deep and large Ditches; and was then accounted the Gate or Entrance into Hungary. Unto this City Amurath at his first coming gave two terrible Assaults, and was in good hope to have won the same, but yet was both times valiantly repulsed, with great laughter of his men. Wherefore finding it to be a matter of more difficulty than was by him at the first supposed, he began to raise Mounts against the City, and high Towers of Wood to annoy the Defendants, and furiously battered the Walls. At this time also he caused great numbers of Gallies and small Pinnaces to be brought into both the Rivers of Danubius and Savo, to assault the City on those parts where was least feared, and by that means also to keep them of the City from all Succors to be sent that way out of Hungary. Yet for all he could do or devise, the City was still valiantly defended by the Christian Soldiers, which under the leading and conduct of Johannes Uranus a Florentine, Governor thereof, with often sallies and continual Shot flew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this Siege, Uladislaus King of Polonia, and lately Elect King of Hungary, was fore troubled by the Queen and her Faction in Hungary; which thing the Turkish King knew right well, and thereupon continued his Siege, although Famine began greatly to increase in his Camp; hoping in nothing more, than that the Defendants despairing of help from the King, would in short time yield up the City. Uladislaus being so intangled with Civil Wars, as is aforesaid, that he could not possibly prepare such Force as might relieve the besieged City; yet forasmuch as the Turkish King lay not long before by his Embassador required to join with him in League and Amity, he thought good now to assay if he could raise the Siege, by sending unto him the like Embassage. Whereupon he sent Dobrogosius, Othorogemus, and Lucas Gersicus, three of the Polonian Nobility, Embassadors unto Amurath; declaring unto him, That for so much as he had offered by his Embassadors, to join with him in League before he came out of Polonia, the remembrance thereof had taken such deep impression in his mind, that he would not take up Arms against him, although it were in his own just defence, before he had offered him reasonable Conditions of Peace; wherefore if he would desist from invading Hungary (whereof Uladislaus was now by God his permission, and consent of the people, chosen King) and to raise the Siege, that then they should afterwards easily agree upon the desired Peace; in concluding whereof, he should not find Uladislaus inferior to himself in any manner of Princely courtesy; but if he had rather proceed in Arms, and to make proof of his strength, he would then do the best that he could, to make him know that he was of sufficient Power, in so just a quarrel to withstand his greatest Forces, and to revenge the Wrongs to him done. When Amurath had received this Embassage, he appointed the Embassadors to withdraw themselves for a while to Synderovia (a City of Servia, not far off) until he might better consider of their demands; pretending, that he did it for their safety; but as appeared afterwards, secretly resolving with himself, presently to do his utmost devil, for the gaining of the City, and upon the Success thereof to shoop them answer accordingly. Wherefore to soon as the Embassadors were departed to Synderovia, he first by his Messengers assayed the minds of the Citizens and Soldiers with magnificent Promises of large Liberties, and infinite Rewards and Preferments, if they would yield up the City; and many Arrows with Letters made fast unto them, full of like Promises, were at the same time shot into the City. But when he saw no hope to prevail by that means, he called together the Captains and Commanders of his Army, and there in the presence of them all, spake unto them as followeth:

Although I know it is in mine own Power, to the same grant, or not to grant, the Peace whereof our Enemies have made a motion; yet it is my pleasure (worthy Soldiers) to know your minds also. For I have much as we have that War in hand, wherein with my sorrowful Felicity, (whereof amongst you I hold the chief glory) I also enlarged our Religion, and purity of Belief of Life; the defence and care whereof equally begrade longed unto us all; for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our Vocation, and living here, yet after death we all hope for one and the self same Felicity. And therefore I would have you to understand all that I shall say, as proceeding not of any regard of mine own Private, but upon the consideration of the Common Good of you all. For as concerning mine own Estate, I possess so large Countries in Asia, such great Dominions in Europe, that either part thereof (in good time be it said) might form a sufficient Kingdom; so that perhaps it might be better band with my Estate, to take more care, for keeping of that I have, than to travel for the gaining of more; but you are to consider with your selves, whether you have every man sufficient to suffice himself or not, and how long you think your selves assured of the same; and moreover, that together with these worldly things, we shall be driven at length to forsake our Profession and Religion, if we shall now lay down Arms. For our Enemies require, that we should first cease from War, and then afterwards they think it meet to talk of Peace. I will not speak of the Indignity, that men besieged, and in evil plight, should propound conditions of Peace to them that besiege them, and are well furnished of all things; that feeble and cowardly men should promise Peace unto courageous and expert Soldiers; I omit what labour and pains we have taken in laying our Siege, in raising of Mounts, in making of Shipping, all which our Enemies command us to forsake, as if they had us already bound or caged up in hold, as we have them. All Bulgaria, and the greater part of Rascia is now by us conquered, and most part of Servia is at our Command; all which places are by us either to be kept, or else all the rest of that we possess in Europe, is with them to be quite lost and forsaken. Whosoever shall have in their Power this City which we besiege (and that our Enemies know right well) shall have not only as it were a Fortress and Bulwark of defence for his own, but also a Caffle and Entrance for the subduing of others. The Kingdom of Hungary is now divided in it self, and full of domestic Sedition; neither is it so much strengthened by the uniting of the Kingdom of Polonia, as it is by itself division weakened. And in this motion of Peace nothing is sought for, but to gain time for the raising of their private Quarrels, that they may afterwards with their double Forces set upon us. For if we shall break up our Siege before we have won the City, they will easily find delays so long to protract the conclusion of Peace, until that either Uladislaus his good Fortune, or else the Hungarians wearying of themselves, better advised, shall make an end of their Civil Wars. What manner and conditions of Peace will they then require of us, when they are at Unity amongst themselves, and in Arms against us; seeing that now being in danger with mutual Discord, and almost by us vanquished, they think it reasonable (as if they had won the Field) that we should first raise up our Sieges, and then intent of Peace? Their proud Demands for the Restoration of Bulgaria and Rascia, with other Countries and Cities won by our travel and danger, already found in mine ears; which if we shall refuse to grant, not only the Hungarians being then at Unity among themselves, but also the Poles, joined with us, will bring those Wars home to our doors, which we now at great advantage make upon them, troubled with discord and civil broils. And if for desire of Peace we could be content to yield unto such shameful and miserable Conditions, and restore unto them all they should or reason could desire, as you see the Prince of Servia did, who contented with his own subjects languish mind (I am sure) being inflat with the combining of two such mighty Kingdoms, thinketh not only of the recovery of that he hath lost, but even now gazeth at all that is Ours in Europe. He will not think himself satisfied, before he (having brought the Hungarian and Polonian Forces against us) shall see the same havoc and spoil made in our Kingdom with Fire and Sword, which he hath before seen made by us in his own. Where if his Fortune should answer his Designs (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) desire all the miserable and intolerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angry Conqueror, is accounted with them for a godly and religious Work, to use all cruel and unchristianlike Violence against our Nation, except we will forsake the Faith and Religion delivered unto us by our Ancestors, and follow their new and incredible Ceremonies. Neither do they think they can more easily and effectually procure the Favour of God with any kind of Sacrifice or Service, than by overthrowing and profaning our Temples, by setting on fire our Cities, and by Rites and Ceremonies, by forswearing our Religion and Princes, and that you may know all the Fury whereunto they rage against us and our Religion, they account all them for holy Saints (whom dead in fight against us). There is no cause (valiant Soldier) that upon the vain hope of Peace, we should expect whilst the Enemy doth rage and unrelenting Violence against us, especially such an Enemy as propounds not spoil and worldly Honour, but Immortality itself, as a reward of his Victory. We have already taken much more labour than we have to take, we have filled the Ditches with refuse; labour, we have cast up Bulwarks equal with the Walls, and part of the Walls we have beaten even with the ground, so that you see the Town hath opened; and that Town, by gaining whereof, all that Ours is, may be made safe and quiet; and that which our Enemy possesseth, subject to our spoil and prey. If you will but a little enslave your selves, as men mindful of our good Fortune and forwardness, you shall find our Temples, our Sacrifices, our Religion, all worldly and heavenly felicity to be then assured unto us, when as you shall tomorrow overthrow the very Foundation of the Enemies Wall. Then (courageous Soldier) we may cry, Victory, not for the present, but for ever. If this War should bring unto us nothing else but an assured security of our Estate, it were sufficient reward; for which we might cheerfully be content to encounter all dangers, and to challenge in Combat even death itself. But at this Victory doth defend all our things, as with a deep Trench, or sure Wall, so doth it lay open and expose all our Enemies Dominions unto danger and spoil. Hitherto we have striven with Nature herself in the rough and abrupt Mountains of Bulgaria and Rascia, where we were to strive with Hunger, Thirst, Labour, and Disparation; all them we have overcome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attain unto the Wealths of fruitful Hungary, from whence we must fetch the garden of our Victory, and the ground of our Glory. We are come to the Gates, which being laid open, we are not to pass over unscathed Rivers, or marsh Deserts, but we shall go through most pleasant places, as they by Nature her self, and the industry of man; where the temperateness of the Air, and lively Springs, with the fruitfulness of the Soil, doth every where yield plenty of all manner of food both for Man and Beast, not only to serve for Natures necessity, but even to give our soldiers desire. What thing soever curious and desirous hardly brought forth in other places, the fertility of the Soil yieldeth plentifully of it self; so that it is to be thought, that Nature adorned Hungary with a certain extraordinary Care, when as she would set forth a pattern of good Husbandry for other Countries to imitate. Neither hath she in any place been more bountiful in bestowing her rich Gifts; for besides the Corn, which she plentifully gives up, and Gold, which other men most painfully dig up, and in few places, the Hungarians gather to their use, as if it were a growing Plant. It is in your power (worthy Soldier) whether you will to tomorrow open a way to all these good things for your selves for ever, or else leave the way open for your Enemies unto all that you hold. I would that you could remember when they you hold, that all the floor of happy Fortune is laid open unto you for a Prey, without any other defence, without any other Garrison, without any other Keeper; and that behind you are your Wives, Children, your Houses, your Temples, and Religion, together with the rewards of all your former Victories, over whom, except you save this City, the fury and insolency of the victorious Enemy will most cruelly and shamefully insult. I, according as I shall see you fight at the Breach to morrow, shall easily perceive how you are set down to Command as Conquerors, or else as Slaves to be commanded; and also what to answer to the most insolent Demands of the proud Embassadors. In the mean time make up your minds, and together with your Armour have all the fury of kings, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may assault the Breach.

The Turkish Captains for that time joyfully departed, as if they had been already assured of the Victory, and so they took good things which Amurath had so lively before their eyes. The next morning very early, Amurath commanded the Assault to be given to a great Breach which he had made in the Wall with continual Battery: the Soldiers with great courage assailed the Breach, especially the Janizaries, who under the leading of Malik Basha valiantly won the fame, and were entering the City with assured hope of Victory. The Christians seeing all in danger, were to be lost, running to the Breach from all parts of the City, so forcibly charged the proud Janizaries on every side, that they were glad to retire with more haste than they before retired; in which Retreat many of them were slain, and the rest flying out at the Breach, were either slain, or burnt to death in the Town-Ditch with Wild-fire; whereof the Defendants had cast great store upon the Turks at the Breach, which having taken hold upon the Faggots, Hurdles, and other light matter, wherewith the Turks had taken the sudden made their way over the Town-Ditch, did so terribly burn the Turks, Janizaries which had entered the Breach, being again repulsed, were in that fiery Lake consumed, or else with smoke strangled. In this Assault Amurath is reported to have lost 8000. of his best Men, beside 7000 others overwhelmed or strangled in the Mines, by the Countermine of the Christians. The other party burnt Turks, which at the same time assaulted the City by Water, out of their Gallies and small Ships, had as evil or rather worse Success; many of them were sunk with great Shot, and some burnt by the fire cast from the Walls, and so fired one another; and divers of them in that sudden fear, for avoiding of that present danger, ran a ground upon the shells in the River, ready to slip. Amurath wonderfully discouraged with the slaughter slaughter of his men, and shamefully beaten from the Assault, returned to his Camp with his Turks, much like men which had lately escaped from some great shipwreck. And thus partly by Famine, and partly by the Defendants force, having lost the greatest part of his Army, he determined now after seven months Siege to return home. Yet because he would not encourage his Enemies by shewing his fear, he sent for the Embassadors into the Camp, and with stern Countenance answered them in this sort:

We will (said he) then talk of Peace, when Uladislav shall deliver unto us all that part of Rascia which he yet holdeth, and also this City of Belgrade as a pledge of the League. And for this time I will raise my Siege, to give Uladislav time to advise himself; yet I would wish him rather to accept of my friendship upon these Conditions, than by denying that little which he demandeth, to hazard the State of both his Kingdoms. I bid him that when it shall come by Law of Arms, before Uladislav was called into Hungary, and the Hungarians cannot transfer unto him that Right which they had not themselves. Wherefore if he will proceed rather to strive for that which is other men's, than quietly to possess his own, I will in good time repair hither again, with my God the Beholder and Revenger of Wrong.

With this Answer he dismissed the Embassadors, and forthwith rose with his Army, fore-representing his coming thither; yet because he would take something in his way, he left his Nephew Ira-Beg with certain Troops of Horsemen at Scopia in Servia, who he troubled the King of Bosnia, that he was glad to require Peace of Amurath, and to promise unto him a yearly Tribute of five and twenty thousand Ducats.

Uladislav newly elected King of Hungary, seeing that part of his Kingdom which is called Transylvania or Emilia, was by certain Troops of Horsemen to the Incursion of the Turks (who having got into their possession all the Country of Moldavia, and grown insolent by continual Victories, ceased not to invade and spoil the Country of Transylvania) for remedy of that daily mischief, created John Huniades Vayvod, or his Vicegerent in Transylvania. This Huniated (as some write) was Earl of Bispha, born in Poland; others say, that he was born but of mean Parents, and called Huniated of the Village wherein he was born, and grew to be great by his Vertue and Prowess. Whatsoever his Parents were, he himself was a politicque, valiant, fortunate, and famous Captain, his Victories so great, as the like was never before by any Christian Prince obtained against the Turks; so that his Name became unto them so dreadful, that they used the fame to fear their crying Children withall. This worthy Captain, according to the trust reposed in him, began to keep the Turks short, by cutting them off, whenever they presumed to enter into his Country; and also by shutting up the Passages whereby they were wont to forage the Country of Transylvania; and when he had put his own Charge into good safety, he entered into Moldavia, and never rested until he had won it quite out of the Turks hands: And not contented with this, passed many times over Danubius into the Turks Dominions, making havoc of the Turks, and carrying away with him great Booty, with many Captives.

Now were two great and worthy Captains met together, in places nigh one to another; Huniated in Transylvania and the next part of Hungary, and Ira in Rascia and the upper part of

Servia; the one lying at Temeswar, and the other at Sinderovia; both Men of great spirit, and desirous of Honour. Of these two, Ira in great favour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increase his credit with the Sultan his Uncle, and to enlarge the Bounds of the Turkish Kingdom committed to his Charge, continually foraged the Country about Belgrade, to the intent that having wearied the Inhabitants with the harms he daily did them, and brought the City into great wants, he might so at length gain the fame, for the most part abandoned then of Citizens, which Amurath could not but force obtain, and so to open a way into Hungary. Thus was the Country by him spoiled, the Villages razed and burnt, and great numbers both of Men and Cattel daily carried away; yea sometimes not contented to have spoiled the open Country, he assailed the very Suburbs of the City, and was thence hardly repulsed; and finding Huniated the only man that hindered his further proceedings, he requite him and provoke him the more, brake sometimes into his Country, laying in every corner as he went, strong Ambushes, so to have circumvented that wary Captain, if it had been possible. But he grieved to see the Country thus spoiled, and purposing thereof to be revenged, secretly raised a strong Power both of Horse and Foot, and with his Companion Nicolaus Vitch, a right valiant Captain, passing over Danubius, came and incamped between Belgrade and Sinderovia, being about twenty miles distant. Of whose coming Ira-Beg understanding, forthwith set forward with a great Army against him, lest he should by longer delay learn to stand in doubt of his Enemy, whom he had by many Injuries so often provoked. So marching on with his Army ranged in order of battle, he found Huniated as ready for battle as himself; who in both wings had placed his light Horsemen, and behind them his men at Arms, with certain Companies of Cross-bows on Horse-back; in the midst forth his armed Men, with his Archers, and other Soldiers more lightly armed, ready at all assaults, all strongly guarded with Men at Arms; after whom in the rearward followed also a strong Squadron of valiant Footmen. The signal of battle being given, there began a great and cruel Fight, as amongst men desirous either to overcome, or to be honoured, and end their days. At the first encounter the Wings of Huniated his battel were by the Turks enforced to retire; but coming to the Men at Arms, their fury was there staid, and a cruel battel fought, wherein many fell on both sides, but of the Turks more, who trusting to their agility and nimbleness of body, were unable long to endure the flock and strength of the Men at Arms, but were there by heaps overthrowen, and most miserably slain. Which Ira-Beg beholding, and perceiving the Hungarians courageously to fight, as men almost in possession of an assured Victory, to save himself, turned his back and fled to Sinderovia. The rest beholding the flight of their General, betook themselves to flight also, and whom the Hungarians fiercely followed, especially by Huniated himself, who by his example to animate the rest, left not the chase until he was come almost to the Suburbs of Sinderovia; few of the Turks escaped, the rest being either taken or slain. Huniated after so great a Victory, with a rich Prey and multitudes of Prisoners returned to Belgrade; having now sufficiently revenged himself of the wrongs he had before received. After which time Ira the Turk was more quiet, as having sufficient proof of his valour. The same fame of this Victory increased not a little the fame of Hunades, the report whereof coming to Buda, filled the City with joy and gladness; but most of all King Uladiſlaus, who thereupon caused publick Prayers, with Thanksgiving to be made in every Church; and by his Letters Gratulatory, with many rich Presents encouraged Hunades to the prosecution of the Religion. Was himself was propounded unto him not only the increase of his Wealth (a bafe regard in the honourable) but the immortality of his name, and hope of eternal bliss.

Not long after this Victory, Hunades obtained a far greater in Transylvania. For Amurath much grieved with the loss he had first by the death of his Baffas called Mefites (his Vice-Roy therein, a man of great Wildom, Experience, and Valour) with a puissant Army upon the sudden by the way of Valachia Transilvania, to invade Transilvania. This worthy Captain according to his charge departing out of Servia, and passing from Danubius, suddenly entered into Hunades his Country, burning and spoiling whatsoever came in his way, and killing all that he light upon, Man, Woman, and Child, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition, filling all the Country as he went with tumult and terror. Whereof Hunades (but lately come into the Country) understanding, and having as then no sufficient Forces to oppose against the Fury of so puissant an Enemy either means to raise any in so great a confusion and fear, was wonderfully grieved thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well knowing which way to turn himself. At length he took his flight into Alba Julia, unto his old Friend George Lepi Bishop of that City, a man of great Vertue and Gravity; but whilst he there flayeth with his Friend, about the raising of a tumultuary Army, the Enemy was now come near unto him; who having overrun the greatest part of the Country, had scraped together such a Boory, and taken such a multitude of Prisoners, that furcharged as it were with the spoil, he was glad to march off; yet still burning the Country before him. Which Hunades and the good Bishop beholding out of the City, so much grieved thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themselves, with an handful of men taken up in haste hand over head, too weak to encounter with their Enemies yet thought it better, with such Power as they had to go out, and to in defence of their Country honourably to die, than longer to behold the most miserable destruction of the same. But whilst they upon this Resolution (carried forth with too hot a desire of Revenge) march unduly forward, without any Scouts or Lifpals sent out before them, they fell before they were aware into such ambushes both of Horse and Foot, as the crafty Enemy had in the secret Woods and Vallies whereby they were to pass, laid of purpose to intercept them; which now with great loss and horrible Cruelties breaking out upon them on every side, difmayed them with a great fear. Hunades and the Bishop seeing themselves so entrapped and beset with the multitude of their Enemies, as that they must needs perish if they should longer fly, fled incontinently back again after whom followed all the Army of the Turks, and at their heels the eager Turks who spared none of the flying Christians they could overtake, but put them all to the Sword; nevertheless most part of them escaped back again to Alba Julia. The Bishop thinking to have saved himself by the swiftness of his Horse, coming to a River, in taking the fame was overthrown, and there by the Enemy slain. With whose death the Baffa encouraged, as also with the present Victory, began now more at liberty to range abroad; and at his pleasure with Fire and Sword to waste the part of the Country which yet remained unspoiled; leaving in the mean time (as a man out of fear) the rich Prey he had taken, together with his Baggage and Carriages, to be carried all together, as a notable Testimony of his Victory, unto his great Lord Amurath. Hunades in the mean time with wonderful celerity running about the borders of his Country, and out of every Town and Village taking such Soldiers as he could, periwaded also the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their Wives and Children to take up Arms; who all in respect of the present necessity cheerfully did whatsoever he commanded. With this tumultuary Army he followed the Baffa (who then in great pride was returning, laded with the spoil of the whole Country) with purpose to set upon him as time or place should give him occasion. In the mean time Mefites being told, that Hunades with a coming after him, and now even at hand is reported to have made no reckoning thereof, but to have proudly answered unto him that brought the News, Let him come, and with the spoil of himself enrich our Victory. There was present when he said this, one John, one of Hunades his Elfpals; who discovered unto him many of the Turks designs concerning the joyning of battel with him; but especially that the Baffa had commanded through his Army, That above all things, they should in the beginning of the battel assail the Person of Hunades himself, for that he being once slain, the rest would easily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction; and that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certain Companies of his best Souldiers, giving them certain Tokens whereby they might know both him and his Horse. There was then in the Army one Simon Kemene, a right valiant and courageous Gentleman, not much unlike to Hunades, with whom he changed both his Horse and Armour, appointing unto him a strong Troop of his choice Horsemen to attend upon him; neither was this counterfeite Hunades unwilling to expose himself unto the danger, accounting it honour enough, if by his death he might save the life of his Friend, and preserve to worthy a Defender of the Commonwealth. Hunades following fast after, the Baffa marching before him, fought by light Skirmishes, sometimes on the one side, sometimes on the other, and sometimes in the rearward, to stay him, and at some advantage, if any such were given, to fight with him before he should get out of the Country. At length finding such an opportunity as he thought good to lay hold upon, he with all his Forces, as if it had been a violent Tempest, came upon the Turks so suddenly, as that they had not time to put themselves in order of battel, but were glad confidently to rise, to fight with him without order; in which disorderd fight many fell on both sides, but far more of the Turks. But whilst both Armies with like obstinacy encountered together, certain Troops of the most valiant Turks deservyng Simon the counterfeite Hunades, and by the signs he delivered out to them, both of his Horse and Armour, supposing him to have been Hunades indeed; with all their Power made towards him, to have slain him, according as they had in charge, where meeting with right valiant Men, of no less courage than themselves, there was fought a most terrible and bloody battel, in such sort, as if in that very place should have been ended the whole Fortune of the Turks. But the Turks still bending their Forces more and more thither; for the killing of him of whom they stood in more dread than of all the rest; at length by plain force made a way unto him, and having slain them that were about him, though not without their own great loss, furiously assailing him, they fled almost supposing it to have been the very General himself; who had he there perished (as like enough it was he should, had he not been before warned of the Baffas purpose) no doubt but that the whole Country had been with him, or shortly after gone lost. But Hunades in the mean time riding to and fro in the Army, encouraged his Souldiers not to forsake the Victory they were now as it were in possession of, nor leave unrevengeed so many slaughters and harms so lately committed by their Enemies, but to remember as they were fighting, that they carried in their hands their Wives and Children, and were in that one battel to revenge the wrong by them done both to God and Man. Sometime he with new Supplies encouraged such as were overcharged, and even now ready to fly; otherwise he with cheerful words staid, that had already turned their backs; performing in every place all the parts both of a worthy Commander and valiant Souldier, as the necessity of the time and place required. In the heat of this battel (Fortune yet favouring neither part, but both fighting with all their Power) the Transilvanian Prisoners that in great number were kept in the Camp, willing rather to die, than to be carried away into Captivity, and thinking it now or never time for them to attempt their deliverance; with one confent brake asunder their Bonds, and with such Weapons as first came to hand, set upon their Keepers, of whom they slew a great number, and so desperately lifting out into the battel, encouraged their Countrymen, and discouraged their Enemies. Yet was the battel hardly fought, though not altogether with like courage, or for like cause; for why, the Transilvanians fought for their Country, their Wives, their Children, their Lives, their Liberty, their Religion, and Albans; but the Turks, for the rich Prey they had before taken, and that they were by Victory in hope of. But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the Prisoners (who laid about them like desperate men) out of hope of the Victory, began by little and little to retire; and the other on the contrary part by the unexpected Aid encouraged, and quickly finding the Enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before. Mefites seeing his Army thus in every part wavering, was therewith exceedingly troubled; but presently after, beholding some of his men retiring as if they had fled, and other some flying outright, and no means to stay them, for safeguard of his life turned his Horse and fled also; after whom the Hungarians followed with most terrible execution, as men desirous of the blood of them that had done them so great harm. In this chase Mefites himself with his Son were both slain; and the support of whole death in the pursuit, added swiftness unto the Hungarians, to the encreasing of the slaughter of the Turks, whom for the desire of Revenge they ceased not for certain days to pursue, unto the top of the Alps. In this battel were slain of the Turks 20000, and of the Hun- garians about 3000. Hunades with this Victory recovered all the Prey the Turks had taken of the spoil of the Country, together with their Tents and Baggage; unto whom at his return into the Camp, a wonderful number of the poor Captives came, and falling at his feet, and kissing them, gave God thanks for their deliverance by him; some called him the Father, some the Defender of his Country; the Souldiers, their invincible General; the Captives, their Deliverer, the Women, their Protector; the young Men and Children, their most loving Father. In all which joyful Acclamations, no honourable Additions were heard, which in the judgment of his Men, worthily agreed not with his deserts. He again with tears standing in his eyes, courteously embraced them, rejoicing at the publick good; and himself giving most hearty thanks unto God, commanded the like to be done in all Churches of that Province. Sometime he commended the Souldiers Valour, and in general, he commended the Nobility and worthy Captains he extolled by name, according as their deserts had been in that notable Battel, nor detracting any thing from any mans worthy praises; part of the spoil of the Turks he appointed unto devout Uſes, and the other part he divided amongst the Souldiers; and willing as it were with the Fruits thereof to gratify King Uladiſlaus, and the Despot of Servia, then present with him, he sent a great Waggon, with ten Horses which they could scarce draw, laded with the Turks Ensigns and the chief of their Heads, where the Heads of the Baffa and his Son stood foremost, and above them was placed an old Turk, sometime well known unto the Despot; who in this order presented unto them, is said to have thus delivered his Message, as followeth:

I should seem to defraud you of the honour of the battel, happily fought under your good Fortune. These heads of the Alban Nobility be sendeth you for a Present, that you should not want the assured Testimony of so notable a Victory; these are two Princes heads, the one of Mefites Baffa the General, and the other of his Son; the rest are the heads of the other great Commanders and Sanzacks. All these witness the greatness of the late slaughter, and exhort you to greater achievements. What your Royal Majesty for the natural insatiable of Fury and what an occasion of Immortality and Glory is offered unto you, Hunades, weigheth you hereby to consider; and humbly requesteth, that general Supplications may be commanded, and a great one provided, forasmuch as all men suppose, that the Turk will gage his whole Forces, and leave nothing unattempted, in revenge of so great a slaughter of his people.

Having ended his Speech, he shewed unto them the grisly mortified heads; which the Nobility and others there present, earnestly beheld, and wondered at, especially the King and the Despot; who by Letters further understanding the whole proceeding of the War, and fortune of the Battel, highly commended the discreet valour of Hunades, together with the glorious Victory; whereby his Son was both slain; and the support of whole death in the pursuit, added swiftness unto the Hungarians, to the encreasing of the slaughter of the Turks, whom for the desire of Revenge they ceased not for certain days to pursue, unto the top of the Alps. In this battel were slain of the Turks 20000, and of the Hun-

and requesting him, with like courage and care, to prosecute the War, so happily begun; promising him, That he should neither want Men, nor Money, or any thing else needful thereunto. Upon this Victory, the Countesses of Moldavia and Valachia, before Tributaries unto the Turks, now revolted again unto the Hungarians, to the great grief of Amurath; and the fame of Huniades was in short time dispersed through all Europe, and a general hope conceived of him, as of one most like to be one of the greatest Champions of the Christian Commonwealth, as in his time undoubtedly he was.

The report of this late Overthrow, with the death of the Bassa Mesier, and the loss of his Army, being brought to Hadiarnople, much troubled the Turkish Tyrant; but most of all, the Revolt of the two Countesses, Moldavia and Valachia. So that full of wrathful Indignation, and desire of Revenge, he commanded a great Army to be raised against the next Spring, with intent to have gone therewith himself; but afterwards upon better advice changing his purpose, he committed the leading thereof unto one Sheeh Albedin Bassa (commonly called Siegehim Bassa) an Eunuch, and yet nevertheless a right valiant and expert Captain, and his Vice-Roy in Europe; with Charge first to enter into Valachia, and there having done what harm he could with Fire and Sword, to do the like in Moldavia; and after that, with all his Power to break into Transylvania; there to Revenge unto the full, the Losses before received, and with the slaughter of the Hungarians to Sacrifice unto the Ghosts of their dead Friends and Companions. The Bassa according to his Charge, departing out of Macedonia, and marching through Myfia and to passing over Danubius, with an Army of four thousand fighting Men, wherof four thousand were of the best Janizaries, entered into Valachia, filling the Country with fear and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in despair to be able to defend themselves against the fury of the Turks, and force repenting them of their revolt from them, unto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades, comforted with cheerful words, willing them betime to retire themselves unto the safest places of the Country, and not to expose themselves with their too weak Forces against the fury of the Barbarians; promising in good time to come himself to their Relief, not doubting by the Power of Jesus Christ, that there he would bated in the plain Field, and to have of them a glorious Victory, although they were in number far more than they were reported to be. The Bassa dividing his Army into two parts, foraged the Country far and near, burning the Country Towns and Villages before him, spoiling whatsoever came in their way, or killing whatsoever they light upon Men, Women, or Children, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition. But the Valachians for the most part had retired themselves, some into the Mountains, some into the strong Towns, and some into places further off, so that few fell into the Enemies hands, but such as were not able to fly, or not regarding the danger, had negligently had the Enemies coming, and so perished. Valachia thus spoiled, the Turks passing over the Mountains, descended into Transylvania, as Amurath had commanded, with purpose there to have done the like or greater harm, if possible it had been to have so done; but there was Huniades with 15000 chosen Soldiers ready to encounter them. A small Power indeed, in comparison of the multitude the Bassa led; but all men of great Experience and Resolution, in valour countervailing the great number of their Enemies; Men resolved rather to die than to fly. Of whose approach the Bassa (unto whom the name and fortune of the Man was dreadful) by his Espials understanding, stayed his intended fury, and as one well aware with whom he had to do, without farther proceeding, encamped himself with his Army, to see what power and courage the Enemy had. But certainly informed by his Scouts, for that purpose sent out, That he was at no more than a quarter so many as the Turks, but lay strongly encamped with his Waggon and Carriages, as in a fire Fort, in such order, as that he could not without great danger be assailed, and yet might at his pleasure come forth, and so if he need were retire again, as into a strong Hold; he wondered at his courage and stillist manner of encamping; yet presuming of his own multitude and strength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battle. Being come within half a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither side unwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great Victory, they thought it not best to attempt any thing rashly, but took themselves both unto the highest of their wits, as willing in so great a Conflict, as well to shew the utmost of their policy and skill, as of their courage and valour. The Turk thought it best not to join battle with his Enemies in one front, for fear of confounding his great multitude; but to divide his Army into certain Battalions, and so to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make all his men profitable; or if he could not do so, then with his multitude to enclose the Christians round, and so to overwhelm them. On the other side, Huniades charged his Souldiers above all things to keep their order, and in no case to suffer themselves to be divided by their Enemies. The next day, being come unto a place which they call Vajpase, both the Armies by the break of day began to dislodge; at which time the Bassa sent a good space in the marshalling of his great Army, as did also Huniades, seeking by provident fore-sight and policy to match the multitude of his Enemies. And so having left all things in order, calling unto him his chief Captains and Commanders of his Army, with cheerful countenance encouraged them as followeth:

No courage (believe me) worthy Companions, and the most valiant in Arms, could have induced me to encounter Civilians so great a multitude, did not necessity itself enforce Speech of humbles to your approved Valour persuade, and the assured hope I have in Christ Jesus above all things: encourage his firm me; having made choice of us to fight this Soldiers his sacred battle, and by our right hands to revenge the dishonour of his holy Name, in which his special choice we are to consider how much he hath loved us; and for the same to praise his infinite Goodness and Mercy. Three such Commodities hath God liberally even this day propounded unto us; if we will be the same men we have been in times past, as that the least thereof were sufficient to encourage men of worth, for the same to lay down their Lives, hold they them never so dear. First, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your Children, Wives, and Country, joined with your whole Estate; then, for eternal Glory and Renown in this World; and last of all, for Immortality and a Crown that shall never be taken from you, in the World to come. How many victories and triumphs we have in former times, and of late received from the Turks, would to God you had rather bated thereof by report, than seen the same with your eyes, and indeed them in your selves. You had long since been benefi-

of your beloved Wives and Children, whom most miserable Servitude had overclouded; you had had neither House nor Church, wherunto due or to serve God, had not the Divine Power of God, and your rare Presence been at hand for present relief; your Country, your Gods, your Honour, your Liberty, you could not have kept, had not your Valour, confirmed by assured confidence in the Highest, preserved all these things unto your selves. The terrible fury of the Turk had not brought all these things into your power of self, had they not been by your Arms defended, and as by so many bloody overthrows repelled. He could not before be slain, the Grecians, the Macedonians (both sometimes the greatest Commanders) the old Thracians, the strong Bulgarians, the valiant Epirotes, and Dalmatians, could not abide their Force; The Athenians, the Thubans, the Lacedaemonians, Authors and Masters of the antient Discipline of War, willingly gave place unto these. Unto us, is the Praise and great Glory of this Victory by God assigned, who oftentimes with a small Power, and that sometimes against all hope, have with a small Slaughter overthrown them, conquered them, and put them to flight. Neither is there any men in the World whom they more fear and stand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they have by their daily Slaughter and Losses, learned no less to fear, than if you were many. And now to trye the utmost of their power, they are come with their invulnerable Legions; but are not for that if you any thing else are to be feared than before; seeing that we all bear Arms under the conduct of the most mighty God, and are by daily Victory, long Experience, and approved Valour taught, what we are to dare; besides that the greatest part of their Army is of common Soldiers, Slaves, or rude Country Fellows, so men by force by them compelled; more than the Janizaries, are we good Soldiers among them, the rest as men enforced, serve them for fear, and against their Will, and for their Covardise brought into that Bondage and Slavery. What Greeks, Macedonians, or Slavonians forever are sent to their Aid, for as much as they are not yet received from the Christian Faith, deem them not to stand for them, but for us; they long for us the Revengers of their Wrongs, and for you as victorious Conquerors; in this War they have given unto the Turks their Names, but unto us their Hearts; and Power; and pray heartily for our Victory; wherfore you ought so much the more valiantly and courageously to fight, by how much greater you see the Victory, the Honour, the Praise before your Eyes. We are to fight for other Mens Houses and Altars, but for our own; so our present necessity requireth, in such sort, that if we our selves deliver not our selves, and bear our selves upon our wonted bow and valour, we shall this day be enforced to endure the greatest misery that men may possibly suffer, the loss of our Name, and Subjunct, the Captivity of our Children, the deflowering of our Daughters, the ravishing of our Houses, the slaughter of our Parents, the burning of our Houses and Churches; and that which worse is than all this, the scorn of our Saviour Christ Jesus, and his Saints; whose images you shall see in slight broken, or dragged in the dirt, or wilfully and converted into some prophane use; all Religion trodden down, and God himself (if it were possible) with violence and despair driven out of our Hearts, if we stand not manfully unto it as becometh worthy Champions. God is able with his little Finger, if he so will forthwith, to destroy all the Turks in the World, but seeing he hath committed unto our right Hands the defence of his Name, he maketh manifest proof of our Courage and Valour, that finding the same faithful and ready, he may strengthen and defend it with his own right Hand. He never yet forsook any faithful or devout man, neither will our Saviour Christ be wanting unto you, if you be not wanting to your selves; in the power of his Name which is above all Names, he shall read down his rebellious Enemies, and seal the Righteous that prefer their trust in him. Moreover, the comfort that they and we combat for, are drivers, and our hopes much greater; They fight for their Prophet, a most prophane man, Author of all Impiety, for Spoil and Prey, for the destruction of Nations and Countries, for other Mens Kingdoms, for the enlarging of their Dominions and Territories, for worldly Wealth and Glory; but we contrarily bear Arms for the salvation of the World, for our Faith and Religion, for the Christian Commonwealth, for our Native Country, for our Wives and Children, for our Fortune and State; than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honourable. What reward is laid up for them in Heaven which have worthily protected or delivered their Country, or laid down their Lives in defence of their Faith and Religion? Neither, having often proved, are we ignorant, that God will never forsake them that honour, fear, and serve him. Wherby (I follow Souldiers) you may plainly perceive, how far your hopes are beyond theirs. Believe our Saviours, promising unto you an eternal reward; and show your Fidelity and Valour unto God and your Country together. Wherfore, seeing without the power of God we can do nothing, before the signal of Battle be given, I beseech you Collonels, Captains, and Lieutenants, by your official and Christian Exhortations to your Regiments and Companies, to encourage your Souldiers, valiantly to fight the Lords Battle, and for the Lord, every man by taking a little Earth in his Mouth, to prepare himself according to the necessity of the time, as it were to the receiving of the Lords Supper; so having cleansed your Souls, embrace you one another, plight your mutual Faith with your right Hand and a Kiss; and make a personal Covenant among your selves, none of you to forsake one another in the daily Battle, but for your Religion and Country valiantly to fight it out, even to the last man. And a little refreshing your selves with a short repose as you stand, upon the signal given, thrice calling aloud upon the mighty name of Christ Jesus, fight with the like Valour and Courage so near as you can, that be the agonie of Death struggle for your Redemption and Liberty which you will willingly do, I beseech and charge you this for our Saviours sake, for the Love of our Country, and for the Faith you owe both to God and Man. I also pray and beseech you, so to fight, as men resolved either to gain a most glorious Victory (wherof I doubt not) or else if it should otherwise chance, the day to purchase unto you (Jesus a blessed life in the Kingdom of Heaven) not to slip in Hell with the Turks, but with the blessed Wrights in Heaven; for Christ Jesus our Saviour will be always present with us, who (believe me, and so hope) will this day not only deliver us out of the Hands of the Turks, but our immortal Glory shall be the rich Spoil of our Enemies, and so in safety bring all home again with much Joy and Triumph.

The Bassa on the other side likewise encouraged his Souldiers, putting them in remembrance of their former Victories, exhorting them not to degenerate from their wonted valour and themselves, by whose great Valor the Glory and Empire of the Turks had been so mightily increased; and unto whom their great Prophet Mahomet, the Interpreter of the gods, had foretold the Empire of the whole World to be by all the gods allotted; and had by divine inspiration prophecied, that ancient and sturdy Nation in time to become the terror of the World, the scourge of the Wicked, and Commander of all Nations. He farther declared unto them, what an increase of Kingdoms they had got in that short time, since which they first passed over into Europe, and filled them with the hope of a great Spoil, promising unto them that should in the of the Wrong done them, fir them up to take in hand this facred Expedition. So fit an opportunity is now given unto you, that at one and the felfe time you may fee your Bodies in perpetual Safety and Happinefs; your Souls in Quietnefs and Reft, and unto both give Eternal Glory and Happinefs. You lack not (worthy Captains) Money, the Sineurs of the War, which fhall be brought unto you from all parts of the Chriftian Common-wealths, not fuffi- and courageous Soldiers, not Policy, not Fortune, not the might of the Heavenly Powers, which have made choice of you for the defence of the true Faith and Religion; you want nothing (worthy Princes) but Will. It is an Expedition neceffary, religious, profitable and honourable; wherein are propounded moft ample Rewards both in this Life, and in the Life to come. Wherefore (moft mighty Prince, and you right worthy Princes all) I pray and befeech you by the Faith of Chrift Iefus, by the Love of your Children, by the Health of your Kingdom, and deliverance from your prefent diffinition, with valiant Courage, and one Confeft to take this facred War in hand, and fo thereby to enrol your Names in the Eternal Book of Fame, And fo that you are to go, not fo much to a Worldly as a Spiritual War againft the Enemies of Chrift and his Truth, take up your Arms with fuch Zeal, Courage, and Cheerfulnefs, as the Expectation and Hope of Men, as your Valour, the prefent Danger, and the Mercies of God towards you, feem of right to require.

This Legate having made an end, forthwith exhibited the miferable Supplication and Tears of the Delpot; perfwading them of the neceffity of that Expedition to be taken in hand, declaring unto them the Cruelty of the Turks, their Torments and frango Torments, his Sons deprived of their Sighs, and spoiled of their riches, many half mangled, and more cut in funder with Saws; fome flain quick, and others buried alive, with many other ftrange kinds of death, fuch as would abhor any Chriftian Ears to hear. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to look to themselves, told them, That they were but by the River Savum divided from the Turks; which in Summer was oftentimes to be waded over, and in Winter hard frozen, and fo to be paffed; that the Country beyond Danubius lay all open upon them; and that he, fometime the rich King of Servia, was now driven into exile by the power of the Turk, deprived of his Kingdom, of his Children, shamefully disgraced, spoiled of his Wealth and Fortune, glad to flie from place to place, and yet not able to find any fave place to reft in. Firft he fled (as he faid) to Ragufina, where by and by he was fought after, and endangered by the Turks; then into Hungary, which was alfo forthwith by them on every fide infested; and whereof the Barbarian King now asked Tribute, to have fome colour for the invasion thereof; which dreadful Enemy was not far off from it, but fill hovered even over it; as well as Valachia and Transylvania, two of the greateft and richest Provinces of the Hungarian Kingdom; which had not the Valour of Hunades, the Fortune of the Common-Weal, and above all, the Mercy of God, delivered out of the Hands of this rithy Nation, the State of Hungary had now been utterly forlorn. The Events of War, he faid) were divers, Fortune uncertain, and that God would not every day be tempted, Wherefore with many Tears abundantly running down his aged Face, he befeought King Uladiflaus and the reft, not to let flip this fair occasion, neither by Cowardice or Negligence to break off the courfe of their good Fortune and Victory; but to make choice rather to become Revengers of other mens harms, than of their own, and to fatisfie the good opinion the World had conceived of them. He was (as he faid) a fufficient Example to all Men. Befides that, he offered a great fum of Money himfelf towards the de-fraying of the Charges of the War, affuring them alfo of great fupplies both of Men and Money from divers other Chriftian Princes. Which opinion of the Legate Delpots being generally liked and approved, a Decree was made by a whole Court of Parliament there afsembled, That the King fhould himfelf in perfon, with all fpeed poffible entertain that honourable War. So that though it were now upon the approach of Winter, yet were Men taken up in every place, and Embassadors fent unto the Emperor and the other Neighbour Princes, to pray of them Aid againft the common Enemy. Who for the moft part excufed themselves by their own particular Affairs, but few no Aid at all. Nevertheless many devout Chriftians both out of France and Germany, for the Zeal they bare unto Chrift and the Chriftian Religion, forfaking Wife and Children, and whatever they had elfe, came and worthily ferved upon their own Charge. The Spring being come, and Supplications made in all places, for the prosperous fucces of this Religious War, King Uladiflaus the firft of Moy Danubius, and marching far and felly, and coming to the River Tiflus, there he ftayed three days for the coming of his Army. Departing thence, and marching on along the fide of Danubius, until he came within the fight of Bulgaria, he there at a place called Cobu, over againft Sindoravia, paffed over Danubius with his Army, which was now grown very great; and fo marched directly to Sophia, fittate about fix days march from Danubius, in the Frontiers of Bulgaria, fo called of a moft fumptuous and magnificent Temple there built by Iufinian the great Emperor. Which City being then old and ruinous, and but badly fortified, was eafily taken; and afterward for that it was not well to be holden, was by the Kings commandment burnt, as were all the other Country Towns and Villages thereabouts, to the terror of the reft. Marching thence, he came unto the River Morava, and there he incamped; where the plain Country eafily rifeth and falleth in manner of the Sea, when it is moved with a little Wind. Here five hundred Horfemen being fent over the River, not fo much to feek after Prey, as to view the Country, which was the Army might moft fafely and eafily paff, happened upon the Turks Scouts, of whom they took four; and understanding that them, that two thoufand of the Turks were coming at hand, knowing themselves too weak to encounter them, they retired back again with all fpeed they could, unto the River; where many of them for fear leapt headlong from the high and broken Banks, and fo perished in the deep; the reft terrified with the mifortune of their Fellows, flood fill, doubtfully expecting what fhould become of themselves. Beyond the River was another Hill, upon the top whereof the King with a great number of Horfemen were hunting; whom the Turks a far off defcrying, and doubtful to fall into fome ambush, of purpofe laid for them betwixt them and the River, without coming on further, beyond which the before fearfully ftand on the further fide of the River, perceiving, and now encouraged by the coming of the King down to the River, followed a while after, fo to increafe their fear; and fo having well feared one another, retired on both fides worfe afraid than

than hurt. The next day the King paffed over the River, fending out his Scouts to fee if all were clear before him; by whom he was advertised, that the Turks were at hand, having placed certain Ambushes falfly, expecting but a fit time to feize upon him. Whereupon entering into Council with his beft and moft expert Captains, what were beft to be done, it was refolved upon, That Hunades the next night with ten thoufand choice Horfemen, fhould upon the fuddain fet upon the Enemy, then fearing nothing. Who conducted by the Efpials, was in the firft Watch of the Night brought very near unto them. The Moon by chance, as favouring his great attempt, did then fhine out, fo that he might well difcern how the Enemy lay incamped, and which way for to charge them for his beft advantage; which was by the fane way they were moft like to flie, if they fhould be put to the work; unto which place he led his men, and there with a moft hideous outcry entered the Camp, as then for moft part buried in Sleep and Security; when as the Turks awaked with the fuddain noife, as it were out of a dead fleep, and difmayed with the horror of the cry, began to beate them, fome to their Weaprons, fome to their Heels. Of whom fuch as fled, lighting upon the Enemies Troops ftanding in their way, ran as faft back again; the other fcarce yet well awake, and overcome with fear, and now fearfully themselves, had much ado to make themselves ready to fight. Hunades in the mean time riding up and down amongst his men, cheered them up, fill crying out and calling upon them, courageously to affail their fleepy, naked, and fearful Enemies, and not to let flip fo fair an occafion, and fo notable a Victory now already in their hands. At the firft encounter the Turks rather made a fir, than fought; but after that they heard that Hunades was there, as men difmayed with his Name, they turned their Backs and fled, finding, which way fooner they took, their Fellows half dead or wounded; yea, fuch a confufion was raifed amongst them with the greatnefs of the fuddain fear, that thurfting together, with an inconfiderate defire of Flight, they trod one another under foot, and thruft themselves one upon others Weapons; the greateft part of them driven headlong into the Thickets and other Straits, and not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious Enemy, fiercely purfuing of them, flain. All that night the fearful Turks were with great laughter held in chafe; but as foon as it was day, the reft that remained of them, ran alfo the fane fortune with their Fellows. A far greater Slaughter was there made, than a man would think that fo few men could have made, when as but with ten thoufand Horfe, thirty thoufand Turks were in one night flain, and four thoufand taken, with a number of their Ensigns. Of Hunades his men were not many loft, for the greatnefs of the Slaughter; moft report not above five hundred, for few of them found any Enemy to refit them. There was taken alfo the Spoil of a moft rich Camp, the Enemy having carried with them nothing out of it. Hunades having in fo fhort time gained fo notable a Victory, and enriched his Army, returned to the King in great Triumph; neither was that day more joyful unto thefe victorious Soldiers, than unto the reft of the Army, who moft joyfully expected their return. The King moft joyfully expected the approach of Hunades and the Delpot hearing of the approach of Hunades from the Slaughter of the Turks, with the great applaufe and joyful acclamation of the other Legions, went to meet him three miles;

and at fuch time as at their firft meeting Hunades was about to have lighted to have done him honour, he would in no cafe fuffer him to do, but taking him by the right Hand, joyed with him for the Victory, thanking God in the hearing of the whole Army, that he of his mercy had given him fuch a Captain, as without Envy, in all mens judgments was worthy to rule the Roman Empire. In brief, he fhewed how much his Country, his Kingdom, yea the Chriftian Common-Weal, was bound and indebted unto him, gave him his due Praifes, exhorting all others to imitate his glory; the like honour did alfo all the reft of the Nobility unto him. As for the Common Soldiers, they could not be fatisfied with beholding of him, but embracing one another, as if they would have died one in another Arms, welcomed their victorious Friends. So with Joy joyning their Forces together, and fending the rich Spoil of the Enemy, with the Prifoners chained together in long ranks before them; the King and Hunades in great Triumph returned into the Camp, where they caufed general Prayers, with Thanksgiving unto Almighty God for fo great a Victory, to be made throughout the Army.

The Legate Tullian, General of the voluntary Chriftians, which for Devotion felfe ferved of their own Charge, after fo great a Victory moft earneftly perfwaded the King and the reft of the great Commanders of the Army, to profecute their good Fortune, and in God his fo great Favour not to loiter, but dayly to march forward, and to take in the reft of Bulgaria. Now had Hunades, by his Effails learned, that from Scopia it was but three days journey to Philippus, a great City of Thracia; and the like diftance from thence to Hadrampole, the chief feat of the Turkifh Tyrant, and as much more to Constantinople. The only difficulty was how to pafs the great and fearful Mountain Hemus, which running a marvellous way in length, even unto the Euxine Sea, and mating almoft the Skie, divideth the Countries of Bulgaria and Servia, from Macedonia and Thracia; and for the great height and roughnefs thereof, is not to be paffed over but in two places; the one made by the great Emperor Trayan and the Romans, where as yet is to be feen a mighty ftrong Gate built of great fquare Stone, whereby the paffage that way was opened or fhut at the pleasure of them that had the keeping thereof; the other near unto a little River, which the Bulgarians now call Salizna. By either of thefe ways, if he fhould find them open, Hunades, unto whom the King had committed both the leading and conduct of the Army, purpofed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they took all fuch Towns of Bulgaria as ftood in their way; fome by force, fome by compofition; wherein was no fmall help, the conformity of the Chriftian Religion; the horrible Cruelty of the Turks, the great Affair being Language, the moft effectual means to win the Love of Strangers; for the Polemans and the Bulgarians both defended of the Salavonians, and using the fane Language, the Poleman Horfemen came to no Town, but it prefently yielded. But being come unto the Mountain Hemus, to have entered into Thracia, the Winter weather being now very cold, they learned by their Efpials, that the aforefaid paffages were both faft fup with great Stones, Timber and fuch other like matter, fo ftrongly, as that they were very hardly to be forced. Wherefore Hunades leaving the ftraiter way made by the hand of man (which befide the former fortification at the great Gate, the Turks had in many places, with abundance of water poured down the steep Hill in the night, and hard frozen with the coldness of the Weather, made so slippery, as that it was not possible either for Man or Beast there to stand, or to get up that way. Chelvis, who came to the other, by which the River Salutia runs, the which he found likewise thut. Here they met with many inconveniences; first, the difficulty of the passage, which Amurath had (not without great reason) thut up, and there placed four Garrisons, for at ease, and without danger of Batul (so often by Chelvis unfortunately proved) to defend his Kingdom in Macedonia and Thracia, from the invasion of the Hungarians, who now of all Nations he most dreaded. Beside that, in the Army was such want of all things, as that the Soldiers were ready to forsake their Engines, and to rise up in a general mutiny; for the Country near unto the Mountain Hemus, rising high, with broken Rocks, and inaccessible places, was altogether barren; and Victuals failing in the Camp, they were glad to live with a little Wheat and Flesh boiled together, and that sparingly, as that the Soldiers began now generally to grow weak and faint. Besides that, the Winter was exceeding cold, and the Frost so great, that many times they could not go out of their Tents to seek for Forrage or Water. So that the Army enforced with Hunger and Cold, and the difficulty of the passage, began to retire, and had undoubtedly been dissolved, had it not been for the often earnest persuasions of Hunades: for he daily told them, that great difficulties were past, that that which remained, was with their wonted Valour and Courage to be endured, whereunto nothing was high or difficult; that they should forthwith come into the borders of Thracia, where they should find plenty of all things; that they were come so far, that if they did go back again, they should in those waste Countries through which they were to pass, find greater difficulties and dangers, than in going forward; that these Straits once opened, remained no more travel, but cheerfully to fall to the Spoil of a most rich and pleasant Country. They were not (as he said) to lay in the midst of their Fortunes, for that it was not always permanent, and for that the contempt of Gods favours caused them to be oftentimes taken from us; all that was yet done (he said) was nothing, if they proceeded not further; for that whatsoever they had already won, was easily by the Enemy to be recovered, except that which yet remained (for that most part of them, as he said, were slain, with their Houses burnt over their Heads) were driven out of Thracia and Macedonia, and to quite out of Europe. So whilst the Soldiers heard Hunades speak, every man was well encouraged; but when they remembered the miseries wherewith they were invironed, they cursed all the rash Attempts of ambitious Princes. In the mean time News was brought by the Scouts, that the Turks were coming after them; but then began they to rejoyce, as deeming it much more honour, manfully to die in Batul, than to starve with Hunger and Cold. Again these Turks were Hunades sent with certain Troops of Horsemen; who, encountering with them, easily enforced them with loss to retire. Eight times he encountered them (as the Soldiers there present reported) and as often put them to Flight. In retiring back from the impregnable Mountain, the King with the greatest part of the Army went before; Hunades followed Hunades and the Despot, a good days march; when the Turks that kept the passage upon the Mountain, understanding of their return, followed them down the Hill, in good hope to be of them well revenged, before they should get out of Bulgaria. Carambey the Bassa of Romania, and Brother to Caly-Bassa (a man of all others in greatest Favour with Amurath, and his Brother-in-Law, as having married his Sister) was General of this Army, and by him appointed for the keeping of the Straits, with express charge upon no occasion whatsoever, although it made shew of never to assured a Victory, to fight with the Enemy; for he thought it Victory enough, without any loss to have kept the Straits, which the old Kings Command, Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope, by a notable Victory easily to answer the contempt of that he was commanded. The Christian Army descending down the broken Mountain, was come to a great Mountain, which the Bulgarians call Cunobiska, and part of the Mountain Hemus at whose Heels followed Carambey, with his Turks, still hovering over their Heads, to take them at some advantage; whom the Christians beholding, could not by their Captains be stayed, but that they would many times by Companies fly forth upon them, and desperately fight with them in places of great advantage, saying, That they had rather die in fight like men, than to starve with Hunger and Cold. Here Carambey, being himself a man of great Courage, and desirous of Honour, and by the rashness of his Enemies allured to fight; and withal, beside the advantage of the ground, perceiving himself to exceed his Enemies both in Strength and Number, could not be staid, but would needs give Batul, with such a desire, as if he had been already assured of the Victory. Hunades and the Despot had before perceived, that the Turks, provoked with the braving of their men, would assuredly fall upon them, and were therefore most ready with the absence of the King, who (as is before said) was gone a days march before they saw they could neither shun Batul, neither if they could have so done, would their desperate Soldiers be staid, for the desire they had to fight. Yet seeing Carambey coming down upon them, they put themselves (though unwillingly) in left order they could to receive him; persuading their Soldiers not rashly in fury to run upon their Enemies, as desperate men prodigal of their Lives, but to keep their ranks, and orderly to fight, and to like valiant men to carry away the Victory, or to leave unto their Enemies a bloody remembrance thereof. Now had Carambey sent his Horsemen down the Hill, and the Batul was begun, where both the Armies met together with great fury, and a cruel Fight was made both at the foot of the Hill, and amongst the Hills and Vallies also; in which hard encounter many were slain, as well on the one side as the other. The Polonian men at Arms (whom the King but a little before had left with Hunades against all Events) with the Hungarian light Horsemen (of whom the Despot had the leading) fought so that day, as if they had fought for nothing more, but how honourably to die; and the Turks for a space stood hard to it, so that many were there slain; yet at length finding themselves hardly laid to, as by desperate men, resolved to fill their Lives dear, they began to faint and to give ground; when as Carambey coming in behind them with new supplies, rased the cowardly, flaid them that were flying, and sometime with rough Speeches, sometime with fair persuasions, made them wavering, and restored the Batul, before almost quite lost. Neither did Hunades and the Despot less lofe them, but as soon as they perceived the Enemy a little to faint, by and by cried out, Victory; with cheerful Speech encouraging their men, still calling upon them, to keep their Ranks firm, and to urge their present good Fortune, assuring themselves, that they fought against those Infidels under the favour and protection of the Almighty; and forthwith sent certain Companies of Footmen, who climbing up the Hill amongst the Buffes, with their half Pikes and Back Spears, panned the Turks Horse as they passed by them. These loose Companies did the Turks Horsemen much harm, and here began their Batul to decline; they which were coming down, for fear of the danger retiring back again unto them that were left above for the keeping of the Straits; and the bolder sort of them, which were come down into the Vallies, compassed about with the Men at Arms, hardly recovered the rising of the Hill. Carambey in the mean time crying out behind them, one while calling back them that fled, another while relieved them that fainted, and to the uttermost of his parts restoring the Batul, performed all the parts both of a valiant Soldier and worthy Captain, courageously fighting himself in the thickest of his Enemies, and by his own Valour staid for a time the lost Batul. At length performing his last endeavour, deceived by the Snow, he fell into a Bog, where sticking with his Horse, and not able to help himself, he was taken Prisoner by a common Soldier. The rest that escaped out of this bloody Batul, retired themselves unto them that were left above upon the Mountain, for the defence of the passage. After whom the Christians followed, through the untract and rough places, until that hindered of their further pursuit by the approach of the night, and the abruptness of the way, they were glad to found a Retreat, and to retire unto the Camp. Many other great men were taken beside Carambey, but many more slain in the Batul, and most of all in the Flight; few escaped, but such as fled back again up into the Mountains. In the Retreat, Hunades seeing to gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether unknown) unworthily bound, and led Prisoner by a common Soldier, asked the Soldier, if he would sell his Prisoner? who said, he would; and asked for him ten Ducats, (a poor price for so great a man.) unto whom Hunades commanded to be given four hundred, as to fent him to his Tent, comforting of him up with cheerful words, and willing that he should be well used. The Despot the same Night coming to Hunades his Tent, to confer with him about the remainder of the War, and seeing to brave a man standing among the reft by the fire side, began to talk with him in the Turkish Language, wherof he had some knowledge, by reason of the nearness of the Nation, and such matters as he had sometimes to do with them; and having some guests by his talk, what he was, and prying his Estate, asked Hunades, how he would ransom him? who said, that he would him four hundred Ducats; but that he valued him four hundred Ducats the Despot offered to pay him. Thus by the strange chance of Fortune, was Carambey, of late so great a Commander, and so near allied unto the great Turk, valued and prized twice in one day by his Enemies, as a mirror of the uncertainty of Worldly Bliss and Felicity. The Polonian report somewhat otherwise of this Batul; as that Uladislavus should himself therein be present, and the chief that therein commanded; howbeit the Hungarian Writers, whose credit herein we follow, report it as before, not to have been fought under the good Fortune of the King then absent, but under the leading of Hunades and the Despot.

Out of this Batul (or as some others report, a little before, out of the Batul of Morava) fled the great Captain Gorge Gabris, otherwise of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now seeking to deliver both himself, and his Native Country of Epirus, out of the Thraldom of the Turks, as presently after he did; whose unwonted Flight not a little terrified the rest of the Turks Army, and much furthered the Christians Victory, whose (as it was thought) secret intelligence with the great Captain Hunades, who not without instructions from him (as some say) gave that great overthrow unto the Turks at Morava. But of him and his worthy Acts done for the deliverance and defence of his Country, more shall be said hereafter.

Shortly after this great overthrow and discomfiture of the Turks, the two great Captains, Hunades and the Despot, together with the King, consulted for the removing of the Turks Garrisons, left above for the keeping of the strait passages of the Mountain, and the prosecution of the War. Which Uladislavus (considering the difficulty of the matter, and his Soldiers necessity) thought it not good further to prosecute, but forthwith to return. But Hunades and the Despot, the one thirsting after Honour, and the other in no less hope, by the good success of this War, to recover again his lost Kingdom, said, That the Turks were in any case to be removed, the passage opened, and the sparks that yet remained, for fear of raising a greater Fire, extinguished; opposing against the difficulty by the King alleged, the invincible Courage of his Soldiers, wherunto (they said) nothing was impossible or difficult. To which opinion the King also (left he should seem distrustful of the Valour of his Captains or Soldiers) easily yielded, and so commanded on Gods name to set forward. The first that mounted the Hill was the Kings Battalion, which by the roughness and abruptness of the Mountain hindered, oftentimes flaid. But Hunades his Victory, and leaving nothing unattempted, in search of about found a crooked turning way, whereby he with his men, more easily and readily got up to the top of the Mountain, even with their Enemies, undefied or molested, by reason of the broken cover of the place; from whence they were in good hope easily to have come unto their Enemies. But being come up to the place they desired, they found such a deep and wide gaping of the Rock betwixt them and the Enemy, as was neither to be passed, or attempted; yet being come very near, they attempted by Cross-Bow shot, and great Stones cast out of Slings, and other Engines, to have removed the Turks from their places, who were therewith, and with their unexpected approach, at the first to greatly both annoyed and discomfited, that they were almost at the point to have forsaken the passage, had not Alis Bog (but the night before chosen for their General instead of Carambey) encouraged them, and taught them how by shrouding themselves under the broken Rocks and Parapets with tumultuary labour cast up, to save themselves from the flor of their Enemies. In the mean time also Hunades, by another more high and steep way, whereby the Enemy was also to be approached, had sent up other Companies of Soldiers, and fighting at too much disadvantage, were by the Turks easily rejected. So at length, seeing the vain attempt given by himself upon the top of the Hill; and the desperate danger of the others in climbing the inaccessible Mountain, where one might keep down down an hundred, despairing to enforce the Enemy, he by the Kings Command caused a Retreat to be founded, and so again retired down the Mountain, to the great rejoicing of the Turks. The next day the Winter cold raging, and wants in the Army still more and more increasing, the King, with the rest of the great Commanders entered into consultation for the halting of their return out of that rough and barren Country, into places of greater plenty, before the Army were brought into any greater want. Whereunto Himade (giving place unto necessity, which always suffereth not to be regarded that is feebly) now easily yielded; only the Despot spake against it, blaming them, that having taken the General, and put their Enemies to Flight, and Victory now as it were in their hands, they would not prosecute the final rout of the War, but cowardly turn their Backs unto their vanquished Enemies: promising that he himself would find Money enough for the providing of all things needful for the relief of the Army. So said the Popes Legate also. But so far as the Wants in the Army were great, and the Soldiers presently pinched with Hunger and Cold, they could with no hope of any profit; were it never so great, be persuaded to stay; openly crying out, that it was not their Captains and Lieutenants, which wanted nothing, but them the poor Soldiers that starved for hunger; as for the Despot, that he in hope of recovering his Kingdom, persuaded things impossible, and no Work to be performed; neither to be any thing moved with the death of their Men or Carrel. Need (they said) could not be vanquished; but that when Winter was past, they would willingly return again unto the sacred War. In the mean time, Winter raging, and Hunger commanding, they gave over (aid they) and departed into more fruitful places, there to refresh our Bodies, spent with Labour, Cold and Hunger. For which reasons, the King finding before his Baggage, retired again by the same way he came. Which the Turks from above beholding, and strengthened with new Supplies, followed after them, as after men that had fled; oftentimes assailing them in the Rearward, and setting upon them sometimes on the one side, sometimes on the other, with often skirmishes both did and received much harm. Whole manner of Fight was, to retire which they were themselves charged, and presently by great Troops to charge against their Enemies, their Backs once turned to them, and so troubled the Army, that it was constrained oftentimes to stay; besides that, looded with the rich Spoil of the Enemy, and much Baggage, it could not of it self make any great halt. Now was he by the way come into a great thick Wood, full of deep Bogs and Water-courses, hard to be passed through; where the rest of the Army going before, in the Rearward, at the entrance of the Wood were left certain strong Companies of Men at Arms, as a Wall against the pursuing Enemy; whom the Turks with their ready light Horsemen fiercely charged; where betwixt them, in the Wood was fought a great Fight, and a great Tumult raised; unto the noise whereof, which marched before hastily returning, in skirmishing, many of them fell into those deep Bogs and queasy Places, out of which they could hardly rid themselves again. Besides that, there were many crooked and troublesome turnings and windings, and sudden descents, so fiery, as that in going down the flane, their Horses came tumbling heels over head, and there lay overthrow together with their Riders in such sort, as that to avoid these difficulties, they were oftentimes enforced to fight on foot. In which troublesome skirmish about fourcore Men at Arms were lost; but of the Turks, beside them which were slain, were taken an hundred and seventy, all whom Himade caused presently to be slain. In this War the Christians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the Enemies Affairs. Wherefore Wants daily more and more increasing in the Army, which by reason of the multitude of their Carriages, abundance of their Baggage, and often Assaults of the Turks, was able to make no way for the King, for fear his Army should in so long and low march through those troublefome and barren Countries, be consumed with Hunger and other Wants, caused all the Carriages and Baggage to be brought into the midst of the Army, and of it, all such things as served rather for burthen than use, so be there burnt; and the Arms as well of such Soldiers as he had there lost, as of the Enemy, to be buried in the ground; and all the weak Beasts that served for burthen, to be killed. So the Army well discharged of such unprofitable burthen, marched much more speedily, neither was so much subject unto the Assaults of the Turks, as before. And so at length by long Journeys, Uladiflaus with his Army arrived at Belgrade, where he was of his Subjects honourably received. And having there staid certain days, and well refreshed his Army, departing thence, and passing the River Sava came to the Royal City Uladiflaus, where he was of all his Subjects joyfully received; and the Legate and Himade going on his right Hand, and the Despot on the left; after whom followed other Colonels, Captains, and Lieutenants with their Companies; who at their first meeting with the Citizens, more than a mile out of the City, in token of their mutual Joy, gave together joyful acclamations and such shouts, that the Heavens seemed to resound, and the Earth to shake with the noise thereof. Before the King, at his coming unto the City, went a long Company of the notable Turks Captives; and next before him, Carambey, bound in Chains; upon whom all mens Eyes were fixed. With them were also carried the Enemies Ensigns, and such Spoils as had been faved. Behind the King came Himade in a triumphant Robe, in the midst betwixt the Legate on the right Hand, and the Despot on the left, as he that next unto the King had best deserved the Honour of the Triumph. Next unto them followed the devout Christians, that for the Zeal of Religion had most honourably for their own Charges voluntarily served in those Wars; and on both sides of them the Civil Magistrates and best of the Citizens; behind them came the rest of the Legions, and about them both upon the right Hand and the left, the promiscuous common People, doubling and redoubling the Praises of the King, and Himade. Before all these went the Prelates and Priests in solemn Procession, singing Hymns and Psalms of Thanksgiving unto Almighty God. Uladiflaus coming to the Gate of the City, acknowledging God to have been the Author of so great a Victory, alighting from his Horse, on foot went first unto the Cathedral Church of our Lady; and there giving most hearty Thanks unto Almighty God, hanged up the Enemies Ensigns, and part of the Spoil, in perpetual remembrance of so notable a Victory; which he afterward caused to be most lively depicted in a Table of most curious work, and there in the same Church to be hanged up; as were also the Arms of all the notable Christians that served in that most famous Expedition, which there long time after remained. Which Solemnities ended, he went went to his Palace in his Castle, and there having given to every man, but especially to Himade, his due Commendation, gave them leave to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom also the Polonians, almost past his Son in law, and this notable Expedition of their King Uladiflaus, howbeit the Turks (notable defiblers of their own Losses) confessing the great Overthrow, call the Baffa to overthrow, not by the name of Carambey, but of Cajanus; and the noble Prisoner that was taken, by the name of Melchior Beg, called Amurath, Amurath his Son in law, and Sanzack to Cah-Baffa, Amurath his great Cousin-fellow, of some called Carambey after the name of his Father.

Out of this late slaughter of the Turks, where Carambey was taken, escaped that valiant Prince and famous Warrior George Cajanus (of the Turks called Scanderbeg) as is before declared; whose noble mind had long time desired to break out of the golden Fetters of the Turkish Tyrldom, and to be revenged of the intolerable Injury by Amurath done to his Country, his Parents, his Brethren, and himself. Although he had always most warily defibled the Arms of the old Tyrant; being oftentimes solicited and animated thereunto by secret Letters and Messengers from his Friends in Epirus, knowing right well that the least fortune thereof had been unto him present death. But finding no fit means for the accomplishment thereof, wisely defibled the fame, with all the shews of Love and Loyalty to Amurath that might be; until that now in this great Overthrow of the Turks Army, under the leading of Carambey, and in so great a confusion, he took occasion to put in practise what he had long before in his deep conceit plotted, for the delivery both of himself, and his Country from the Turkish Bondage, and Slavery. At which time Scanderbeg (for so from henceforth we call him) having a little before imparted the matter unto some of his trusty Friends and Country-men, no less desirous of liberty than himself, but especially unto his Nephew Amefia, the Son of his Brother Reposin, a young man of great courage (in great confusion of the Turkish Army, when every man was glad to thin for himself) had ever in his sight a vigilant eye upon the Baffas Principal Secretary; whom accompanied with a few Turks, he with his Nephew Amefia, and other of his faithful Friends closely followed; as he fled from the slaughter; but when he had got the Secretary with his few Followers in place most convenient for his purpose, he set upon the Turks and flew them every one; and carrying the Secretary away with him, he thought good, with great Threats, to compel him (soe against his will) to write counterfeited Letters, as from the Baffa his Master, unto the Governor of Croia, commanding him in Amuraths name, forthwith to deliver unto Scanderbeg, the new chosen Governor, the Charge of the City with the Garrison there; cunningly entangling many other things in the same Letters, whereby the matter might seem more probable. Which Letters so extorted, he presently flew the Secretary, and as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpose that his doings might be the longer kept from the knowledge of Amurath, who not hearing what was become of him, might reasonably conjecture that he was slain by the Hungarians among the rest of the Turks.

Whilst the fame of this great Overthrow was going to Hadriampole, and there filth the Turks Court with sorrow and heaviness, in the mean time Scanderbeg having with him three thousand

Epirus Soldiers which followed him out of the battel, as men desirous rather to fight for the liberty of themselves and of their Country, than in the quarrel of the Turk, was with incredible celerity came into the upper Country of Dirva, from Croia; into which Country he was most joyfully received, where he stayed but one day, and chose a few of those three hundred which he brought with him, to wait upon him when he went to Croia, as if they had been his domesticaly Soldiers; the rest, with other three hundred lusty Soldiers, which were then come unto him out of Dirva, he appointed to be led by secret by-ways through the Woods and Mountains by perfect Guides, until they came fo night Croia was so possible for them to come, unperceived; and there to stay until he might find opportunity to convey them into the City to oppress the Turkish Garrison. So he with a small Company of his Followers, as if they had been his private Retinue, took the way towards Croia. But when he began to draw near to the City, he sent Amefia before with two Servitors attending upon him, as if he had been his Secretary, to certify the Governor of his coming. This young Gentleman, as he was of a most good wit, and well spoken, so had he framed his Countenance and Air, that he seemed to be a natural Turk; who as soon as he was come into the City, he went unto the Governor, whom after he had saluted according to the Turkish manner, he delivered his Message as from Scanderbeg his Master, with so good Grace, and words so well placed, that all he faved was verily believed for true. But when Scanderbeg himself came, and had delivered the great Commanders Letters, the Governor made no further question of the matter, but presently delivered unto him the Government of the City, and the next day departed out of Croia with all his Household towards Hadriampole. Scanderbeg having by this policy got the Government of the chief City of Epirus, the night following found means in the dead time of the night, to receive into the City the Soldiers of Dirva, who were by this time come, according as he had before appointed; most part of them he placed in most convenient places of the City, and for the speedy suppression of the Turkish Garrison, he with the rest, first set upon the Turks which kept the Watch upon the Wall, and flew them; and afterwards breaking into their private houses, flew many of them in their Beds; the Christian Citizens also taking up Arms at the same time, helped to increase the slaughter of the Turks, so that in the space of a few hours, except some few, which were content to forsake their Mahometan Superstition, and to become Christians. Many of the Turks might have faved their lives, and would not, chusing rather to die, and (as it is reported) also to kill themselves, than to forsake their damnable Superstition; for small is the regard of life unto resolute Minds, in what quarrelsoever.

The City of Croia being thus happily by Scanderbeg recovered, wherein appeared both the greatest difficulty, and hope of his good or bad Success in so great an Attempt, he presently sent Amefia back again into Dirva, and other speedy Messengers likewise into all the parts of Epirus, to disperse the News, and to stir up the people to take up Arms for the recovery of their lost Liberty; but flying Fame, the speedy Post, had prevented the Messengers by him sent, and already filled every corner of Epirus with report of Scanderbeg his coming, and of all that was done

Scanderbeg, being with all diligence, his desire for the delivery of himself and his Country.

Uladiflaus, where he was of all his Subjects joyfully received; and the Legate and Himade going on his right Hand, and the Despot on the left; after whom followed other Colonels, Captains, and Lieutenants with their Companies; who at their first meeting with the Citizens, more than a mile out of the City, in token of their mutual Joy, gave together joyful acclamations and such shouts, that the Heavens seemed to resound, and the Earth to shake with the noise thereof.

done at Croia. And the oppressed Epirots, which had long wished to see that happy day, were now up in Arms in every place, wanting nothing but Leaders, whose coming although they greatly desired, yet they stayed not thereupon, but running together in heaps (as the manner of the common people is in all great Tumults) they set upon the Turks Garrisons which lay abroad in the Country, and slew most part of them; whereby it came to pass, that no Turk could stir in the Country, but that he was flung upon and slain, so that in few days there was not a Turk to be found in Epirus, but such as lay in Garrisons in strong Towns. In this fury of the people, the Governor of Croia, with all his Retinue, was by the Country people by the way as he went, set upon and slain, and all his Goods taken as a Prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recovered Croia, and scourged the Country, yet to remove the Garrisons, which Amurath had put in every strong City, was thought to be a matter of great importance, and more difficulty. For which purpose he commanded those whom he had appointed for Captains, speedily to repair unto Croia with all the Power they could make. At which time also, diverse Noblemen his high Kinmen, referred to him with their Followers, so that within a few days, he had together at Croia twelve thousand Soldiers well appointed. With this Army he marched from Croia to Petrelle, a strong City 15 miles distant from Croia, and encamped before it. This City is strongly situate upon the top of a steep rocky Mountain, as all the rest of the Cities of Epirus be, and was by the Turks well furnished with Men, Munition, and other things needful; yet Scanderbeg was in good hope that the Turkish Garrison there, terrified with the fortune of the Garrison of Croia, and the slaughter of the Turks in the Country round about, would be glad to hearken unto reasonable Conditions. Which to make proof of, althon he was encamped, he sent one of those Soldiers which had followed him out of Hungary (a faithful and wife Fellow) unto Petrelle, to offer unto the Soldiers, that if they would yield up the City, it should be at their choice, either to continue in Service with Scanderbeg, with whom they should find most bountiful Entertainment, or else to depart in safety with Bag and Baggage at their pleasure, with an honourable Reward to be divided among them. The faithful Messenger coming thither, and framing his Tale according to the present occasion, and necessity of the time, first declared unto them, how that Amurath of late vanquished by the Hungarians in a great Battel, and looking every day to be set upon by divers other Christian Princes, was so befuddled that he had no leisure to look into Epirus, or to send them any Relief's after that, he in the name of Scanderbeg offered them the Conditions here related; finding for the same forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way, to consider the dreadful misery that but the other day befel to the Garrison at Croia, and other their Fellows abroad in the Country, whose dead bodies as then lay in every Corner of Epirus for a prey to the hungry Dogs and greedy Wolves; which thing was easily believed of them of the Garrison, for that divers of the Turks lately fled out of the Country into the City, had themselves seen the same to be true. The Governor having a little considered of the matter, was content to give up the City, upon condition that he with the Soldiers might in safety depart with such things as they had; not covenanting upon any further Reward, because it should not be said that he had sold the City. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promised to perform, the Turkish Governor coming forth with all his Garrison, yielded up the City; and Scanderbeg mindful of his promise, gave unto them both Meat and Money, and sent them with a sufficient Convoy of Horsemen in safety out of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained Petrelle, he placed therein a convenient Garrison, and set all things in order as he thought good; but suffered none to enter into the City, more than the appointed Garrison, although it was then very cold and frosty Weather. This done, he presently raised his Camp, and following his good fortune, marched towards Petra-Alba in such haste, as if the City had been running away from him; well knowing, that though Time be evermore precious, yet never more than in martial affairs, wherein the least moment is oftentimes of such power as to effect or frustrate mens greatest designs. Petra-Alba is a City in the Country of Emathia, distant from Petrelle three miles, strongly situate upon the top of a Mountain, near unto the River Emathia. Scanderbeg had scarcely well encamped himself before this City, but that the Governor thereof, terrified with the fortune of Croia, and Petrelle, offered to deliver up the City, on the same Conditions as were granted at Petrelle; which being agreed upon, the City was forthwith delivered, and the Conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

Petra-Alba being thus taken, and all things set in order, Scanderbeg carried with the countenance of his Victory, without delay came to Stellusa, which is also a strong City of Emathia, 15 miles distant from Croia, pleasantly (as it were of purpose) built upon the top of an high Hill, standing in the midst of a pleasant and fruitful Valley, with great Plains round about it. There Scanderbeg encamped a little before the going down of the Sun, and rested that night. In the morning he sent a Messenger to the City, with like conditions as were accepted at Petrelle and Petra-Alba; which most part of the Garrison-Soldiers of the Turks would gladly have accepted, but that Desd the Governor of the City, which some few others earnestly withstood the rest; whereupon a great Contention arose amongst the Garrison Soldiers. But the greater yield desirous to yield up the City, when they could by no means persuade the Governor and those few which took his part, to yield to their desires, they violently set upon him, and delivered him with the rest to Scanderbeg, fast bound, and so yielded up the City. For which Fact, fearing to return to Amurath, some of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterwards became Christians; the rest were either honestly provided for, or else well rewarded, and suffered to depart whether they would. All the other weaker places of Epirus wherein any of the Turkish Garrisons lay, hearing that the strongest Cities were already delivered unto Scanderbeg, in short time yielded themselves upon like conditions; only Spirigade (otherwise called the holy City) remained in the possession of the Turks; which City is placed in the upper Country of Dibra, in the Frontiers of Epirus, upon the top of an high and steep Hill, as if it were an Eagles nest. Unto this City came Scanderbeg with all his Army; and having placed his Tent, he began first to assay if he could gain it by Composition, as he had done the rest; and the rather to move them by the examples of others, he caused his Embassadors to declare unto them all that had happened at Croia, Petrelle, Petra-Alba, and Stellusa, specially how he had used the Garrison of Stellusa, which yielded unto him, with all bounty and courtesy; and how that on the contrary part he had the Governor in bands, with all his wilful Partakers, whom they should presently see executed before their faces, if they forthwith delivered not the City. This Message troubled the minds of all the Garrison, but especially of the Governor, seeing before his eyes in the woful example of another man, what might by and by happen unto himself. Wherefore fearing to deliver his own opinion, and to give answer unto the Embassadors, he desired the inconstant multitude and unknown minds of the people, he first entertained the Embassadors honourably, and afterwards turning himself unto the Citizens and Soldiers, said unto them, *Worthy men and most faithful Soldiers, what is your pleasure, or what shall we answer to these our Enemies demands? Then one of the Soldiers that stood by (a rough bold spirited Fellow) unwilling for his own part to give up the City, and deeming the Governor to be of the same mind, in that he had termed them worthy and faithful, and Scanderbeg by the name of an Enemy, drawing out his Sword, and with his right hand flaking it on high, answered:*

*Most valiant Governor, this same and the like, shall I make answer for us. Nothing was to left purpose, then with premeditated words to seek to terrify the Soldiers the rest of men, first with the divers Fortunes of Croia, the rest of men, and then of Stellusa; for as the faces and countenances of men are divers, so are the minds, and the dispositions. Every man wisely directeth his own actions, according to his own proper humor, and by the same plays the Fool or Beelam. We prescribe no Laws to them of Petrelle, nor to them of Stellusa, neither let them prescribe any unto us. Let never so base example of cowardly Slaves ever enter into the thoughts of courageous men, to leave minds to yield to other men in their base Actions, much less in their Cowardise. And why? for every man liveth after his own fashion. Wherefore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kill the Governor of Stellusa, before our faces, let him sacrifice our fellow Soldiers, do you therefore think that we shall die in their Bodies? Shall our living spirits be there extinguished? Shall our blood there be spilt? But O happy Bodies, O ghosts of men ever to be revenged, which in worthy defence of your Liberty and Faith have indifferently contemned Gold, Silver, Death, and Torture, and whatsoever else miserable Worldlings hold dear or dimal! Wherefore carry you back again unto us? After this Answer from a Common Soldier, if he seek to impose these conditions: upon us, let him once more bare that arm of his, which men of courage fear not so much as he thinketh. He may peradventure enforce us to these conditions of his, if God for sake us; but assuredly persuade us unto them, shall he never. And yet for all that, your Master Scanderbeg is not the man we have long since heard him reported to be, of an honourable mind, easy to forgive, and such a one as will indifferently judge betwixt the Enemy and himself; for why then doth he hold in bonds the Governor of Stellusa, for that he freely yields, and honourably food in defence of his King, his Faith and Liberty? Why doth he threaten him with death, whereas he hath not deserved the same, although he hath voluntarily offered himself thereto for defence of his liberty?*

All they which were present, listened with great attention to the Soldiers speech, which was interrupted by any, until he had said what he would. Then the Soldiers thronging about him, and beating their Swords and Targets together, withal gave a great shout, in token that they all approved his Speech for answer. So the Governor encouraged with the cheerfulness of his Soldiers, returned the Embassador without other Answer than that of the Common Soldiers, and presently appointed every man to his Charge, and with great confidence ordered all things for the better defence of the City. But when Scanderbeg had heard the Answer that was sent him from the City, delivered by the mouth of a Common Soldier, he smiled thereat, and said, *He is undoubtedly a valiant Soldier, if his Deeds be answerable to his Speeches; but if his words be not, I will make him happy amongst the happy ghosts of them of *Stellusa; and by him commanded the Governor of Stellusa, with the other Captives, to be brought before him, and there caused some of them which were content voluntarily to forsake their Mahometan superstition, to be presently baptized, to the great grief of the other Turks. Desd the Governor with the rest, to the terror of the Defendants, were in their fight put to death; whereupon the Garrison-Soldiers with great Indignation gave a shout from the Wall, and bitterly railed upon the Christians.

Scanderbeg considering the strength of the City, with the time of the year, unfit for Soldiers to keep the Field, for Winter was now grown on, left Adis Galemus, a most valiant Captain, with a Garrison of three thousand Soldiers, to keep in the Turks Garrison at Spirigade, and to defend the Borders of Epirus, until he might at more convenient time himself return again to the Siege; and for the rest of his Army repaired to Croia, when he had in the space of little more than one month, to his immortal Praise, recovered his Kingdom, and driven the Turks out of every corner of Epirus, excepting only Spirigade; which City also not long after was by composition delivered unto him. During all this time, from his first coming into Epirus, he never slept above two hours in a night, but with restless labour prosecuted his affairs. He ever fought against the Turks with his Arm bare, and that with such fierceness, that the blood did oftentimes burst out of his lips. It is written, that he with his own hand slew three thousand Turks in the time of his Wars against them. But of his great and worthy Victories obtained against the two mighty Turkish Kings, Amurath and Mahomet his Son, more shall be said hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force and policy wrung his Inheritance out of every corner of Epirus; he proceeded further, and overran part of Macedonia, making furious Incursions into the heart of that Country, being then in the Turks possession; whereby he so enriched his Soldiers, that they desired of him no better pay. Which was so usual a thing with this restless Prince, as that it began to grow into a Proverb in most Princes Courts, That the spoil of Amurath his Dominions, was Scanderbeg's Revenues. Complaint hereof came daily to Amurath Court, which the crafty angry Sire (being then troubled with the Hungarians War) feared at the first to make no great account of, but as so that he could easily and at his pleasure remedy; although he was therewith inwardly grieved at the heart. But when the certain report of one mischief as it were in the neck of another, continually founded in his ears, and that he saw no sign to be expected of these miseries, he sent Adis Bagla, one of his greatest men of War, with an Army of forty thousand select Soldiers, at once to subdue the Country of Epirus, and to bring it again under his Obedience. Army, under the Conduct of so famous a Captain, replenisht the minds of the Turks with such an assured hope of Victory, that a man would have thought Scanderbeg had been already taken, and now brought to execution; yea the Common Soldiers before their setting forth, were oftentimes at vain contention for the division of the spoil they were never like to have: Scanderbeg was ready to promise his Soldiers, that if they would follow him, he would give them as much as they could desire. And on the other side, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the small Country of Epirus, with great terror and fear of Ali Bassa coming. The Country-men with their Families fled into the strong Cities, and the Citizens within their Walls left no other care, but to keep continual Watch and Ward, as if the Enemy had even then lien fast by them: the aged Men and Women commended themselves and all their trust to God by prayers, and then to the courage of the lusty Soldiers with tears, as in case of extreme peril and danger. Only Scanderbeg was nothing moved either with the terrible report of the Bassas coming, or the vain fear of his Subjects; but always kept the same cheerfulness both of countenance and speech, as he was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkish Wars, and having (as was supposed) certain Intelligence before from his secret Friends in the Turks Court, of all Amurath's designs. So that having felt all things in order for the safety of his Country, he began to levy an Army at Croia; at which time most part of his Subjects of Epirus, which were able to bear Arms, repaired unto him; the Confederate Christian Princes also, his Neighbours, and for most part his Kinsmen, sent to him great Supplies; beside other devout and War-like minded Christians, which voluntarily resorted unto him from far, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he chose only 5000 Horsemen and seven thousand Foot, when as he might have raised a far greater Army; and placing some few in Garrisons in the frontier Cities where he thought most convenient, all the rest he sent home again to their dwellings. At which his confidence, his Friends, yea and his Enemies all much marvelled, that when he might have had so many, he would take the field with so few; with which small Army of fifteen thousand, he marched from Croia, fourscore miles to Dibra; where hearing by his Espials, of the approach of his Enemies, after he had with cheerful Speech encouraged his Soldiers, he encamped with his Army in the lower Country of Dibra, near unto a Wood side, right in the way where the Bassa must needs pass. In which Wood, he placed Gue Mulachet, and Amela in ambush with three thousand men; commanding them to stand close, until they saw he had thoroughly joyned battle with the Bassa, and then with all their Force to break forth upon his rearward. The Bassa marching forward, came and encamped near unto Scanderbeg, a little before the going down of the Sun, and there rested that night, making great show of mirth and joy, with great fires in every corner of the Camp, as the Turkish manner of encamping is. Whereas in Scanderbeg's Camp, all things were silent, and no fire of any fire at all; for so Scanderbeg had commanded; which made the Turks the more careless, deeming thereby the Christians as good as already discouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his Army in order of battle, placing Amela in the left Wing, with fifteen hundred Horsemen, and as many Foot; and Mela in the right with like number; and leading the main battel himself, the rearward was committed to Uranotes: a man renowned in those days, both for his gravity in Counsel, and for his valour in Arms, fit to command or be commanded; but afterwards, amongst the rest most famous, for the worthy defending of Croia against Amurath, being then there himself in Person. Ali Bassa contemplating the small number of Scanderbeg's Army, feeling nothing therein to be feared more than the good order and discipline, which he saw in a small Troop of Horsemen, who at the first encounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpose that the Christians hastily pursuing their untimely hope, might disorder their battel, and so give occasion to their own overthrow. But by the commandment of Scanderbeg (who easily perceived the Bassas meaning) their dangerous forwardness was warily wayed, and all with safety kept in good order. So both Armies coming on, the Wings began the battel afresh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his main battel in the face of the Bassa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the Battels were thoroughly joyned, Mulachet and Amela suddenly issued out of the Wood, and fiercely fell upon the rearward of the Turks Army, where they made great slaughter, and forced many of the Turks for fear to fly. Thus was the Bassas great Army driven to flight both before and behind, being hardly able to lay down with such a small number. The Bassa had placed his best Soldiers nearest unto himself in the main Battel, as his most assured strength and last refuge; these valiant men stood fast, and renewed the battel, before almost lost. And here Scanderbeg's fortune was even as a fland; until that the well advised and valiant Captain Uranotes having received the wearied Soldiers into the rearward, and setting all things there in safety, accompanied with certain Troops of fresh Soldiers which he brought out of the rearward, brake through the Bassas Army with such slaughter of the Turks, that he made way for Scanderbeg and all the rest of his Army. The Turks discomfited with the invincible courage of these old Soldiers, and the slaughter of their Fellows, which lay by heaps wallowing in their own blood, brook themselves to flight; whom the Christians fiercely pursued, and slew of them two and thousand others taken Prisoners, with four and twenty of the Turks Ensigns; whereas of the Christians were slain not past an hundred and twenty. The Enemies Tents with all their Carriages, were at the same time taken also. After this great Victory, when Scanderbeg had made all his seven thousand Footmen, Horsemen, being unto them the Horles of the slain Turks, he brake into the Enemies Country, and entered far into Macedonia, where he filled the desires of his Soldiers with the wealth and spoil thereof, sparing nothing that Fire and Sword could devour; and so with Victory returned to Croia, where he was of his Subjects joyfully received. Ali Bassa with the remainder of his discomfited Army, returned to Hadrinople, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardice and want of discretion, for that he had lost so puissant an Army to so weak an Enemy. Whereof when he had cleared himself by the modest rehearsal of his former Victories, and the testimony of all the other Captains present with him in that battel, he was pardoned, and so again received into favour, and that great Overthrow imputed to the chance of War.

and now from Scanderbeg, and seeing himself else-where beset with so many Mischiefs, as that he could not tell which way to turn himself; tormented with Despair, and desire of Revenge, whereof he saw small possibility, fell into such a Melancholy Rapture, that overcome with the dark conceits thereof, he was about to have become the bloody Executioner of himself, had not Caly Bassa by his grave advice comforted up his dying spirits; by whose persuasion (contrary to his haughty nature) he yielded by his Embassadors sent for the same purpose, to desire Peace of Uladislaus King of Hungary; using the exiled Despot of Serbia (his Father in law) then present with the King, as a mean therein. Who at the first gave small credit unto the Embassadors, or unto such things as they told him, until that at length better perswaded of the true meaning of the Turk, he so wrought the matter both with the King and the rest of the Nobility, and especially with Huniades, that there was an honourable Peace concluded. The Capitulations whereof were, first, That Amurath with drawing all his Forces and Garrisons, should clearly depart out of Serbia, and restore the same unto the possession of George the Despot, the right Lord and Owner thereof; delivering also freely unto him his two Sons, Stephen and George, who bereft of their fight, he had long time kept in strict prison. Also, That from thenceforth he should make no Claim unto the Kingdom of Holideria, nor to that part of Bulgaria which he had in the last Wars lost. And finally, That he should not invade or molest the Hungarians, or any part of their Kingdom, during the whole time of that Peace; and to pay 40000 Ducats for the ransom of Caraman. Unto which hard conditions when the Turkish Tyrant had readily assented, he will condescended a Peace full five years was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the same by solemn Oath confirmed; King Uladislaus taking his Oath upon the holy Evangelists, and Amurath (by his Embassadors) upon their Turkish Alcoran. This was the most honourable Peace that ever Christian Prince had before that time made with any of the Turkish Kings, and most profitable also, had it been with like fidelity kept, as it was with Solemnity confirmed.

Amurath with this Peace delivered of his greatest fear, converted all his Forces against the Caramanians, who were the Injurers by him done whilst he was occupied in the Hungarian Wars. This King of Caramania knowing himself unable to withstand so great an Enemy, durst neither meet him in the field, nor trust himself to the strength of any his Cities or strong Castles, but fled into the Mountains, there fortifying himself more sure than in any other of his strong Holds. Amurath entering into Caramania, made great spoil in the Country as he went, and took great Booties. At last coming to Iscim, he laid hard siege to the same. The poor King seeing his Kingdom thus spoiled, and his chief City in danger to be lost, sent Embassadors, and with them his Wife also, which was Amurath's Sister, to intreat for Peace; offering to pay unto him yearly the double Tribute which he before paid, and for the Performance thereof to give his Son in Hostage. Upon which conditions Amurath granted him Peace, and so returned. In this War, Amurath lost his Son, due to the great grief of his aged Father, being slain with a fall from his Horse as he was hunting.

Old Amurath thoroughly wearied with continual Wars and other Troubles incident unto restless Wars, resolved now to retire himself to a more private and quiet kind of life; and therefore sent for his Son, Mahomet, being then but fifteen years old, to whom he voluntarily resigned his Kingdom, appointing Caly Bassa his Tutor, with one Chesre a learned Doctor of their Law, to be his trusty Counsellors and chief Directors. And so taking himself to rest, great one of his Noblemen in whom he took greatest pleasure, departed to Magnesia, and there as a man weary of the World, gave himself to a solitary and monastical kind of life, in the company of certain religious Turkish Monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great Kings and Princes, as well Mahometans as Christians, glad before of the Hungarian Victory, were now led less lothy to hear of the late concluded Peace betwixt King Uladislaus and the old Sultan Amurath; as being of opinion, that the prosecution of this War so happily begun, would have been the utter ruine and destruction of the Turkish Kingdom. Whereof they fought by all possible means to induce the young King Uladislaus to break the League he had so lately and so solemnly made with the Turk; especially John Paleslogus the Emperor of Constantinople, did by Letters importune the King to remember the Confederation he had made with the other Christian Princes, for the maintenance of the Wars against the common Enemy of Christianity; which Princes were now prest, and ready (as he said) to assist him with their promised Aid; adding moreover, That whereas Amurath had driven times fought to ruin him in Arms, and yet he had utterly rejected that Offer of Peace, preferring the Universal profit (like to infinite to all Christians) by that Religious War before his own private Security and Profit, being for his part in readiness to joy his Forces with the Kings, if he would presently enter into Arms; which he could never do in better time than now, whilst Amurath terrified with his late Overthrow, and still beset with doubtful War, had drawn his greatest Forces out of Europe into Asia, in such disorderly halt, as that it should seem he rather fled for fear of his Enemies in Europe, than marched to encounter his Enemies in Asia; and now being weary of all, had broken himself to a private kind of life. To conclude, he requested the King, not to leave him and the other Christian Princes of small Power, as a Prey to the Turk; who if he would assufully with all Hostility invade them, so soon as he thought himself free from the danger of the Hungarians. At the same time also, and upon the departure of the Turks Embassadors, for the performance of such things as they had promised, Letters came from France the Cardinal of Florence, General of the Christian Fleet, declaring how that Amurath having left almost none in Europe, was without all Power he could make, gone over into Asia against the Caramanian King, leaving a most fair occasion for the Christians, easily to recover whatsoever they had before lost in Europe; and that he was in good time come with his Fleet unto the Straits of Hellipontus, according to promise, and ready to invade the Turk, if they would pass back again out of Asia. Both these Letters being read in the Council, so much moved the King, with all the wealth of the Nobility of Hungary there present, as that they were never more sorry or ashamed for any thing they had done in their lives, than for the League so lately with Amurath concluded; for which they saw that all the Plot they had laid for their Immortal Glory, was now by this hasty Peace that they had made with the Turk, without the good liking

In conclusion, having much spoken of the Authority and Power of the great Bishop, he in his Name diannulled the League whatsoever, by the King made with the Turks; and absolved him, with the rest whom it might concern, from the Oath they had given, and the Promise they had made. Which so well contented both the King and the rest, that they desired no more qualification of the Oath, or the lawfulness of the War, but a Decree made for the continuation of the League with the other Christian Princes their Confederates, and for the prosecution of the Wars against the Turks, as was with them before agreed; whom, they could now say, they were not to forsake, and to leave them as a Prey unto the Turk, their great Enemy; now for none thing more in danger, than for their request they had taken up Arms in their behalf. Unto which unfortunate Decree, both the Despot and Humiades (the chief Authors of the late Peace had neither the means to leave unto your Kingdom and Scepter, (as unto his Son, then living in his Enemies Power) either was able, nor Persuaded to push aside for his Affairs. And would to God this your Father, most happy in such a Son, might have till now lived's joyful felicity had in that surmounted all others, if he might have seen you before his death. For as you seem unto me above all other Princes in the World (without offence be it said) most accomplished with the good Graces and Persuasion both of body and mind, as you inclined also with a certain divine and wonderful Fortune, under the good Conduct whereof, not only the whole Kingdom of Epirus may think it self in security, but all the rest of the other Nations also, lately by the detestable fraud and violence of the Ottoman Kings driven from the Realm of Macedonia, may also recover the former beauty of their ancient Laws and Liberties. For (to say nothing of those things which even from your Childhood having continually made you envious, have heretofore purchased unto you an immortal Fame and Glory even amongst the Barbarians themselves) what can be more glorious than this Victory which (as we have heard, and believe) you, to your singular admiration, have obtained, by the overthrow and utter discomfiture of Alis Bassa, with his so great and mighty a Power? But now O Scanderbeg (God go appointing it, who in his deep and secret Will hath reserved unto thee so dangerous times for the Publick Good, and Comfort of the Christian Commonwealth) there offers it self unto you an object of far greater Glory, with a fair and fit occasion for you to revenge your self of all the Wrongs and Injuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkish Sultan done, not in private to the person of your self only, but unto the whole State of Kingdoms of Epirus also, and not the detestable and cruel Miseries of your own Country only, but the Publick Calamities also, and those obprobrious Disgraces done against the Christian Faith and Religion in general, now oppressed (I will not say extinguished) and that is, if you with your victorious Forces will succeed in this extremity of our Affairs, not yet altogether desperate. Hereunto do all the Princes of Hungary and Polonia, and all other men of courage invite you, with all those devout and courageous Christians, which long since here with us, and ready in Arms, with far nothing more than the presence of your Christian Forces, have been so far from occasion (as God himself now offers) if you refuse not, will in all mens judgement be a sure mean to vanquish and overthrow our Common Enemy the Turk, and to drive him quite out of Europe, wrongfully by him so long time possessed. I need not therefore (as I suppose) to use any kind of persuasion unto you in this Cause and Quarrel, the defence whereof doubt purchase unto us health, light, and liberty; but being neglected, I fear and abhor to forbode what may ensue thereof. We Christians have been too too slack and backward in helping one another's flame both new and well near consumed in all, whilst no man thought it would have come home himself. I know as well as the Greek Empire? What of the Bulgarians and Servians? yet, mine own self, and many Calamities already, and yet also to be endured, who is able to recount? The brave and most valiant Princes, the trusty Bulwarks and Defences of the Kingdom of Hungary, from time to time lost; and the puissant Armies with us the South and West, who were so long consumed and brought to nothing, who is able to reckon up? Informed that there is no House, Wife, nor Altar, in all Hungary, which is not in some measure partaker of this heaviness. All this do the Christian Princes bear of, and yet the miserable estate and condition of their Allies can nothing move any one of them, but suffer us thus as a Sacrifice for the rest, to be on all parts exposed to the rage and fury of the common and merciless Enemy. Only Eugenius the most holy Bishop of Rome, and Philip Duke of Burgundy, have not refused to bear a part of the burden of this our afflicted Fortune; the one hath sent hither his Legate Julian the Cardinal, with notable and puissant Succours; and the other with his Fleet at Sea, and come as far as Hellespontus, so much as in him lieth, doth notably hinder the Turks passage into Europe. And who else together there is, not now far from us, and that is your best, where we are so desirous, which we require of you, moved thereunto partly by your valour so well known, and partly in regard of the imminent peril and common danger of us all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how evil you may be at leisure to take such an Expedition in hand, for the late troubled estate of your Affairs, and how you recovered Kingdom, as yet scarcely well established; yet notwithstanding, let it not withhold you, or keep you back's assuring you, that as this Expedition cannot be unto you most honourable, even so your present desert shall not be befouled upon ungrateful and thankless men; but that which you shall now first begin and undertake for your Preservation and Dignity, we will from henceforth and ever continue for your glory, and for the increase of your greatness, Fare you well. From our Regal City of Buda the fourth of July, 1444.

Of this the Kings motion Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it far better now in so fit a time, with his own Forces joined unto the Hungarians his Friends, thoroughly to buffet Amurath, than in short time after, himself alone to sustain his whole Power; by the general consent of the Ottoman Princes his Confederates and Allies; yielded unto his request; in liberal terms promising him by his Letters, in good time to be present with him with thirty thousand good Souldiers. The Copy of which Letters I thought it not amiss here to let down also.

YOur Letters, most invincible King, I have with Scanderbeg like joy and contentment received; which I in beg his the General Assembly of my Christians having caused to be publicly to be read, there was not any one of them that said which was not of opinion, but that so just an occasion of War by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalf also embraced. And so every man doth both publicly and privately affirm, That nothing could have happened unto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by some notable Service testify their grateful Minds, and bind unto them so excellent a Prince; as also to give so fit Succours unto the Christian Commonwealth. In which forwardness of my people I myself took great contentment and pleasure, both in regard of your self, and in the behalf of the Publick and Common Cause; seeing my men of War, and all other sorts of Subjects, of what state or degree were (without any persuasion used on my part) to be so cheerfully and courageously minded in defence of the Faith, and of the Christian Religion; and so well affectioned towards your most Royal Majesty. And to say the truth, Who is it that hath so lately hated God and man) albeit there were no question of Religion or of the common danger, that would refuse so just and lawful a War? for such a King, as unto whom alone we may and ought to attribute, That we Christians do not only reign, but even live, breathe, and enjoy the liberty of our Speech. Who would not willingly take up Arms, and adventure himself into most manifest and certain danger for the People of Hungary; by whom in all Ages the Christian Commonwealth, and whose Blood, been so mightily supported and defended? who even from the very cradle have been continual Enemies unto our Enemies, and have as it were even vowed themselves for the Honour of the Christian Religion and Name. Would God (most mighty and redoubted Vladislavus) and those many Christian Kings, might unite unto such Forces to the honourable War, as were answerable to my Courage and Desire; then happily Europe should not longer lie in this inglorious Estate, oppressed by Amurath; neither should the Fields of Varna or Bassia so often smother with the Blood of the Hungarians; nor every Corner of Macedonia with the Blood of the Epirots; both Nations being as it were become the Expiatorie Sacrifices of others Sins and Offences; we all now by turns perish, whilst every man thinketh himself born but for himself alone. But why do I unto my self pour forth these vain complaints? Truly, it neither repents me of my Forces, neither (as I suppose) if I shall please God that our Forces may once meet and join together in so happy a War) shall the Christian Commonwealth have any cause to sorrow or be grieved with the issue and event of our Fortune. For unto those fifteen thousand good Souldiers which lately discomfited Alis Bassa on the Borders of Macedonia, my purpose is to join as many more as may be, with all which Strength as soon as conveniently they may, I will begin to set forward, ready to follow your Example in all Events whatsoever. And so fare you well. From Croia the third of August, 1444.

These Letters being dispatched away unto the King Scanderbeg forthwith began to levy his Forces. And first of all he caused with new Supplies to be made strong, all those Companies wherewith he had overthrowen Alis Bassa; not suffering any one of them to absent himself from this Expedition. Unto whom being in number fifteen thousand, all men of approved Valour, he joynted other fifteen thousand more, no less valiant than they; such a Power as he never either before or after raised for the Recovery or Defence of his Kingdom. And so furnished with all things necessary for to honourable a War, cheerfully set forward, accompanied with the Vows and Hope of all his most faithful and loving Subjects. But being come to the Borders of Servia, he found the fright and difficult passages of that rough Country shut up by George the Despot, (Lord thereof, a man adorned with all the Graces of Nature, but otherwise a wicked damned Atheist, and a Christian but in name only) who but lately before restored unto his Kingdom by the help of King Vladislavus, having changed his mind, did now mightily cleave unto the Turk his Son-in-Law (by whom he had been before himself extirped) and in favour of his quarrel, and despiteful to the Hungarians, but the great of Humaidar, had stopped up the wales and passages whereby Scanderbeg was with his Army to pass; who by his Ambassador sent of purpose unto the Despot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in mind of the perjurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwithstanding he had married his Daughters unto the great Pleasures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good proof; requesting him if it were but in regard of the common cause of Christianity to give unto him (as unto his Friend by whom he was never in any thing wronged) passage; and would to that him with the perpetual note of Infamy. That he being a Christian Prince, and of late so mightily oppressed by the Turk, should now to the great Hindrance of the Christian Commonwealth, Weal part with him, against his Friends and Deliverers. But what availeth Prayers or Requests, be they never so reasonable, with a man set down to mischief? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other means to open his way, but by plain force, resolved so to do; although it much grieved him to spend those Forces upon a Christian Prince, which he had prepared against the capital Enemy both of himself and all good Christians, old Amurath the Turkish Sultan.

But whilst he thus discontented, spendeth his time with his Army upon the Borders of Servia, beset with many difficulties, Vladislavus pricketh forward by the continual felicitations of Julian the Cardinal, or else drawn on by his own inevitable Destiny, having assembled a great Army of valiant and courageous Souldiers out of Hungary and Polonia (yet in number far inferior to that he had the year before, for that month which he of the voluntary Souldiers were returned home) set forthward from Segedinus; and in the beginning of November (a time unfit for Wars) passed over Danubius, and entering into Bulgaria, came to Nicopolis, the Metropolitane City of that Kingdom (but then in possession of the Turks) where he burnt the Suburbs thereof, and in that fruitless attempt, he was refreshed his People three or four days, where he also mustered his Army, and took a view thereof. At which time Dracula Vayvod of Valachia, a man of great experience in Martial Affairs, being then present, and considering the small number of the Kings Army, began to persuade him to retire, saying, He had sufficiently learned by his own harms, to deem aright of the Power of the Turkish Sultans; who (as he said), was wont many times to carry more men with him into the Fields in to his Disport of Hawking and Hunting, than was there in the Kings Camp; wherefore he should do well, not to expose those his small Forces unto so manifest peril, in such unseasonable time of the year, but to reserve them to a more fit opportunity, when he might with greater Power encounter his puissant Enemy. This his Counsel most men of greatest Experience, and not carried away by other private respects, thought wholesome; but the Cardinal, Author of this fatal War, extolling with great words the last years Victory obtained against the Turk, with glorious promises of great Aid, as well by Sea from the Pope, and the Pontians, as by Land from the Emperor of Constantinople and other Christian Princes; augmenting also the great Troubles in Africa, and promising an easy and happy success unto these Wars in Europe; persuaded the King that Dracula his speech proceeded either of ignorance, upon a superficial Judgment which he made of the Kings Power there present, without regard of further Strength from his Friends; or else of the private respect of his own security, in regard of a commodious League made a little before betwixt him and the Turk. So that the poor Prince seeing his Counsel mightily impugned by the Cardinal, and not so well taken, as it was nearly by him, stood in doubt whether to leave him to his Fortune, and himself to his quiet Peace, or casting off the Turkish League, to join with the King in this chance of War; but at length resolved as a Martial minded Man, preferring the uncertain Glory of the Field before his own assured rest, laid unto the King.

Seeing that either your Princely Fortune, which hath ever hitherto favoured you, or high Attempts, or else the hope of Friends help, which I pray God fail you not at your need, or the secret designment of your Destiny, unable to be avoided, draws your Majesty into a different opinion from me; that your resolution, which I cannot by reasonable persuasion alter, I will as the judgement of time, and my small ability will permit, most gladly follow.

And therewith presented unto the King, his Son, with four thousand Horsemen well appointed, to serve him in those Wars; wishing unto him such good success as he himself desired. Afterward when he was about to take his leave of the King, he presented unto him two lusty young men, perfect Guides for that Country, with two Hosts of incredible swiftness, and with tears standing in his Eyes said unto him:

Take this small Gift in good part, as a poor refuge to the unto, if your Fortune hap to fail you, which I tremble to think upon; I pray God they be given in vain, and fail you fully, if my Prayers may prevail. Use it wisely, shall tell you to use them, you shall find them serviceable at your need.

And so taking his last Farewell of the King, returned into Valachia. Uladislavus marching on from Nicopolis toward Thracia, took many Towns and Forts by the way, which the Turks for fear yielded unto him: at last he came to Savimium and Pezecinium, where the Turkish Garrison trusting as much to the Strength of the places, as to their own Valour, stood upon their Guard; but the King laid Siege to both the said places, and took them by assault; where he put to the Sword five thousand of the Turks.

The Turks Rajah's terrified with those unexpected troubles, advertised the Emperor, beseeching him to leave his obscure Life, and to levy the greatest Power he could in Asia, for the defence of the Turkish Kingdom in Europe, which otherwise was in short time like to be lost; blaming also his disobedience, for committing the Government of so great a Kingdom to so young a Prince as was Mahomet his Son, unto whom many of the great Captains did half scorn to yield their due obedience. Amurath herewith awakened, as it had been out of a dead sleep, left his Cloister, and with great speed gathered a strong Army in Asia, and came to the Straits of Hellepontus, where he found the passage flopped by the Venetian and Popes Gallies, and was therefore at his Wits end. But marching along the Sea side unto the Straits of Bosphorus, he there found means to convey over his whole Army; using therein (as some write) the help of the Genovay Merchants Ships, paying unto the Genovays for the passage of every Turk a Ducat, which amounted to the sum of an hundred thousand Ducats; or as some others affirm, corrupting with gifts and Bribes them that were left for the defence of this passage. And being now got over, joined his Asian Army with such other Forces as his Bassahs had in readiness in Europe; and so marching on seven days, encamped within four miles of Varna, a City pleasantly standing upon the Euaxine Sea side in Bulgaria, where the Christian Army lay for Uladislavus hearing of Amurath his coming with so great an Army, had retired thither, having but a little before taken the fame City of Varna from the Turks, with Calachium, Galatz, Macropolis, and others upon the Sea Coast.

Upon the first report that Amurath was with such a mighty Army come over the Straits of Bosphorus, Uladislavus who before was in good hope that he could not possibly have found any passage, entred into Council with the Commanders of his Army, what course he was now best to take; where many which before had been moit for coward in that action (presuming that Amurath were now so discouraged, with the fame of his coming, that they advised the King in time to retire home, and not to oppose so small an Army against such a number of People as was reported to follow the Turk. But other Captains of greater Courage, and especially Humides, said, it was not for the Kings honour left to invade his Enemies Dominions, and presently to turn his back upon the first report of their coming, without first to remember the good Fortune of his former Wars, and that he was to fight against the same Enemy whom he had victoriously overcome the year before; as for the multitude of his Enemies, he had learned by experience (as he said) not to be moved therewith, for that it was the manner of the Turkish Kings, more to terrify their Enemies with the show of a huge Army, than with the Valour of their Souldiers, which were nothing to be accounted of, but as effeminate, in comparison of the Hungarians. Whereupon the King resolved to try the fortune of the field.

Uladislavus understanding by his Espials, that Amurath the night before encamped within four miles, was now putting his Army in order of Battle; committed the ordering of all his Forces unto the valiant Captain Humides, who with great care and industry disposed the same, garding the one side of the Battle with a Pen or Marlin, and the other side with Carriages, and by the Rearward of his Army with a deep Hill. Therein politely providing, that the Christian Army being far less than the Turks in number, could not be compassed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks Army approaching began to skirmish with the Christians, which manner of Fight was long time with great courage maintained, and that with diverse Fortune, sometime one party prevailing, and sometime the other; but with such slaughter on both sides, that the ground was covered, and stained with the dead Bodies and Blood of the slain. At length the Battle being more closely joined, At length the Battle began to incline to the Christians, for Humides had most valiantly with his Transylvanian and Valachian Horsemen, put to Flight both the Wings of the Turkish Army, and made great slaughter wherever he came. Infomuch that Amurath disuained with the Flight of his Souldiers, was about to have fled himfelf out of the main Battle, had he not been staid by a common Souldier, who laying Hands upon the Rains of his Bridle, staid him by force, and sharply reproved him of Cowardice. The Captains and Prelates about the King (whom it had better befemed to have been at devout Prayers in his Oratories, than in Arms at the bloody Battle) encouraged by the prosperous success of Humides, and desirous to be Partakers of that Victory, foolishly left their safe Stations, where they were appointed by him to stand fast, and disorderly pursued the chase, leaving that side of the Battle where they stood, open unto the Turks; but they were not gone far, before they were hardly encountered by a great part of the Turkish Army, for such purpose placed in a Vally fast by.

In which Fight Levo one of the most valiant Captains of the Hungarians was slain; and the Bishop of Veradum, a better Church-man than Souldier, and the first man that disordered the Battle, seeking to save himfelf by Flight through the Pen, was there strangled in the deep Mud, after after he had with his Horse therein struggled a great while. The Bishop of Agria, a man of greatest Authority with the King, was at the same time also lost, with many other Church-men more. The Cardinal with some other of the expert Captains retiring toward their former standings, were hardly assailed by the Turks, who by the coming in of the King and Humides, were with great laughter forced to retire, and even ready to fly. Amurath seeing the great slaughter of his men, and all brought into extrem danger, beholding the picture of the Crucifix in the displaced Ensigns of the voluntary Christians, plucked the Writing out of his Bosom, wherein the late League was comprised, and holding it up in his Hand with his Eyes cast up to Heaven, said:

Behold thou crucified Christ, this is the League thy Christian in thy name made with me; which they have without cause violated. Now if thou be a God, at they say thou art, and as we dream, revenge the wrong done unto thy Name, and me, and shew thy Power upon this perjured People, who in their death deny thee their God.

The King with Humides furiously pursued the chafed Turks, with bloody execution a great space; when as the King in his heat hardly persuaded by Humides to return again unto his Camp, in his coming thither found the Cardinal Julian, with Elif, one of his chief Captains, and others overcharged with the Turks, which had again made head against that part of the Christian Army; and there yet fought courageously, by reason of their multitude, being also backed by the Fanariaries, which all this while had stood fast with their old King, as his last and most assured hope, but were now come in. There began a most cruel and fierce Fight, where the fucuffs whereof, the Turks well saw the whole state of their Kingdom in Europe to consist, many were there slain on both sides; the Turks feeling their loss less than indeed it was, by reason of their Multitude; and the Christians, by reason of their Courage. A great while the Victory fought doubtful, infomuch that at length the Turks began to shrink back, in that part of the Battle where the King and Humides fought. But in the left side they prevailed so upon the Christians, that they were even ready to have fled. Which when Humides (having a vigilant Eye unto every part of the Army) perceived, he with speed made thither, and there again, with his presence reformed the Battle almost before lost. Which done, he returned again towards the King, who in the mean time had most valiantly repulsed a great number of the Turks, and now was come unto the Fanariaries, Amurath his last hope. There was to be seen a thousand manners of death by which both the Armies fought more like wild Beasts in their rage and fury, than wary and politic Souldiers. In this confused medly the young King Uladislavus with greater Courage than Care of himself, brake into the Battle of the Fanariaries; at which time, Amurath himfelf was by a valiant Frenchman a Knight of the Akshut first wounded with a Pike, and after assailed with his Sword, and had there ended his days, but that he was speedily rescued by his Guard, by whom this worthy Knight after great proof of his Valour was there slain in the midst of his Enemies. Uladislavus being got alive in among them valiantly performed all his parts as a worthy Souldier, and was slain as his Horse being slain under him, he was forthwith oppressed by the multitude of his Enemies and slain; his Head being struck off by the Fanariaries, one of the old Fanariaries, was by him presented unto Amurath, who commanded it presently to be put upon the point of a Lance, and Proclamation to be made, that it was the Head of the Christian King; which was afterwards so carried through the principal Cities of Macedonia and Greece, as a Trophy of the Turks Victory. Humides after he had in vain given divers brave attempts, to have rescued the Kings Body, retired with a few Valachian Horsemen, and fleeing no hope of recovery, (for all the Christians being discouraged with the death of the King, had now taken themselves to flight) gave place to necessity, and referring himself to his future Fortune, fled over the Mountains, into the thick Woods, from whence with much difficulty he got over Danubius into Valachia, and was there taken as some write, by Dracula Prince of that Country Prisoner; in his revenge whereof, after he was enlarged by the Hungarians, he aided Danus against Dracula, that in fine, Dracula and his Son were both slain, and Danus placed in his room. Julian the Cardinal flying out of the Battle, was found by that worthy man Gregory Samfo, lying in the desert Forest by the way side, mortally wounded, and half stripped, by whom he was in few words sharply reproved, as the wicked Author of that peridious War, and there left giving up the Ghost. Many of the Christians which fled out of that Battle, fell into the Enemies hands, and so were slain; but greater was the number of them which were drowned in the Fens, or that of the Cold perished in the Woods, or else after long and miserable travel, finding no passage over Danubius, fell at length into the Turkish Slavery. This great and mortal Battle, as it was with diverse fortune fought, so was also the present report thereof more uncertain; for the Turks that were at the first put to flight, returned in the Towns there by as they fled, that the Battle was lost; and they which had all the day endured the Fight, not altogether assured of the Victory, and not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themselves, whilst they suspected some deceit in the Kings Camp, by reason of the great silence therein, staid two days before they durst adventure to take the Spoil thereof. The number of them that were slain in this Battle, as well on the one side as the other, was great; as the Mounts and little Hills, raised of the Bones and Bodies of those that were buried, do yet at this day declare. Howbeit, the certain number was not known, some reporting more, some fewer. Yet in this most agree, that the Christian Army, being not great, scarce the third part escaped; and that the Turks bought this Victory with a far greater loss, although it was of their less felt, by reason of their multitude; least thereof affirm, by their own words. Which may well seem rather to be so, for that Amurath after this Victory, neither farther prosecuted the fame, nor showed any tokens of Joy at all, but became very melancholy and sad, and being of them about him demanded, Why after so great a Victory, he was no merrier; answered, That he wished not at so great price, to gain so many Victories. Yet in memorial thereof he erected a great Pillar, in the same place where the King was slain, with an inscription of all that was then done; which, as they say, is yet there to be seen at this day. This bloody Battle was fought near unto Varna (an ancient time called Dionisopolis) (a place fatal unto many Warriors, and therefore of them even yet abhorred) the tenth day of November, in the year of our Lord Christ, 1444.

Some maliciously impute the loss of the Battle of Varna, and the death of the King, to Hunniades, who (as they said) fled out of this Battle with ten thousand Horsemen; but this report agreeeth not with the noble disposition of that courageous and valiant Captain, but seemeth rather to have been devised, to excuse the foul dealing of the Clergy; who as most Histories bear witness, were the chief Authors both of the War, and of the lamentable calamity ensuing thereof.

From the Battle of Varna Amurath returned to Hadrinople, having lost the greatest part of his best Soldiers, and there with great Solemnity buried the body of Caracasia, Vice-Roy of Europe, slain in that Battle; and then calling together all his Nobility, again resigned up his Kingdom unto his Son Mahomet, retiring himself into Adagusa, where he lived a solitary and private life, having before vowed so to do, in the great fear he was in, in the Battle against Uladiassus; but after he had a short time performed these his Vows in that obscure and melancholy Life, he weary thereof, as some suppose, as not a little revived with the late Victory, or else solicited by Calil Baffa and other great Counsellors, returned again to Hadrinople, returning unto himself the Government of the Kingdom, to the great discontentment of his ambitious Son Mahomet.

Scanderbeg yet sticking in the borders of Servia, and hearing what had happened unto King Uladiassus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly grieved; and having now lost the hope whereupon he had undertaken that so great an expedition, resolved to return home again into Epirus. Nevertheless, to be in some part revenged of the wicked Despot, he with his Army forcibly brake into his Country, and there did exceeding great harms. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polesians, lately escaped from the slaughter at Varna, repaired unto him, whom he (according to the extremity of their Fortune) courteously relieved; and furnishing them with such things as they wanted, provided them shipping to Ragusa, from whence they might in safety return into their own Countries. Thus by the Dilloyalty and Treachery of the faithless Despot of Servia, was Scanderbeg staid from being present at the bloody Battle of Varna, to the unpeakable loss of the Christian Common-wealth; for it could not be, but that many thousands of most resolute and expert Soldiers, under the leading of so worthy a Chieftain, must needs have done much for the gaining of the Victory. And what more glorious fight could a man have wished for, than to have been so puissant an Army as this, to fight against the sworn Enemy of Christendom, directed by two such valiant and renowned Chieftains, as never, either before or since their time, was seen the like in one Battle against the Enemy of Christ and the Christian Religion? They were both men of invincible Courage, of exceeding Strength and Agility of Body, with prudent and subtilty both of long time exercised in the Turks Wars, the greatest terror of that Nation, and most worthy Champions of the Christian Religion, being therein both very zealous. Of the two, Hunniades was at that time accounted the better Commander, and the more politic; as a man in greater experience in Martial Affairs, by reason of his greater years; which was well counterbalanced by Scanderbeg his perpetual good Fortune, still as it were attending upon him, and by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the course of his History well appeareth.

Amurath advertised of these proceedings of Scanderbeg, as also of the great harms by him done in Macedonia, and that the Frontiers of his Dominions bordering upon Epirus, were by his Fury utterly wasted and spoiled, and his People there for most part slain, and that the rest had for fear forsaken their Dwellings, and left the Country desolate and unpeopled; was therewith exceedingly moved. Yet for so much as he fill flood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himself clogged with years, and therefore more desirous of rest; considering also the young years of his Eldest Son Mahomet, as yet unfit for the Government of so great and troublesome a Kingdom; with the perpetual good Fortune of Scanderbeg, and Malice of Hunniades; he thought it not best to convert all his Forces upon him, but to prove if he could cunningly draw him into some dishonourable Peace for a time, that he might afterwards at leisure be the better revenged of him. For which cause he wrote unto him Letters, mixt with grievous Threats, and some feigned Courtieses, as followeth:

Amurath Ottoman King of the Turks, and Emperor of the East, to the most ingrateful Scanderbeg, withith neither Health nor Welfare.

I Never wanted honourable Preferments to bestow the while upon thee all the while thou didst live in my and create Court, of all others most unkind Scanderbeg, but Amurath now I want Words wherewith to speak unto thee; thou hast so highly offended my Mind, and touched mine Honour, that I know not in discretion what Words to use unto thee, but of late one of my Domestic Servants. For neither will hard speech mollify the natural fierceness of thy proud disposition, neither art thou worthy of better, which hath far exceeded all Hospitality. And because thou wouldst omit no occasion to provoke me, half of late proceeded to that point of folly, that thou hast had thine own Affairs, and the Welfare of thine own Subjects, in small regard, by confederating thyself in Arms with the Hungarians against me. It grieveth me to rehearse of thy unkindness, and as it were to touch these sores, if my mind would ever suffer me to forget the same; that thou time by time, didst send me such insolent and horrible Treasons, and strange examples of a most unthankful mind, were to be covered with silence. Yet I thought good to advertise thee (although perhaps too late) lest that thy unkind heart do unthinkingly overthrow thee, with thy unthankful Kingdom; and then thou wouldst make humble confession of thy long transgressions, when thou hast left thyself, and left no hope of refuge in thy desperate Estate. We have hitherto sufficiently suffered thy manifold injuries: thou hast sufficiently provoked the Majesty of the Ottoman Empire, with wrong and contumacious despights; and with patience have born all these thy contempt. Thinkst thou that my army by thee betrayed unto the Hungarians shall be unrevenged? Thinkst thou that so many Cities and Towns in Epirus, by thee rent from the body of my Empire, with my Garrisons there slain, shall be forgotten? Or thinkst thou with thy late committed Outrages to escape my revenging Hand? Remember that the destruction of mine Army was my sin; that the wasting and burning of my Dominions; and lately, the Hungarian Wars, by thee so far as in thee was, commenced; with the Territories of George, the Despot of Servia, my Father-in-Law by thee spoiled. At length amend, thou graceless man, and expect not further, whether my indignation will break out.

Let not these trifling allurances of thy good Fortune, so puff up thy foolish desires, and shorten thy conceits, that thy miserable Fortune afterwards may move even thy greatest Enemies, or my self to compassion. I would thou shouldst at length remember my Courtieses (if any spark of humanity remain in thy savage Nature) and make me not longer sorry, that I have so evil befalven thee. For to let pass it is not the part of an honourable mind, to rehearse those things which we have in bounty bestowed upon any man; yet is it the token of a most unthankful Nature, so easily to forget all kindness past, as to need to be put in remembrance thereof. Wherefore Scanderbeg, I cannot bestow thy hope, and lament this estate; For to let pass the health of thy Soul (which thou a very Reprobate, esteemst as nothing) not to speak of the Laws of Mahomet by thee despised, and the holy Prophet by thee contemned, for the zeal thou hast unto the Christian Superstition; what hast thou (which now holdst thy poor and base Kingdom in such price) ever wanted at my hands of all these things which most delight the desires of men? Didst thou ever want Armor, Horses, a great Train of Followers and Servants, Money, or other Superfluities, the allurances of all Ages? Or didst thou want matter to exercise thy Valor, for increase of thine Honour? Wast thou ever denied Preferments, Dignities, and Honours of all sorts, for thine Aims, both at home and abroad? Was any man in my Court dearer unto me, than thyself? what growing Wit, not of Strangers only, but of them that were nearest unto my self, was better welcome unto me than thine? With what careful instruction did I cause thee to be brought up? When thou wast delivered unto me almost a Child, I deeply cherished and increased thy hopes, towards wisdom with Learning and Nurture; I have at all times honoured thee with rich Rewards, magnificent Praises, and Honours of the Field (which of all worthy things is most glorious) so that in all Feats of Arms no Soldier was to me better known, or Captain of me more beloved. For all these great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now thrustest thyself just as one, that I may be thought not to have brought up such a man as I hoped for, but a very Serpent in mine own Bosom. But the love of thy Country did move thee; which if thou hadst asked of me, would I have denied the same unto thee? which (if thou dost well remember) I so oftentimes voluntarily proffered unto thee? But thou hadst rather to gain the same by Treachery, than to receive it at my Hands of Courtieses. So time be it therefore on God his name, and that with my very good Will. And verily, according to my accustomed Clemency towards all them whom I have once well known, and been familiarly acquainted with, I now pardon thee all thou hast offended me; not for any thy present deserts, which are none, but because in this publique enmity it pleaseth me to remember my former kindness in private towards thee, and thy faithfulness (sometimes in my Affairs; especially for that time when thou hast been longer with myself, than the time wherein thou hast offended me. Croia and thy Father: Kingdom (although thou hast gained the same by foul Treachery) I give unto thee, upon condition thou willingly restore unto me the other Towns of Epirus, which by no right belong unto thee, but are mine by Law of Arms, by my self donously won. What more thou hast received from my Father-in-Law the Prince of Servia, thou shalt forthwith restore, and make him an honourable recompense for the other harms thou hast done unto him; and for ever hereafter, thou shalt as well forbear to offer violence to any our Friends, as to any our Enemies. So shalt thou for ever avoid the displeasure of the Turk and his Friends. Do thou call me necessary assisting, a perpetual Treachery; my native Country by my Policy and Valour recovered, dost thou object to me as a Villany?

than in vain cry for mercy, when thy furious outrage shall have me in Perjan an implacable Revenger. Thou knowest thy Forces, thou knowest the Strength of mine Arms; thou hast before thee Ezy, the fifth example of the Hungarian Forces, so that thou needest no further admonitions. Yet I would thou shouldst write at large, what thou intendest to do. Thou shalt also confer with Ayradin thy Son, who truly and faithfully Messenger, of whom thou shalt understand more than are in these Letters comprised. Farewell if thou be wise. From Hadrinople.

To these Letters Scanderbeg gave final credit, and left to the Messenger, but least of all to the old Fox himself, whom he well knew to have written nothing simply of good meaning, but only to gain a cessation from Wars, until he might at better leisure set upon him with all his Forces. Wherefore calling Ayradin the Messenger unto him, whom he rather held for a crafty Spy, than an honourable Embassador, after he had many times both publicly and privately discoursed with him, to far forth as was possible to found the depth of his coming, and had also further entertained him with all his Courtiers, he shewed him all his Campaign, with the strength thereof, which he did, because he would not have the crafty Messenger to think, that he was any thing afraid of his Masters greatness. And at last, greatly complaining of Amurath his cruel and perfidious dealing against his Father, his Brethren, and himself, he sent him away with such answer in writing, as followeth.

The Souldier of Christ Jesus, George Castriot, surnamed Scanderbeg, Prince of Epirus, to Amurath Ottoman King of the Turks, sendeth greeting.

How hast in times past, as thou writest, exceeded the use in many kinds of Courtieses; and at this present I will exceed thee in modest and temperate Speech; for I for I think there is no greater token of a base mind, than not to be able to forbear to give railing and opprobrious words, even unto our most mortal Enemies. Wherefore we have with patience received and seen both thy Letters; and Messenger; and to confess a truth, they have ministered unto me greater occasion of Smile than Choler; whilst at the first thou shamest not to accuse me of much Ingratitude and Treason; and presently following, in milder passions, somewhat of my Souls health, being ignorant of thine own Estate, as a studious Defender of a most damnable error. And at last, keeping neither Law of Arms, nor orderly course answering to our Affairs, dost most insolently and unadvisedly, as a valiant Conqueror to his vanquished Enemy, propound me Conditions of Peace, of such quality and condition, that mine Ear scorn to hear the same. Truly Amurath, although thy immoderate railing might move a man of greatest patience to intemperate Speech; yet I limpe the same partly to thy great Age, and partly to the unweariness of thy Nature; and the rest, to thy conceived grief, which I know thou canst hardly moderate; and the rather, for that I have not yet down my self to contend with thee in foul and unseemly Language, but with Arms, and the just Fury of War. Yet I pray thee, wherefore dost thou so exclaim against me before God and Man? as though thou hadst suffered wrong and injury from me and that thou hadst not true just cause to do the same. Dost thou call me necessary assisting, a perpetual Treachery; my native Country by my Policy and Valour recovered, dost thou object to me as a Villany?

object the same still and spare not charge me with such crimes for ever, I care not. The long Catalogue of thy kindness towards me, which thou rememberest, I could willingly remember, if it drew not with it the useful remembrance of my greater miseries; which if they were to be compared together, the greatness of thy good deserts would be overwhelmed with the multitude of thy greater Tyrannies which I had rather thou shouldst count with thy self, than blaspheem I repeat again. Every man that knoweth thee, may marvel how I had power to endure them, or that thou wast not weary at last of thy Cruelty and secret Hatred. Thou tookest away my Fathers Kingdom by force; thou didst murder my Brothers, and my self thou didst most wickedly vow to death, when I least feared any such Cruelty; and dost it now from strange to thee. O Amurath, that an invincible mind, devoid of Liberty, should seek to break out of the bonds of so great and infernal Slavery? How long at length dost thou think I would endure thy proud bondage? which for all that, I many years endured, and refused not thy command. I exposed my self to publick and private dangers, both voluntarily, and by thy diffidence; I received great calamities daily by thy self, and the administration of my Friends concerning thy deep Treachery, was risen mine Enemies; yet for all that, of long time I simply believed both thy words and deeds to have been devoid of all Fraud until thy cankered malice began to too apparently to show it self; then began I also to gloze with thee, which was manifestly one time one conceits, until I found occasion to recover my Liberty. Therefore there is no cause thou shouldst now grieve, if thou be well beaten with thine own rod. But these are but Trifles, Amurath, in comparison of those things which I have laid up in hope and resolution of mind. Therefore hereafter foresee thine angry threats, and tell not us of the Hungarian Princes every man hath been a resolution, and every man a partner. We were of his actions; and so will we with patience endure such Fortune as it shall please God to appoint us. In the mean time, for direction of our Affairs we will not request Counsel of our Enemies, nor Peace of thee, but Victory by the help of God. Farewell. From our Camp.

When Amurath had read these Letters, and further conferred with Ayradin, he was filled with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great resolution of so small a Prince, presently calling in his mind (as was thought) the difficulty of that War. Yet because he was otherwise coken of Fear, oftentimes stroking his white Beard, as his manner was when he was thoroughly angry, with a dissembled cheerfulness of countenance said,

Thou dost (wicked man) thou dost the title of some favourable death. We will give it thee (because thou leave us) we will give it thee, we our selves will be present at the burial of our sister Child, and in person (though unbidden) honour the funeral Pomp of the great King of Epirus, that thou shalt never complain among the damned Ghosts, that thou dost die a base or obscure kind of death.

And because at that time, by reason of many great occurrences, he could not convert his whole Power into Epirus, he sent Feris one of his best Captains, with nine thousand choice Horsemen, to keep Scanderbeg in doing, and to spoil his Country so much as he could. Which was with such speed done, as it was thought Feris would have been in the heart of Epirus, before Scanderbeg could have had knowledge of his coming. But for all his haste, he could not so prevent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and having his men always in readiness, placed fifteen hundred good Footmen in ambush upon the rough Mountains leading into the Valley of Mosca, whereby the Turks thousand Horsemen, as he thought most fit and convenient for his purpose. Feris descending from the high Mountains fall of Woods and Buthes, by the broken and stony ways leading into the Valley, was in that troublesome and ready Footmen, suddenly assailing out of ambush where the Turks having no use of their Horses, but rather by them encumbered, were as in a Deer enclosed in a toyl. In this conflict seven hundred and sixty Turks were taken Prisoners, and a great number slain, and Feris himself, with the rest, enforced to flee, crying fill out as he fled, Better some Javelin, than all lost. Scanderbeg having thus overthrown Feris, pursued him into Macedonia, and with the Spoil there taken, rewarded his Soldiers, as he had all many times before done.

Amurath grieved with the overthrow of Feris, presently sent Musapha a politic and hardy Captain with a new Supply of six thousand Soldiers, to take the charge from Feris; commanding him in no case, nor upon any occasion to enter far into Epirus; but only to burn and spoil the frontiers thereof, saying, That he would account it for good service, if he might but understand, that the Trees and Fruits of that Country had felt the force of his Anger. Musapha having received his Charge, came to the Camp to draw near the Borders of Epirus, continually sent out Scouts before his Army, to see if the passages were clear, and so warily entered the Valley of Mosca, where Feris not long before was overthrown. In this fruitful Valley, being the Frontiers of Scanderbegs Dominion, Musapha entrenched his Army, upon the rising of a hill, and placed Espials upon the top of the high Mountains round about, by them to discover the coming of the Enemy, and to have notice thereof by signs into the Camp; then referring four thousand Horsemen with himself, to keep his Camp, he sent forth the rest of his Army, about nine thousand Horsemen, to forage and spoil the Country; giving charge before, That every man upon pain of Death should presently retire to the Camp, upon sign given from thence, as to a place of Safety and Refuge. The Turkish Army ranging over that rich and pleasant Valley, burnt the Villages, cut down the Trees, spoiled the Vineyards, and made havock of all things that Fire and Sword could destroy; in that point executing Amuraths command to the full. At length Scanderbeg drawing near to this Valley with four thousand Horsemen and one thousand Foot, was advertised of all the Enemies doings, by an Epirus Soldier, who grievously wounded, had hardly escaped from the Turks; of him he understood, what number of Turks were burning and destroying the Country, of the Camp also kept by Musapha, and how Espials were placed upon the Mountains. Scanderbeg having well considered Musapha his wary proceedings, and seeing no Policy to be used against so careful an Enemy, resolved to vanquish him by plain force, by assailing him suddenly in his Trenches, before his dispersed Soldiers could repair to the Camp; and having to this purpose with effectual persuasions encouraged the minds of his valiant Soldiers, ready of themselves to follow him through all dangers; when he had set all things in order for the attack, the Epirus Soldiers, speedily entered the Valley, and warily presently presently discovered by the Enemies Espials, from the tops of the high Hills, and a sign given to the Camp, from whence also the appointed sign was given for the dispersed Soldiers to retire; but most of them being afraid from the Camp, and busied in taking the Spoil of the Country, heard not or saw not the sign given. Those which were within the hearing thereof, retired to the Camp, and at their Heels followed Scanderbegs Soldiers, terrifying them with calling upon the Name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Christians slain in the entrance of the Camp, with their Booties in their Hands, and presently the Turks Trenches were now by Scanderbegs Soldiers courageously assailed, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They having won the Trenches, prevailed fill upon the Turks, filling all their Camp with fear and slaughter. There was no use of Shot in that medly, by reason of the straitness of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Musapha seeing his Soldiers put to the worst, and that the Camp was not long to be defended, took horse and fled by the Port which was furthest from the Enemy. The rest of the Soldiers fled also, making such poor shift for themselves as they could. In this Battle five thousand Turks were slain, and but three hundred taken; for the Christians enraged with the Spoil of the Country, revenged themselves with the slaughter of the Turks. Scanderbeg lost in this conflict but twenty Horsemen and fifty Footmen. The rest of the Turks Army dispersed in the Country, hearing the tumult in the Camp, misdoubting the fortune of their Fellows, fled also; yet many of them were in that Flight pursued and slain.

After this overthrow, Musapha returning to Amurath, the best excuse the misfortune of himself and the other Captains before sent, greatly commended the invincible Courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderful skill in feats of Arms; perceiving Amurath, either to send a greater Power against him, or else none at all; saying, That to send such small Armies, was but to diminish matter to the increase of his Glory, and the Infamy of the Turks; and to use Policy against him, the Matter of Policy, was but meer Folly. It grieved Amurath to hear the Praises of his Enemy, although he knew the fame to be true, by the continual Fortune he had always against his great Captains, Als Bassi, Feris, and Musapha; he wherefore he determined for a time not to provoke him further, but to suffer him to live in Peace; yet commanded Musapha to renew his Army for defence of the borders of his Kingdom towards Epirus, against the innovation of Scanderbeg; but itrailly commanding him, in no case to invade any part of Epirus, neither upon any occasion offered, or conceived hope of Victory, to join Battle with Scanderbeg; for fear of such evil success as before.

At this time also the Grecians of Peloponnesus, (now called Morea) having before fortified the Strait of Corinth from Sea to Sea, with a perpetual Wall which they called Hexamilia, and deep Trenches about the same Wall, and also built five strong Castles in the same Wall, of purpose to take away all passage by Land into that rich Country, and began now not only to deny the yearly Tribute they were wont to pay unto the Turkish King, but also to invade the rich Princes of Achaia their Neighbours, as were contented to maintain still the Turks Tributaries; among whom Nessus Prince of Athens, and Tarant Governor of Theffalia for Amurath, ceased not by continual Complaints to incense him against them of Peloponnesus. Who having his Army in readiness, although it was now Winter, and he himself very aged, set forward from Hadriampole, and marching through Theffalia, came into Achaia, where most of the Grecians were before fled for fear into Peloponnesus. So passing on with his Army, he came to the famous City of Corinth sometime flooded; and there incamped his Army near unto the strong Wall and Castles, lately before built, hoping that the Grecians of Peloponnesus, terrified with the multitude of his Army, would without resistance submit themselves; but when he perceived them to stand upon their guard, and to trust to their Strength, he laid battery to the Wall four days, and having made it assailable, broke through the same with his Army. The Grecians having lost the Wall (their chief Strength) fled, some to one strong Hold, and some to another, as their Fortune led them; the Turks at their pleasure spoiling and destroying that rich and pleasant Country, sometime the Nurds of worthy Wits, and famous Captains; where they found wonderful riches and took Prisoners without number; in so much that they were fold among the Turks at a most vile Price. There Amurath for his pleasure cruelly sacrificed six hundred Christian Captives, to the hellish Ghost of his dead Father Mahomet; and afterwards imposing a yearly Tribute upon the Peloponnesians, and other Grecian Princes now yielding again unto him, as an inducement to their further Slavery under the Turkish Tyranny, he returned, taking in his way the two famous Cities of Patras and Sicy-tary. The rest of the Country of Peloponnesus, and all the rest of Grecia, sometime the Fountain of all Learning and Civility, became tributary to all barbarous and cruel Turks, in the year of our Lord 1445.

Old Amurath now clogged with years, and wearied with long Wars, was content to take his rest at Hadriampole; during which time, Bajazet the Son of Mahomet was born in the year 1446, who afterwards of long time with great Glory governed the Turkish Empire at Constantinople, as in his place shall appear.

The Hungarians after the Calamity of Yarna (wherein they had together with Uladislav their King, lost most part of their Nobility also) in a general Assembly of their States, made choice of Ladislaus the Posthumous Son of Albertus (and then in keeping of Frederick the Emperor) for their King. But forthwith as he being then but a Child of five years old, and chosen King more for the remembrance of the Emperor Sigismund his Grandfather, and Albertus his Father, and the good hope conceived of him, than for any other thing presently to be expected; from him; it was thought more than necessary to make choice of some notable and worthy man, unto whom they might, during the time of the Kings Minority, commit the Government and Protection of that so great and turbulent a Kingdom. Many there were in that honourable Assembly well thought of, both of themselves and others; but such was the Glory and Valour of Hunadius, and so great the remembrance of his worthy deserts, both of the Kingdom of Hungary, and of the Christian Common-wealth in general, as without his seeking, procured unto him the general Favour and Straght of all; yet so far, that even they which most envied his Honour (as overshadowing their own) were glad to hold their Peace, for that without him, the Kingdom was commonly thought the state of that shaken Kingdom could not long stand; So by the general consent of all the States there assembled, he was was with the great applaus of the People chosen and proclaimed Governor, as of all others most worthy to govern, and who was so much beloved by the People, that he was chosen in the first year of his quietness, and some few years in deciding of the Civil Controversies, in composing the quarrels of the Nobility, nor forgetting in the mean time the indifferent administration of Justice to all men, ending many controversies far from the place of Judgment, and that without all suspicion of corruption, and without any partiality, and never wearied patience in hearing every mans cause, that fitting, good, standing, riding, he dispatched many great and weighty matters; always shewing himself affable and courteous, as well unto them of poorer fort, as others of greater calling, that had any suits to him. So that he was of him truly said, That man was so kind to his Enemies, so very friendly, or unto his Enemies more crofs and contrary. In time of Peace he was always providing for War, heaping up great Treasure, and such other things, as without which the Wars could not be maintained. But above all things, he was careful of the good agreement of the Nobility, taking great pains in reconciling those that were contrary one against another, and that with such dexterity, that he was both of them and others generally both beloved and feared.

Bajazet born. 1446.

Turks.

In the mean time, whilst he was thus buſied in diſpoſing of the Civil Affairs of the Common-Weal, and the Administration of Juſtice, he was adviſed by ſome of his Miniſters, that the old Sultan Anurath was raiſing great Forces both in Aſia and Europe, and that as the common fame was, for the invaſion of Hungary. For the withſtanding whereof, Hunadias not unprovided, as never unſtimful of ſo dangerous an Enemy, or of any thing more deſtructive, than in ſome fort to be reſcued of the greateſt ſervice, he ſent John Veran in the fourth year of his Government, and in the year of our Lord 1448. accompanied with moſt part of the Nobility of Hungary, and the Vayvod of Valachia his Friend and Confederate, far forward againſt the Turk with an Army of two and twenty thouſand choice Soldiers. So having paſſed the River Trilava, and Arva, and travelling through Valachia, a little beneath where the River Mareuſa, running through Servia, falleth into Danubius, he with moſt part of his Army paſſed that great River; the reſt in the mean time taking paſſage over at a Town called Severin. Hunadias with his Army being thus gone over into Servia, by his Ambaſſadors received ſome Diſpatches he had oftentimes before, to put himſelf into that moſt Chriſtian Law, and remembering the great benefits he had received from the Hungarians, not to ſhew himſelf therefore ungrateful, than which nothing could be more diſhonourable; and to encourage him to the moſt ſervice, him both of his own Strength, and of the Aid brought unto him by the Vayvod; and that for the good ſuccels of the War there wanted nothing but his preſence and direction, with ſuch Troops of light Horſemen as he knew he had always in readineſs; wherewith he requeſted him with all ſpeed to follow him. But ſeeing the manner of his Religion, and better adviſing the manner of his Religion, he ſent him to the Turk than Hunadias, the more cleanly to withdraw himſelf from this War, preſently many excuſes; firſt, The League he had with Anurath his Son-in-Law, which he ſaid he might not break, for fear that if things chanced not well, he might be ſaid to fall into the hands of the enemy. The unſeaſonableneſs of the time, Autumn being now paſt; which difficulties in thoſe cold Countries they had to their off too much tell in the late War: These with many other such like he alledged in excuse that he came not, but the truth was, the malice of the man, grievous to see Huniades preferred before him in the Government of the Kingdom, and diffidence in the Kings designs, being himself Despot and King of Serbia, the King of the Royal Race, was the cause of his backwardness; so that blinded with Envy, he could not there rightly judge of himself, or what was fit for him in this case to have done. But Envy, with his unkind anger, threatened him, and he was fain to have revenged upon him, and to give away his Kingdom to one more worthy thereof than him if he should with Victory return. So passing through Serovia, as through the Enemies Country, he came into Bulgaria. After whose departure, the false and treacherous offenders advertised Amurat both of the coming of Huniades, and of his strength: yet he certified him of every days march, and how that Huniades was but with a small Company of his own, and some weak supplies of the Vayvods, come over the River; whom if he should not presently meet, he might further his march, and with his Army to get betwixt him and home, he might so flur him in, as that he should be hardly able to escape his Hands. All which he did, partly for Envy, partly to gratifie the Turks, and the better to keep Friendship with them; Amurat not contemning the Despot's Counsel, suffered him to pass, and he might enter a great way into his Country, and coming two or three days march behind him, he stopped the passage, as that he could not possibly retire, but that he must needs fight. And now that was come upon a great plain in Bulgaria, where the Hungarians, the Rishians, and the Rascians, the Plain of Coffova, through the midst whereof the River Schibischia rising out of the Mountains of Ilyria, running at length falleth into Moravia, and so into Danubius. This Plain is about twenty miles in length, and in five, environed on each side with pleasant Mountains, and the River Schibischia running in the River and low Vallies at the foot of the Mountains being garnished with many Country Villages and Towns. Into this fatal Plain, when as the Hungarians first, and after them the Turks, were come into a place of Combat defended; an old Amurat the first, in the Villages upon the River side fast by, where both Armies were late passed, with a loud voice cried out, O, how much I now fear the hard Fortune of the Hungarians. When as their passage over by the Foulders the River but one day, and the Turks, dividing their camp, overtook them, that almost of this Plain ariseth a small Hill, by the foot whereof the River Schibischia runneth; not far beyond which, toward the Head of the Plain, was a certain Tower built like a Pyramid, in memorial of Amurat, the first of that name, who had there slain Huniades. When Amurat, the second, hearing lest Huniades marching before him, should take, and so become unto him ominous, (for in such matters the Turks are very superstitious) he made haft, of purpose to joyn Batel with him before he should come to the forward River, Huniades came on, and the Hill early rising in the midst of the Plain; there incamped, expecting the coming of Scanderbeg; who was said (according to appointment made betwixt him and Huniades) to be every hour coming. Wherefore Amurat, hearing lest the Tower fast by should be taken,

The notable Speech of Huntley to encourage his Soldiers against the Turkish and the Enemies Power strengthened by the coming of the Albanos; provoked Humiales to barrel; who still refused the time in hope of his Friends coming; which made the Turk move him off from the Albanos; he then began to draw him to barrel, but especially by cutting him off from Water and Forage; for why, he much presumed upon his multitude, having in his Army about fourscore thousand fighting men, and other necessities enforced to fight, upon S. Lukerday, being then *Thursd*ay, commanded his Souldiers to make themselves ready; and dividing his Army into two and thirty Battalions, one officer, as he meant to give barrel, the more to encourage them, spake unto them as followeth:

At length valiant Soldiers, and fellows in Arms; who the day is come, wherein you may revenge that Dishonour or Difgrace, you received in the battell of Varna; and recover your former Credit of Conquering and Triumf, if you will play the Men. The Lord Ensigns appoints you to be the Reioy of this Army, which you so often conquered and defeated; who although they be in number more than you, yet are they in hope, Quarrel and Strength, far inferior. For what can they hope for, whisb fight not for their own, but for another man's Kingdom? and in consequence, what can they hope for, who are not Masters in the life, and torment in the life to come, and in death, perpetual and endless Misery? Whereas you on the other side, howsoever the matter fall out, fighting for your own Kingdom, your Children, your Country, your Houſes, your Altars, may wishfully hope for Victory, and triumph, and life. And thus the advantage for greater cause to fight, and the which if they do not valiantly overcome their Enemies, are in danger, with themselves, to loſe also all that they win. The strength of both is sufficiently tried. Once you unfortunately joyned battell at Varna, where if you might make exchange of your Fortunes there, you might have been the victors, and might have rather than the great slaughter of his own men, being not able to overtake us, there was notably beaten, with the loss of a great part of his Army; whose great loss there received, might counterwaile our Dishonour; although the loss, be suffered perforce, and cannot be changed. But that if you overthrow, the angry Deities will come, as if verily believe, the cause, rather than our Cowardise; for even there, all the Authors of that perfidious dealing, even there I say, even you received the just gerdoun of their treachery. Whereas we, against our wills drawn into this unſuſpected and unthought of battell, with you, preferred for the defence of the Christian Commonwealth, and especially of Hungary, that it should be over-run with the Turkish Power and Rage. The number of your Enemies is more to you to feared, and you with few, have often times beaten them, fight, and overcome, and have carried away from them the Victory. Hence we have learned, and taught by the Power of God then man, and in the Name of Christ Jesus our Saviour, have easily overthrowen their prophane Battels. Which way sever we have turned our flocks in his most mighty Name, and have with few Horsemen Armes opened our way, for that we thought we had to overcome, and by the might of his forepassed love have always felt at hand; neither shall we thereof this day say, if we be mindful of his forepassed love towards us, and of our wonted Calvary. God is always present with them that are just. Quarrel fight courageously. Hereunto is joyned the late King of Hungary, and of our Men at Arms, and barbed Horſes, who like a strong Castle cannot easily be overthrowen. Our Battalions are reb as may easily be commanded, and y strong enough against our Enemies; whereof the great multitude breatheth but confusion. We have ma notable and forcible Enemies of War, which they ha not. Besides that, every hour we look for the worst Scandebest his coming. The danger is not so ge as that we should fear it, or so little, as that we should count it. The danger is not so little, as that we may not go, for that our Army is halfe decayed, and of these Mountains to be led; and if we should never so easie, yet waight doing that we came for and glory with Victory, we may not retire. Unto Valiant, all difficulties are propounded. Wherefor fith this your last Labour is at hand, wherein the of the Towne may be for ever cut off. I pray

 I pray and beseech you, fellow Countrymen, that under whole Power and Protection we serve, and the love you bear unto your Country, your Wives your Children, and Wealth, unto the signal of batt green, so to show your valour, as men resolved to be fully recovered of the Injuries by that filthily and w this Nation done both to God and man; and espec ally for the blood of Anna. We left therebre a devout King, sacrificed himself; by which Reas of his Faith, sacrificed himself; by which Reason crifice, that Divine Anger is appeased; unto wh ghost I beseech you, in this battle to make an honour able Sacrifice. Not forgetting withall, to revenge the of other worthy Men in that battel slain. This your Task, is at once and even this day to be cut off; and so, our Country shall grow againe and the Kingdom of Hungary, so it may be from the danger of most cruel Ravage, as that it may by this dayes work gaine perpetual Rest and Glory unto the enjoying of the pleasures both of this life and of the life to come. Wherefore (worthy Sculdiers and fights with all our force, for that our Honour so requires; our profit so perswades, and necessity enforces. At first, our Country shall be murthered fall out, all shall be with us; if Victory shall tall Bliss and Happiness shall thereby be procured unto our Country, and Immortal Fame unto our selves; but if we shall be overcome, here we shall be most honourably buried in the bed of Fame, to live in Heaven for ever. Therefore, I beseech you, I beseech you so fight, as men resolved to be downe to over come, or if it should otherwise fall out, as Men honourably to die.

With this the Generals Speech, all the minds of the Hearers were greatly enflamed, and they all by his words, and their own hot desires, sufficiently encouraged; neither did old Ammarat marshal his Army in such leif care or diligence as the other side did; for he thought of sparing neither cheerful Speech, glorious Promises, nor Command; whole Army being brought into the Plain, and ranged in order of battel, filled the fame from the one side to the other, even as the smoke of Cannon, and the noise of a tumult of the Christians; and to abound in the morning for forward. Huanides had from the Hill where he lay, sent down both the wings of his Army, and had alight on both sides before the battel, to cut certain long Troops of light Horsemen to befall the other side in the midst betwixt both he had placed Zeeb, his Sisters Son, with a strong square battel of Men at Arms; and such as he had kept aloft upon the Hill for Reserve, had compassed about with his Waggon-Regiments, as with a wall of Iron, and a covering fence, the fierce and courageous Soldier on both sides, with cheerful minds, began at first to Skirmish a far off; but afterwards Fortune as it were fawning upon both sides, and the other side being more confident, they began with greater force to fight close to the hand hand to hand. Which hot fight continued about three hours; at length the Turks battel was put to the world, by Benedict Lajenus, who had the leading of the right Wing; and so likewise in the left also by Stephen Banffy, who with great slaughter had notably foiled the great Batta of Europe, still pressing hard and desperately upon him. Which diffidence of his Men in both Wings Amurath beholding, presently sent in strong Supplies, and in both places renewed the battel; whereby the Hungarian and Valachian light Horsemen, before wearied, were enforced to retire unto the Men at Arms; who ferred together, and standing as a strong Wall, easily repulsed the greatest Assaults of the Turks in which manner of fight many were on both sides slain, but far more of the Turks, by reason they were neither so well horsed nor armed as were the Christians. Hunades in the mean time with the Artillery from the Hill, did the Turks great harm; which Amurath perceiving, did eagerly send unto the Hill as he could, by that mean saving his people (so much as was possible) out of the danger of the Artillery, mounted on high above them in such sort, as that it could little or nothing now hurt them; which Hunades from the Hill beholding, came down to the relief of his Men, sending new Supplies to both Wings; sometime encouraging them with cheerful Speech, and sometime with his own most valiant hand; unto the weary he sent Relief, the fearful he encouraged, them that were flying he stayed, and where he saw the Enemies fastest coming on, there was he himself present to meet them, omitting nothing that was of a good general or worthy Soldier to be done. This valiant he commended, the coward he reproved, and as a careful General, was himself in every place present. Whereby the battel became so fierce and terrible, that in every place a man might have seen all fouly foiled with blood and the quarry of the dead. Amurath in like manner still sent in new Supplies, nothing discouraged with the great loss of his Men, preferring upon his multitude, as fully resolved order to fight; and to make use of all his Forces, in hope at length by continual sending in of fresh Supplies to weary his Enemies, whom he saw he could not by force overcome. When he was not deceived, for one Battalion of the Hungarians was often times enforced to weary four or five of the Turks before they could be relieved, they came on to fight. That day they dined and supped in the battel, refreshing themselves with such hot repast as they could eat standing, going, or riding. The Turks Army was that day in every place put to the world, and oftentimes with great laughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almost unto their Trenches; yet was the battel still again renewed, and so fought on both sides, as well appeared they were resolved either to overcome, or there to die. This cruel fight maintained all the day, was by the coming on of the night ended, both the Armies retiring into their own Trenches, but with purpose the next day to renew the battel, and not to give over or turn their backs, till the Victory were by dint of Sword determined. So with little rest, was that night spent, both Armies keeping most diligent watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as by battel therein to try whether they should live or die. It was yet scarce fair day, when both the Armies in good order ready ranged began again the battel; which at the first, was not by the Hungarians fought with such force and courage as before; for there was none of them which had not the day before spent their whole strength;

whereas there was yet 40000 of the Turks which either had not fought at all, or but lightly skirmished. Yet Hunades exhorted his Soldiers, not by faint-hearted cowardice to break off the course of the Victory by them the day before so well begun, but courageously to prosecute the same; beseeching them not to be now wanting unto themselves and their Country, but to remember how they had fought the day before, how many thousands of their Enemies they had slain, and not now at last to give over, and so shamefully to frustrate all the pains and dangers by them before endured; for that they (as he said) were to be thought worthy of Honour, not which began, but which ended honourable actions. He willed them to for before their eyes the Calamities like to ensue, if they should as Cowards be overcome; first, the divers kinds of death and torture; then, the slavery of their Wives and Children; the Ravishment of their Virgins and Matrons; and last of all, the utter destruction of their Kingdom with the horrible confusion of all things, as well Sacred as Profane; all which were by that one day labour (aid he) to be avoided. And therefore he besought them for the love both of God and man, with their wonted Valour, that day, to set at liberty for ever, themselves, their Country, their Wives and Children, and whatsoever else they held dear. In like manner also did Amurath encourage his Soldiers, with great Promises and Threats, perswading them rather to endure any thing, than by that day's overthrow to be driven out of Europe. He carefully viewed his Army, ordered his Battels, and with many great Reasons perswaded them to play the men. But after that some light skirmishes between the Armies were fully joined, the battel was fought with no less force and fury than the day before. Of the Christians many then wounded, came now again into the battel, there either by speedy death or speedy victory to cure their Wounds before received, and there did right good Service. Great was the slaughter in every place, neither could the force of the Hungarians be withstood; whose furious impression, when the Turks could not by plain force endure, they began with their fresh Horsemen, cunningly to delude their desperate fierceness; at such time as the Hungarians began most hardly to charge them, they by and by turned their backs, suffering them a while to follow after them, far scattered and dispersed; who allured as it were with the hope of present Victory, eagerly pursued them, and in the pursuit flew divers of them, and they again upon a signal given, closing together, and turning back upon the dispersed Troops, well revenged the death of their Followers; and with their often charges and retreats, wonderfully wearied the Hungarians, notably deluding their furious Attempts with that uncertain kind of fight, all the day long. Many of the Hungarians were slain, and the Turks had that day the better, and so both Armies being weary, night and weariness ended the fight; both retiring into their Trenches, there keeping most careful Watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day, the battel was again begun. Hunades his Brother, General of the Valachians, with his light Horsemen setting first forward, after whom in friendly order followed the rest of the Nobility, with their Companies. Where for certain hours, the battel was hardly fought with like hope on both sides, and a great slaughter made, but especially of the Hungarians; who wearied with the long fight, and most part of them wounded, were now all to endure this third day before Zischel (Hunades his Sitters Son) valiantly fighting fighting in the front of the Battel, was the first of the Leaders there slain in the thickest of the Turks. Emirius Marcellus and Stephen Banffy, both great Commanders, enclosed by the Turks, there died also. Amurath seeing the foremost Signs of the Christians, which stood in Zischel Regiment, taken, and his Soldiers (dismounted with the death of their Colonels) turning their backs, presently commanded all the Companies, which were many (as he left in the Trenches, for fresh Supplies) to issue forth, and at once to overwhelm the Christians, being (as he said) but few, and overweared with three days continual fight. Upon which the Kings Command, they fiercely breaking out, presently overthrew both the Wings of the Christians, before wavering; and in a great Battel (when their Ensigns taken) discomfited the rest, and with a great slaughter put them to flight. Hunades seeing his Brother now slain, the Ensigns taken, and the Battel quite lost, betook himself to flight also; leaving behind him his Tents and Baggage, all which shortly after became a Prey to the Turks; who from noon until night furiously followed the chase, with most cruel execution; but at length staid by the coming on of the darkness, they returned again unto their Trenches. The rest of the Turks Army that followed not the chase, by the wounded Soldiers, the Waggoners, and other Drudges of the Army, kept out as long as they had any horse left; but yet were in the end Every Mothers Son slain, though not altogether unrevenged, two or three of the Turks in many places lying dead by the body of one Hunades. Amurath to cover the greatness of the loss he there received, commanded the bodies of his Captains there slain, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common Soldiers to be for the most part cast into the River Schibonica; for which cause the Inhabitants of the Country there by, of long time after abstained from eating of any Fish taken in that River. The Plain by this great battel made once again famous, lay nevertheless many years after covered with dead mens bones, as if it had been with stones; neither could be ploughed by the Country-people, but that long time after Armor and Weapons were there still in many places turned up and found. Thus albeit that this bloody Victory fell unto the Turks, yet was their loss far greater than the Hungarians; having lost (as was reported by them that say least) four and thirty thousand of themselves, for eight thousand of their Enemies. Howbeit they themselves received the loss to have been on both sides far greater; as that of the Christians were slain seventeen thousand, and of themselves forty thousand; which in so long and mortal a fight is not unlike to have been true. In this unfortunate battel, fell most part of the Hungarian Nobility; all men worthy eternal Fame and Memory, whose Names we for brevity will pass over. Many in the chase taken, and the next day brought to Amurath, were by the commandment of the angry Tyrant slain. Such as escaped out of the slaughter by the way of Illyria, returned in safety; but such as thought to save themselves by returning back again through Servia, the Depsof Country, found the same so troublesome as that few of them escaped, but that they were by the way either slain, or quite stripped of all they had.

Neither was the Fortune of the Noble Hunades much better than the fortune of the rest, who having on Horseback all alone by uncouth and untract ways travelled three days without Meate or Drink, and the fourth day tired his Horse, and cast him off, being on foot and disarmed, fell into the hands of two notable Thieves, who in dispossessing him of his Apparel, finding a fair Crucifix of Gold about his Neck, laid it straits betwixt themselves for the same; whereby he took occasion to lay hand upon one of their Swords, and with the same presently thrust him through; and then suddenly affailing the other, put him to flight also. So delivered of this danger, travelling on, and almost spent with thirst and hunger, the next day he light upon a Shepherd, a sturdy rough fellow, upon the hearing of the Overthrow of the Hungarians, was (in hope of prey) roaming abroad in that desolate Country; who at the first meeting, stricken with the majesty of the man, stood at gaze upon him; as also did Hunades, fearing in his so great weakness to have to do with him. Thus a while having the one well regarded the other, they began to enter talk, the Shepherd bluntly asking him of his Fortune; and he for God sake craving of him something to eat. When as the Shepherd hope of his hard hap moved with his estate, and hearing of his promised reward, brought him unto a poor Cottage near far off, causing to be set before him Bread and Water, with a few Onions. Who in the pleasant remembrance of that past misery, would oftentimes after in his greatest Banquets say, That he never in his life fared better, or more daintily, than when he supped with this Shepherd. Thus refreshed, he was by the Shepherd conducted to Sindervan, where the Depsof having Intelligence (whose Country was all laid for the slaying of him) caused him by the Captain of the Castle to be apprehended, and imprisoned. But after certain days spent in talk about his deliverance, it was at length agreed, that all such strong Towns in Rafia and Servia, as had by the Hungarians been depsof from the Depsof, at such time as his Kingdom was by King Uladislaus restored unto him, should now be again to him delivered; and that Matthias Hunades his youngest Son, should for the confirmation of further friendship, marry the Depsofs Daughter; with some other such conditions as it pleased the ungrateful Prince for his own behoof to set down. For performance whereof he required to have Ladislav, Hunades his eldest Son, in Hostage. All which Hunades was glad forthwith to yield unto, for fear the false Depsof should have delivered him into the hands of Amurath his mortal Enemy. So the Hostage being given, Hunades was again set at liberty. Who upon Christmas day coming to Segedinum, was there by all the Nobility of Hungary, and great concourse of the people, honourably received. This ingratitude of the Depsofs no less grieved this worthy man, than the dishonour received from the Turk. Wherefore upon the sudden raising a great Army, he invaded the Territory long before given to the Depsof by the Emperor Sigismund in Hungary, in exchange of the strong Town of Belgrade, destroying the Country before him, and burning the Villages, never resting, until he had got into his Power whatsoever the Depsof held in Hungary; and not so contented, presently entered into the Depsofs Embassadors met him, bringing with them Ladislav, the Hostage, honourably rewarded; and humbly craving Peace at his hands; which he, at the request of the Nobility easily granted, with forgiveness of all former Wrongs or Injuries; and so having with him concluded a Peace, returned back again into Hungary. again with the rest of his Army to the Siege of Dyane.

rejoiceth

Not long after, the Venetians made Peace with Scanderbeg; and Amurath desirous to redeem his Captains about the same time sent great Presents unto Scanderbeg, with five and twenty thousand Ducats for the Ransom of Mulapha and the other Chieftains; whom Scanderbeg to honourably use, as if there had never been any Hostility betwixt him and them; and to wish a Convey sent them out of his Country. The Ransom of Mulapha and the other Chieftains he divided amongst his Soldiers. When Scanderbeg had thus made Peace with the Venetians, he forthwith led his Army again into Macedonia, with the spoil of that Country to make his Soldiers better pay, as his usual manner was. And to do the greater harm, he divided his Army into three parts, wherewith he over-ran the Country, wasted and destroyed all before him, putting to the Sword all the Turks that came in his way. As for the Christians that there lived amongst them, he spared, but left them nothing more than their lives; the Buildings of the Country he utterly consumed with fire, so that in all that part of Macedonia which bordereth upon Epirus, nothing was to be seen more than the bare ground, and the sheaves of the spoil by him there made. Which unmerciful havoc of all things he made, to the end that the Turks should find no Relief in those Quarters, whenever they should come thither to lie in Garrison either to that Country, or to invade Epirus. The first he made was so great, that it was thought he left not in all that Country, so much as might relieve the Turks Army for one day.

Of all these great harms by Scanderbeg done in Macedonia, Amurath was with all speed advertised, and thereupon exceedingly vexed; howbeit he relieved with his great Counsellors, no more to find any of his Baffles or Captains, but to go himself in Person, with such a Royal Army as should be sufficient, not to Conquer Epirus, but if need were, to fill every corner thereof. Wherefore he commanded Commissions to be speedily directed into all parts of his Kingdoms and Provinces, for the levying of a great Army for Helmets; yet whether he intended to employ the same, was not known to any in the Turks Court, more than to the Baffles of the Council. Which caused all the bordering Christian Princes to make the best preparation they could for their own assistance, every one fearing what that growing Tempest should break out against himself. But Scanderbeg long acquainted with the Turkish policy, easily perceived all that great preparation to be made against him; which he was the rather induced to think, by reason of the unaccounted quietness of Amurath, who all that while had neither sent any Army to Revenge Mulapha's Overthrow, nor much as a Garrison for the defence of the Borders of his Kingdom, but had let all things negligently pass, as if he had been in a dead sleep. Besides that, it was also thought that he had secret Intelligence from some of his old Friends and Acquaintance in Amurath's Court, who probably suspected the matter. Wherefore Scanderbeg considering all other things apart, gave himself wholly to the preparing of things necessary for the defence of his small Kingdom against so mighty an Enemy. First, he by Letters and Messengers advertised all the Christian Princes his Neighbours and Friends, of the greatness of danger of that War; wherein Amurath (as he said) sought not only his destruction, but the utter ruin of them all; exhorting them therefore to consider, how far the danger of so great an Army might extend, and therefore to stand fast upon their Guard. Then he sent Moses and other his expert Captains into all parts of Epirus, to take up Soldiers, and all the Provision of Corn and Victuals that was needful to be had. Wherein he himself also busily travelled day and night, not resting until he had left nothing in the Country, wherupon the Enemy might throw his cruelty. Most part of the common people, with their Substance, were received into the strong Cities, the rest took the refuge of the Venetian and other Christian Princes Towns and Countries farther off, until this fury were overpast; which as were able to bear Arms, were commanded to repair to Croia; where when they were all assembled, they were enough to have made a right puissant Army. But out of all this multitude, Scanderbeg made choice only of 10000 old experienced Soldiers, whom he purposed to lead himself, to encounter with the Turks great Army, as he should see occasion, and placed 1300 in Garrison in Croia. The Citizens also themselves were thoroughly furnished with all manner of Weapons and other Provision meet for the defence of their City. Then Proclamation was made, That all the aged men unfit for Wars, with the Women and Children, should depart the City, and none to be therein left, but the Garrison-Soldiers, and such Citizens as were willing to tarry, and able to bear Arms. This City of Croia was the chief City of Epirus, and of the fortune thereof seemed to depend the fate of all the other strong Towns and Cities, and so consequently of the whole Kingdom; for which cause, Scanderbeg took the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miserable sight, to see the lamentable departure of this weak Company out of Croia; all full of weeping and wailing; no House, no place, no part of the City was without mourning; but especially in the Church, was to be seen the very face of common sorrow and heaviness; where all sorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their devout Prayers, with fountains of Tears, ringing their hands; yea, and some in the impatience of their grief forgetting themselves, seemed to expostulate their grief with God. But when their sorrow was with tears abated, and their Hearts somewhat eased, the aged Mothers kissing their Sons, gave them many a fearful commandment; sometime rehearsing, how lovingly and tenderly they had brought them up, and other times shewing unto them their feeble Limbs and hoary Hairs, willing them to be mindful of them. The Wives presented their Children unto their Husbands, bewailing to leave them as childless Widowers, and their Houses desolate. The old Men murmured with sorrow, and careful of their Children, durst neither encourage them, for fear of making them too forward; neither dissuade them from adventuring themselves, lest they should seem to love them more than their native Country. In the midst of these Passions Commandment came from Scanderbeg, that they must now depart, that the Soldiers might take their places and charge. Then began their sorrows afresh, with piteous scratching and Tears; a man would have thought the City had been then less than it last farewell by the Turks. They could hardly be drawn from the embracing of their Friends, all now desiring to remain still with them in the City, partakers of their common dangers. But when they saw the Officers begin to be earnest upon them, and to hasten their departure, then with heavy Hearts they took as it were their last farewell, and departed out of the City, setting their many many times they wilt not where, for desire they had to look back again upon the City. This great multitude was conveyed also from the Venetian Cities, and other places free from danger; whither all the Country-people which were not before received into the strong Cities, resorted also, with all their Subjects and Cattel; leaving nothing in all the Country of Epirus, but the bare ground for the Turks to prey upon. After this multitude was departed, and all well quieted, and none left in the City but Men fit for Service, Scanderbeg thoroughly fortified it with all things needful for the defence thereof, and for the enduring of a long Siege; besides that, he gave to every Soldier convenient Armour, with some small reward. Then he placed Uranomachus (a valiant and famous Captain, honourably descended) Governor of the City. And for having for all things in order for the safeguard thereof, after he had in few words exhorted them courageously to endure the Siege, and not to listen to Amurath's flattering and deceitful Charns, he departed out of the City unto his Army, then lying within view, and began presently to march towards Dybra. But his was not far gone, before he sent Moses with a gallant Troop of Horsemen coming from Strigard, a strong City of Dybra, situate in the Confinnes of Epirus, bordering upon Macedonia; which City was Scanderbeg's second care, for that it was like to be the first that should endure the angry Tyrants fury, standing still in his way, as were the Fortresses of that Country. For he had there for all things in order, as had Scanderbeg in Croia, and had there placed one Pistor Perlat (a grave and polidate Man) Governor, with a strong Garrison of Soldiers chosen out of all the Country of Dybra, which were always accounted the best Men of Epirus, and was for to do greatly commended to Scanderbeg. Who delivering unto him all the Forces he had prepared for the defence of the other Castles and Cities of Epirus, sent him with divers other of his Nobility and Captains, to take order for the safety of those places, appointing unto every man his charge. As for himself, he with a small Troop of Horsemen went to Strigard, careful of that City above measure, as it were before divining the ensuing danger. Being come thither, and all the Soldiers assembled by his commandment into the Market place, he there in open Audience spake unto them as followeth.

Almighty God could not this day after unto you (worthy Soldiers of Strigard) better matter, nor then could a fairer occasion be presented unto brave Minds and Soldiers desirous of Honour, than that which now hath caused you to take up most joyful Arms. Wherein you may for ever, by worthy example, be known your constant Faith and worthy Valour, both towards me your private, and the people of Epirus in general. Hitherto we have borne Arms for the Honour of our Kingdom, but now we must fight for our Lives, our Liberty, and the Walls of our Country. You must now force your selves, that you do not by Reproach and Cowardise stain the worthy Praises you have already deserved, by the great Victories you have obtained under my Conduct. The greatest part of the fortune of this War dependeth upon you; For, the first passage of Amurath into Epirus (that is, my self may be unto you the first Messenger of that danger) will be this way; the first fury of the Turks will assault you, that having here as it were broken down the strongest Fortresses of Epirus, he may afterwards break into the Country, more subject to danger. The first fruits of this War is yours, you (if you bear the hearts of courageous Men, mindful of your Liberty) may beat down the proud strength of the haughty Enemy, and dislodge his high Councils. The Ottoman King shall have the beginning both of his hope and fear, of you; if he shall find you so minded, as I now for you gallantly moved, and with joy hear your valiant indignation; he will in every place fear a great force of danger, and thereby learn to abstain from the other Cities of Epirus. Neither will he be here long at a vain Siege, except the wayward old man will foolishly herein gaze at his whole Forces; for such is the situation and strength of this City, that it may easily (as at nought) an angry Enemy. Therefore resolve with your selves (worthy Soldiers and Citizens) only by constancy and faithfulness, without bloodshed, to gain unto your selves an honourable Victory. Of your Valour (which I willingly speak of) dependeth for the most part the faithfulness of all the rest; they will look upon you, whom they may praise or accuse, and whose Example they may follow in the fortune of these Wars. But to what purpose should men of worth in their actions pretend the necessity of Faith, or choice of Fortune? whereas by reason of things we both best begin and accomplish. It seldom cometh, that Fortune faileth the second advice, or is not obedient to Virtue; and you have all things which most polidate Arms could provide for your safety. You want not Armour, you want not plentiful Provision of Victuals, you want not valiant men; the superfluous multitude of unnecessary people, the pitiful lamentation of Women, and troublesome crying of Children shall not withdraw you from your publick Charge, from your service and defence of your Country; I have left you alone to your selves, for defence of your City, your Religion, and Dwellings, that you might be encouraged only with the provocations of Honour and Liberty, with the emulation of adventure and danger, and the very sight of one another; and I my self will not be far off with my courageous Soldiers, a silent Beholder and Encourager of your Virtue; where although I may not avert from you all the force of the cruel Enemy by your adventure, nor try the whole Force of this War in plain Field; yet will I turn a great part of your dangers upon my self, and trouble the Enemies design with many a hot Skirmish. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor safer kind of War for us, amongst such a multitude of men, and so many thousands of Soldiers, than never to adventure all upon the Enemy in plain Field, neither to adventure all upon the Fortune of one Conflict, although a man did see apparent signs of Victory. He will of purpose at the first give us the opportunity of good bay; he will feed our hardiness with the blood of his base Soldiers, the easier to intrap and oppress our valour, allowed with the sweet bait of good Fortunes; but the crafty Devices of the Ottoman King, are by great policy and consideration to be frustrated; this mighty Enemy will by little and little to be cut off at time and place shall give occasion. For truly that Victory should be unto one lamentable, which I should buy with the blood of my Soldiers; and believe me, it would be unto me more fearful than pleasant fight, to see eight or ten thousand of my Countrymen, with the loss of a few of you, I praise and honour my Subjects of Epirus for valiant Conquerors, if they shall not suffer themselves to be conquered of the Turkish King. The rest I had rather your courageous Soldiers of Dybra should consider with your selves, than that I should come to distrust of your assisted Faith, by giving you a careful and tedious Admonition.

When Scanderbeg had with cheerful persivation thus encouraged the Minds of them of Strigard, he departed thence, and visited divers other Cities of Epirus; where finding all things politically ordered by Moses and the other Captains, whom he had put in trust, he returned returned to his Army, then lying near unto Cava.

Whilst Scanderbeg was with great carefulness yet thus providing for the safeguard of his Kingdom, in the mean time Amurath his Army was assembled at Hadruple, to the number of a hundred and fifty thousand men, whereof many were Pioneers, and men appointed for other base Services necessary at the Siege of Towns. Of this great Army Amurath sent forty thousand light Horsemen before him to Sfergrade, who according to his command came and incamped before the City. The news of their coming, with a great deal more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his small Army near the Siege of Town. Of these four thousand Horse, and a thousand Foot, took the way toward Sfergrade, and strongly incamped his Army within seven miles of the City. Here having fed all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moses and Tamulus, went by certain blind ways through the Mountains and Woods, until they came near unto the City, that from the place where he stood, he might easily discover in what fort the Enemy lay incamped; and so returning back again to his Camp, rose with his Army in the night following, and drawing as near unto the Turks Army as he could, undisturbed, placed all his Army in the covert of the Woods and forest Vallies, unpereceived of his Enemies. After that, he sent forth Alfa and Musafis his Nephew, with thirty of his best Horsemen, apparelled as if they had been but Common Soldiers, but passing well mounted, driving before them certain Horses laden with Corn, by a by-way, as if they had secretly purposed to have got into the City. The day then breaking, they were discovered by the Turks Scouts, and set upon; where at the first Alfa and the rest began of purpose to fly; but when he saw that they were pursued but with like number to themselves, he turned back upon the Turks, and flew free of them, and chased the rest unto the Camp. The General seeing what had happened, sent forth four thousand Horsemen to pursue these supposed Victualers, whom they quickly recovered the fight of, for that Alfa of purpose had made small halt to fly; but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Alfa left the Horses laden with Corn, and fled; yet so, that he still flew on the Turks with hope to overtake him, until he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his Army lay in wait; by whom they were suddenly assailed on every side, and with great slaughter put to flight. In this Conflict two thousand of the Turks were slain, and a thousand of their Horses taken; of the Christians were lost but two and twenty. This was the first welcome of the Turks Army to Sfergrade.

About eight days after came Amurath with all his Army, in the beginning of May, Anno Dom. 1449, and having made the greatest view he could with his huge Army to terrify the Defendants, he incamped the halter foot of his Footmen at the foot of the Hill whereon the City stood, and lay himself with his Janizaries, and other his most valiant Soldiers, about three quarters of a mile further off; where after he had been full one day, and well considered the strength of the place, toward evening he sent a Messenger to the City, who requested to speak with the Governor Perlat. Whereof he hearing, came to the Wall; of whom the Messenger requested, That he would command the soldiers standing by, to go further-off, forasmuch as he had something in secret to say unto him from his Master. Unto whom Perlat merrily answered, It is like indeed to be some great secret, that you would have kept not only from the hearing of my Soldiers, but from the very light of the day, and therefore have chosen the night; but I have not learned of mine Elders, to hear any Message from mine Enemies by night, neither at any time else out of the hearing of the Garrison Soldiers, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of this City, and I the guard of my Person; you must therefore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your Master so please, I will hear you at large. And therefore commanded him to depart from the Walls. So he returned for that time without Audience as he conceived. It grieved Amurath not a little, to see his Messenger so lightly regarded; yet for as much as he had more hope to gain the City by large Offers, or some reasonable Composition, than by all his great force, he diffembled his wrath, and the next day sent the Messenger again, with one of his Baffas, a grave and well spoken man, himself born in Epirus. This Baffa, with three Soldiers and two Servitors, was by the Governors commandment, by one of the Ports received into the City, and brought into Saint Maries Church. Where after he had with great Eloquence sought to insinuate himself into the minds of the Governor and the hearers, and afterwards augmented the terror of Amurath's Power beyond all measure, laying before them the great Victories of him, and his Princes, against the Hungarians and other Christian Princes; in fine, he exhorted them to yield the City unto him; in whose name he promised first; That the Citizens should in all respects under his Government live as they had before done under Scanderbeg; then, That the Governor should receive at Amurath's hands most honourable Preferments, with many rich and Princely Gifts; and, That it should be lawful for the Garrison Soldiers to depart in safety whither they would, and to have three hundred thousand Aspers divided amongst them in reward. But when the Baffa finished his Speech, the Governor in this sort replied:

If you had not delivered this Speech unto Perlat the noblest man, devoted unto the defence of their Liberty, it is probable perhaps have wrought some effect; and our Governor, (said he) might peradventure listen unto your Offers, until we were at first afraid of the Ottoman King, Baffa, and the vain promises of our Enemies, or our own weariness of the Government of the noble Scanderbeg. But forasmuch as no evil desert of his, nor good desert of your Master, hath yet passed, for which we should prefer a stranger before our natural Sovereign, an Enemy before a Friend, a Turk before a Christian; let your Master proceed first in his action again, let him prove his fortune, let him force his way, let him break down our Walls, make havock of our Men, and by strong hand drive us to humble our selves at his Feet, and to sue for Peace. But it were a great Dishonour, yea a thing almost to be laughed at, if we should cowardly accept of these Conditions by him offered, before any Assault given, before one drop of Blood shed, before any Soldier did go missing as was done for any Wound received, before one Stone were flung in the Wall, or any small breach made. But your Master shall do better to raise his Siege, and get him back again to Hadruple, there to spend the small remainder of his old years in quiet, and not to provide in his final Enemies, whose courage in defence of our Liberties, and safety towards our Princes, he hath so oftentimes proved to be great Dishonour, and loss of his Armies. The Faith I have once given to my Sovereign, for the defence of this City, I will never never forget, until the effusion of the last drop of my blood. If shall be unto me Reward and Honour enough, if I either living defend this City, or with loss of my life shall leave my faithful Soul at liberty, and my Carcase amongst the dead Bodies of worthy Soldiers, when I shall find a way into a far better place.

The General having given this resolute Answer unto the Baffa, he suffered him to depart at dinner, and afterwards led him through the midst of the City; where he saw great store of Victuals, by the Governor commanded of purpose to be set in them, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the City by long Siege. And so sent the Baffa out by the same Port whereby he came in, much discontented with the Answer he was to return to his Master.

When Amurath understood by the Baffa, of the Governors Resolution, he was therewith exceeding wrath, and thereupon with his great Ordnance battered the City three days without intermission. And having by the fury of his Artillery made a small Breach, he forthwith gave thereunto a most terrible Assault, labouering first to win the fame by the force and multitude of his common Soldiers, which the Turks call Alpisi, whom he forced by great numbers to that Service. Of these Soldiers the Turk in his Wars make no great reckoning, but to blune the Swedes of his Enemies, or to ease their own fury, thereby to give the easier Victory to his Janizaries and other his better Soldiers; which the Ottoman Kings hold for good policy. Whilst these forlorn Soldiers, without respect of danger pressing forward, are slain by heaps at the Breach, the Janizaries at the same time in another place stretched to have scaled the Walls of the City, but whilst they with much labour and difficulty first crawl up the steep Rock whereon the City was built, and afterward desperately mount up their Scaling-Ladders, they were by the Defendants, with huge Stones and weighty pieces of Timber cast upon them, beaten down, wherewith they were driven headlong to the bottom of the Rock, and so miserably slain. Many of them together with their Scaling-Ladders, were by the Christians thrust from the Wall, and tumbling from the Rock, violently carried with them others coming up behind them. Some few got to the top of the Walls, and taking hold of the Battlements of the Walls, lost some their Fingers, some their Hands, but most their Lives, being beaten down as the other were. Many of them which stood farther off, were then wounded also, and with Shot from the Walls slain. With this miserable slaughter, and no hope to prevail, the Turks discouraged, began to withdraw themselves from the Assault; but the Baffas and Captains standing behind them, forced them again forward, exhorting some, threatening others, and beating the rest forward with their Truncheons. By which means the Assault was again renewed, but not with such courage as before, though with no less slaughter; which the Defendants seeing gave from the Walls great tokens of Joy and Triumph. Amurath perceiving his discouraged Soldiers ready of themselves to forsake the Assault, presently sent Ferri-Bassa (one of his most valiant Captains) with a new Supply of 3000 chosen Soldiers to renew the fight. The Christians well aware of their coming, ceased not with continual Shot to beat them from the Walls; but such was the forwardness of that fierce Captain, that without regard of danger, he brought his Men to the Walls, where the Defendants from above overwhelmed them with Stones, Timber, Wild-fire, and such other things as are usually prepared for the defence of Towns besieged. For all that, Ferri-Bassa gave so great an Assault, that he flew divers of the Defendants upon the Walls, and had these forcibly entred, had not the Governor, perceiving the danger, with a Company of fresh Soldiers come with speed to the defence of that place; whereby the Enemy was presently repelled, and driven again from the Walls. Amurath feeling the great slaughter of his Men, and no hope of success, caused a Retreat to be sounded, and so leaving the Assault, retired again into his Camp. The great loss and dishonour at this Assault received, much troubled his wayward mind; who for all that yet ceased not to give the like vain Attempts. At length, the Captain of the Janizaries perceiving that part of the City which was farthest from the Camp, to be commonly but slenderly manned, by reason that it seemed a place impregnable, both for the height and steepness of the Rock; told Amurath, That he would assay (if it so pleased him) fiercely in the night to attempt by that passage to enter the City; where as they thought nothing was more to be feared, than the height thereof, which they, supported with the wings of desire, doubted not to mount unto. This his device exceedingly pleased the King, and was the next night with great silence put in execution. But such was the carefulness of the Governor over the City, that he perceived nothing could be done against the same, but that it was forthwith by him discovered. The Governor advertised by the Watch, of the Turks Attempt, with great silence presently prepared to the place with a great Company of the Garrison Soldiers, and standing close, from the top of the Wall beheld the Turks, as they had been a swarm of Comets, climbing up the high Rocks, and one helping up another, by such desperate way, as was in reason to have been thought no man would have attempted. But when they were come to the top of the Rock, and now even ready to enter, they were from above suddenly overwhelmed, as it had been with a shower of Shot, and so violently forced down that high Rock, that most part of them which had got up to any height, were miserably crushed to death, either with the weight of themselves, or with others falling upon them, and many of the rest slain when they from the top of the Rock; wherewith Amurath presently understanding, was therewith exceedingly grieved.

During the time of this Siege Scanderbeg never lay long still in one place, but removed continually from place to place, as best served his purpose, breaking sometimes into one quarter of the Camp, and sometimes into another, and straightway to suddenly go again, and as it were vanished out of sight, that Amurath many times wondered what was become of him. At this time, being the later end of June, he was come with his Army within eight miles of Amurath's Camp; and from thence sent Moses his greatest Captain, on the attire of a common Soldier, with two men, to take view how the Enemy lay incamped. By which trusty Espies he was informed, That the Turks lay in great security, as men without fear, keeping but negligent Watch. Of which opportunity, Scanderbeg rejoycing, the night following suddenly assaulted one quarter of the Turks Camp. Whose coming, although it was a little before day, yet the Turks discovered, yet his furious Assault was so sudden and so forcible, that he flew two thousand of the Turks, and filled every corner of that great Camp with fear and tumult, before they could well arm themselves or make resistance. After which slaughter he safely retired, carrying away with him two hundred and thirty Horse, with seven of the Turks Ensigns, having in this Skirmish lost of his Men but two and forty; whose dead bodies the Turks the next morning in revenge of their slain Friends hewed into final pieces.

Upon these great Diligences one following in the neck of another, Amurath having no other Object but the City to shew his fury upon, gave three fierce Assaults unto the same, one after another, and was always with loss both of his Men and Honour repulsed. But the more he lost, the more he burnt with desire of Revenge, perswading his Soldiers, that as the strongest Cities and Fortresses were built by Mens hands, so were they to be overthrown and laid even with the ground by resolute and valiant men; encouraging them to a fresh Assault, with greater promises of Reward than ever he had done before in all his Wars, from the first beginning of his Reign. And because he would with more safety give this his last and greatest Assault, he appointed Feri-Bassa, with twelve thousand Horsemen and six thousand Foot to attend upon Scanderbeg, if he should hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the Assault, by affailing of his Camp. Feri-Bassa glad of this charge, well hoping never to redeem his former Overthrow with some great Victory, and leading forth his Army a little from the Camp, as he was commanded, to lay; withering for nothing more than the coming of Scanderbeg, vainly boasting, That he would seek him in the Field, and there try his Force and Fortune with him hand to hand; which he did shortly after to his cost. When Amurath had thus set in order all things requisite, as well for the Siege, as for the safeguard of his Camp, the next morning he compelled the City round about with his Army, and covered the ground with his Men of War, purposing at that time to gage his whole Forces upon the taking thereof. The Walls he had before in some places battered, so much as was possible; and yet but so, as that they were not without Scaling-Ladders to be assaulted; partly for the natural strength of the place, and partly for that the Defendants had with great diligence continually repaired and filled up with earth what the fury of the Canon had thrown down. This Assault Amurath began first with his Archers and small Shot, which delivered their Arrows and Bullets upon the top of the Wall, and into the City, as if it had been a shower of Hail, thereby to trouble the Stationary Soldiers. In this heat, Ladders were clapped to the Walls in every place where any could be possibly reared, and the Turks began desperately to scale the Walls; but the Christians nothing dismayed therewith, with great courage resisted them, and with Shot from their safe standings wounded and slew many of them; yet others still pressed up in the places of them they were slain, so that the Assault began most terribly in many places at once, but especially near to the great Gate of the City; where the Turks had upon the sudden with Ladders, Timber, and Planks clapt together, raised close unto that Tower, as it had been a wooden Tower, equal in height to the Wall, from whence the Turks greatly distressed the Christians in that place, fighting with them as if it had been upon even ground, still sending up fresh Soldiers in stead of them that were slain; and thereby prevailed to far, that they had for up certain of Amurath's Ensigns upon the Wall, to the great comfort of the Turks, and affrontment of the besieged Christians. The Governor seeing the eminent danger, halted to the place with a Company of fresh and valiant Soldiers, whose force the Turks were quickly repulsed from the Wall, their Ensigns taken and sent into the Market place; the Tower of wood with many Ladders and much Timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly confined with Wild-fire cast upon the same from the Walls. Feri-Bassa delivered the City of this fear, presently placed fresh Soldiers in stead of them which were slain or hurt, and so worthily defended the City.

Whilst Amurath was giving this great Assault to Sfigrad, Scanderbeg to withdraw him from the Siege, came with nine thousand Soldiers to assail the Turks Camp, as Amurath had before suspected, and was now come very near the same. Feri-Bassa glad of his coming, opposed his Army against him; which Scanderbeg seeing, retired a little of purpose to draw the Bassa farther from the Camp, and then forthwith began to join battle with him. The Bassa considering the small number of his Enemies, and his own greater Power, withdrew four thousand Horsemen out of his Army to fetch a compass about, and to set upon the rearward of Scanderbeg's Army; hoping so to enclose him, that he should never escape thence, but there either to be slain or taken alive, and his Army utterly defeated. But the expert Captain perceiving his purpose, to meet therewith, left Moset to lead the main Battle, and he himself with two thousand Horsemen, so valiantly charged those four thousand of his Enemies before they were well departed from the rest of the Bassas Army, that they had now more cause to look to their own safety, than how to circumvent others. In this Conflict Feri-Bassa hand to hand, as he had oft times before desired, encountering with Scanderbeg, was by him there slain. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri-Bassa in the right Wing of the Army, and Moset in the left, Moset stood fast, receiving the Assault of the Enemy without moving any thing forward, expecting the success of the Wings. But Scanderbeg having discomfited the right Wing, and slain the General, coming now in, he set forward with such force and courage, that the Turks not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled; of whom many were slain in this chase, though Scanderbeg doubting the great Power of his Enemy to nigh at hand, durst not follow them far; but founding a Retreat, put his Army again in good order, for fear of some sudden Attempt from the Camp, and after appointed some of the mainest of his Soldiers to take the Spoil of the slain Turks. When Amurath had understood what had happened to Feri-Bassa, he was so overcome with anger and melancholy, that for a while he could not speak one word; but after the heat was a little past, he commanded certain final pieces of Ordnance, which he had before used against the City, to be removed into the Assault of the Camp, and placed upon that side which was most in danger to the Enemy. He also presently sent thither four thousand Soldiers to join with the remainder of Feri-Bassa's Army, for defence of the Camp, with strict charge that they should not issue out of the Trenches. Nevertheless he himself continued the Assault of the City all that day; but when night drew on, and no hope appeared for him to prevail, he caused a Retreat to be founded; and leaving the Assault, he returned again into his Camp. At this Assault Amurath lost seven thousand Men, beside many that died afterwards of their wounds; but of the Garrison Soldiers were slain but seventy, and ninety more hurt.

Scanderbeg comes to trouble the Assault, and is met with by Feri-Bassa

Amurath by great Promises seeks to corrupt the Garrison of Sfigrad

A Traitor corrupts with Amurath his large Promises, conspires to betray the City.

The terror of the Turkish Army began now to grow in contempt throughout Epirus; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after so many Overthrows and shameful Repulses, would at length raise his Siege and be gone; yet he sent Spies continually to discover what was done in the Turks Camp, and he himself with two thousand Soldiers would oftentimes shew himself upon the sides of the Mountains near unto Amurath's Camp, of purpose to draw the Turks out, that he might take them at some advantage. But the old King had given Commandment upon pain of death, That no man should go out of the Trenches without leave, or once to speak of giving Barrel or Assault; so that he lay certain days in his Camp, not like a King besieging of a City, but more like a man besieged himself; the which his still lying, Scanderbeg had the more in distrust, fearing greatly that he was hatching some mischief, which so soon as it was ripe would violently break out.

Amurath considering with what evil Success he had many times assaulted the City, and holding it for a great dishonour to raise his Siege and depart, having done nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once again to prove, if it were possible to overcome the minds of the Garrison Soldiers with Gifts, for which he was not able to subdue by force. For which purpose he sent an Embassador to the City, offering unto the besieged and Garrison Soldiers safe Conditions of Peace, with such large Gifts and Rewards as had not been heard offered to any Garrison in former time. All which his magnificent Promises were lightly rejected by the common consent of all the whole Garrison, preferring their faithful Loyalty before all his golden Mountains. For all that, Amurath was in good hope, that amongst so many, some would be found, into whose minds his large Offers might make some Impression; wherein he was not deceived. For one base-minded Fellow amongst the rest, corrupted with the Turks great Promises, preferring his own private wealth, before the welfare of his Country, waiting his time had secret conference with the Turks Epilaps, promising upon assurance of such Reward as was before by Amurath promised, to find means that in few days the City should be yielded into his Power. This corrupted Traitor, had laid many mischievous Plots of effecting of this horrible Treason, but the first device he put in practice, which of all others a man would have thought to have been of least moment, served his wicked purpose in stead of all the rest. All the Garrison Soldiers of Sfigrad were of the upper Country of Dibra, put into that City, by Moset, for by their approved Valour above all the other Soldiers of Epirus. But as they were men of great courage, so were they exceeding superstitious both in their Religion and manner of living, paying nice difference betwixt one kind of lawful Meat and other; accounting food clean, some they deemed unclean, with more than a Jewish Superstition, choosing rather to die than to eat or drink thereof; such is the strong delusion of blind Error, where it hath thoroughly possessed the minds of men. The City of Sfigrad (as is aforesaid) is situate upon the top of a great high Rock, as most of the Cities of Epirus now be, and was then watered but with one great Well in the middle of the City, which fount deep into the Rock, plentifully served both the publick and private use of the Inhabitants. Into this common Well the malicious Traitor in the night time cast the foul stinking carion Carcasses of a dead Goat, knowing, that the executed Garrison Soldiers of Dibra, would rather endure the pains of death, and starve, or else yield up the City, upon any condition, than to drink of that filthy luted water. In the morning when that stinking Carion was effused, and drawn out of that Well, the report thereof was quickly brought to every corner of the City, and that the Well was polluted; so that all the people were in manner in an uproar about the finding out of the Traytor. The Citizens were exceeding sorry for that had happened, but the Garrison Soldiers desired that loathsome and unclean water (as they accounted it) more than the Turkish Service, protesting, that they would rather perish with thirst, than drink thereof. Whereupon some of them desired to let live upon the City, and whilst they had yet strength, to break through the Enemies Camp or there manifestly to die. And they which thought best of the matter, requested, that the City might be yielded up; for now, they discouraged with a superfluous Vanity, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of Peace, yea they were ready enough of themselves to flee to Amurath for Peace, though it had been upon harder terms. The Governor troubled with that had happened, and affixed to see so great an alteration in the minds of his Soldiers upon so small occasion; could not tell whether he might think it to proceed of a superstitious conceit, or of some secret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacify the matter, he came into the Market place, and there in the hearing of all the Garrison, with many effectual Reasons, exhorted them to continue faithful unto their Prince and Country in that honourable Service; and in a matter of so great consequence to make small reckoning to use that water, which would easily in short time be brought again to the wonted purity and cleanness; and so persuaded them the rather, he went presently to the Well himself, and in the sight of them all drank a great Draught of the Water, whose example the Citizens following, drank likewise. But when it was offered to the Captains and Soldiers of the Garrison, they all refused to taste thereof, as if it had been a most loathsome thing, or rather some deadly poison, and with great insistence cried unto the Governor, to give up the City; for which cause many thought they were corrupted by Amurath's great Promises. Howbeit none of the Garrison (except that one Traitor) did ever afterwards revolt to the Turkish King, or yet appeared any thing the richer for any Gift received, whereby such suspicion might be confirmed. When the Governor saw that the obstinate minds of the Garrison were not to be moved with any Persuasion or Reward (whereof he feared not to make large Promises) nor by any other means which he could devise; he called unto him his chief Captains, with the best forth of the Citizens, and resolved with them full force against his will to yield up the City to Amurath, on such conditions as they themselves there agreed upon; in which, where that it should be lawful for all the Captains and Soldiers to depart in safety with their Arms and all other things; and that so many of the Citizens as would fittest might freely dwell in the City, in such sort, as they had done before, under the Government of Scanderbeg; the rest that listed not to remain there still, might at their pleasure with Bag and Baggage depart whither they would. Glad was Amurath when this Offer was made unto him, and granted them all that was desired, saying that he would not consent that the Citizens should continue in the City, yet was he content that they should live under him as they had done before, quietly enjoying all their Possessions, but to build their houses without the Wall of the City; which condition some accepted, and some forsook all, went to Scanderbeg. When all was thoroughly agreed upon, the Keys of the Gates were delivered to Amurath, and the Governor with the Captains, and all the Garrison Soldiers suffered quietly to pass through the Turkish Camp, as the King had promised. However, Mahomet the Son of Amurath, a Prince of a cruel disposition, earnestly persuaded his Father, to have broken his Promise, and to have put them all to the Sword; saying, It was one of the Prophecy Malomet chief Commanders, to use all cruelty for the destruction of the Christians. But the old King would not therein hearken unto his Son, saying, That he which was desirous to be great among men, must either be indeed faithful of his Word and Promise, or at leastwise seem to be, thereby to gain the minds of the people, who naturally adore the Government of a harmless and cruel Prince. The Traitor which corrupted the Water, remained still in the City, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich Suits of Apparel, and fifty thousand Afers, and had given unto him besides a yearly Pension of two thousand Ducats. But short was the joy the Traitor had of his reward, for he was slain after he had a few days vainly triumphed in the midst of Amurath his Favourites, he was suddenly gone, and never afterwards seen or heard of; being secretly made away (as was supposed) by the commandment of Amurath, whose noble heart could not but detest the Traitor, although the Traitor served well his purpose. Amurath entering into Sferigrade, caused the Walls to be forthwith repaired, and placed one thousand two hundred Janizaries in Garrison there. And raising his Camp the first of September, departed out of Epirus, having lost thirty thousand of his Turks at the Siege of Sferigrade; much grieved in mind for all that, that he could not vanquish the Enemy, whom he came of purpose to subdue. In his return, the Vice-Roy of Asia marched before him with the Asian Soldiers; in the rearward followed the Vice-Roy of Europe with his European Soldiers; in the midst was Amurath himself, compassed about by his Janizaries and other Soldiers of the Court. Scanderbeg understanding of Amurath his departure, followed him with speedily with eight thousand Horsemen, and three thousand Foot, and taking the advantage of the thick Woods and Mountain fairs (to him well known) whereby that great Army was to pass, oftentimes skirmished with the Turks, charging them sometimes in the Yaward, and sometime in the Rearward, sometime on the one side, and sometime on the other, and flew many of them; whereby he so troubled Amurath his passages, that he was glad to leave the Vice-Roy of Romania, with 30000 to attend upon Scanderbeg, that he himself might in the mean time with more safety march away with the rest of his Army. Scanderbeg perceiving the stay of the Vice-Roy, ceased to follow Amurath further, fearing to be encircled between those two great Armies. The Vice-Roy seeing that Scanderbeg was retired, after he had thaid a few days, followed his Matter to Hadrimople, and so Scanderbeg returned to Croia.

Shortly after the departure of Amurath out of Epirus, Scanderbeg left two thousand Soldiers upon the Borders for defence of the Country against the Turks. These Soldiers so faithfully kept in the Janizaries left in Garrison at Sferi- grade that they could not look out of the City, but that they were intercepted and slain. And within a few days after came himself with an Army of eighteen thousand, and laid siege to Sferigrade the space of a month, which was from the middle of September until the middle of October. In which time he gave two great Assaults to have recovered the City, but was both times repulsed, with the loss of five hundred men. Amurath understanding that Scanderbeg lay at the siege of Sferigrade, sent with all speed to recall his Army, but lately before dispersed. Whereof Scanderbeg having Intelligence, considering also the difficulty of the Enterprize, with the approach of Winter, raised his Siege, and returned to Croia; where he let all things in the same order he had done before the coming of Amurath to the Siege of Sferigrade, and put two thousand of his best Soldiers there in Garrison, under the charge of the famous Captain Uranometes, and stored his City with sufficient Victual for a years Siege, wherein he had great help from the Venetians and other Christians, for that there was then great scarcity of all things in Epirus, by reason of the late Wars. The like care he had also of all the rest of his Cities, being continually advertised from his secret Friends in the Turks Court, of the great preparation intended against him by the Turkish King, against the beginning of the next Spring.

Amurath understanding that Scanderbeg was departed from Sferigrade, changed his former determination for the calling back again of his Army, and appointed it to meet again at Hadrimople, in the beginning of March following; whereas the Bassas, and other great Commanders, at the time appointed, assembled with their Companies, according to the summons publicly commanded. So that by the latter end of March, he had there in readines an Army of an hundred and three-score thousand men strong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkish Wars, sent forty thousand Horsemen, under the leading of Sebalay a polittick Captain, as his Vancouriers into Epirus, in the beginning of April, in the year, 1450. The valiant Captain with great speed and no resistance entered into Epirus, as was given him in charge, and without let came to Croia; where, after he had adventuredly considered of the situation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he strongly encompassed himself near therabouts in the place called Plat, and Uranometes, and there within his Trenches kept his Soldiers close, attending nothing more, but that no new supply of Men, Munition, or Victuals, should be conveyed into the City, more than was therein before his coming. For he was not able with his Horsemen to do any thing against the City, and Scanderbeg had sent no help into the Country Subject to his fury. Besides that, he was expressly by Amurath forbidden to attempt any thing against Scanderbeg himself.

After Sebalay had twenty days thus lien encamped before Croia, neither doing nor taking harm; Amurath by reason of his great age, having marched oftentimes but few miles a day, came thither also with his whole Army, wherewith he filled all the Country round about; the very sight whereof, had been enough to have discouraged the same Garrison in Croia, had they not been men both of great Experience and Resolution. Where after he had spent four days in settling of his Camp, he sent two Messengers unto the Governor (as the manner of the Turks is) offering him if he would yield up the City, that it should be lawful for him with all his Soldiers in safety with Bag and Baggage to depart;

part; and the Governor himself to receive in Reward two hundred thousand Afers, with an honorable Place amongst the great Bassas of his Court; if it would please him to accept thereof; and further, that the Citizens should enjoy all their ancient Liberties as in former time, without any alteration; with promise also of greater. These Messengers coming to the Gates of the City, could not be suffered to enter, but standing without were commanded there to deliver their Message; which when the Governor had heard, he scornfully rejected their Offers, and returned the Messengers shamefully defeated by the Soldiers which stood upon the Wall. Amurath more offended with this Contempt, than the refusal of his Offers; and seeing no other means to gain the City, converted all his devices unto the Siege thereof. Wherefore he first commanded ten great pieces of Artillery to be forthwith cast, for he had brought with him none ready made, because of the difficult passage over the high Mountains into Epirus; whereby it seemed to be a matter of infinite trouble to have brought his great Ordnance; and therefore carried with him great Rows of Metal in mass, wherof at his pleasure to make his great Artillery as he saw cause. In fifteen days this work was brought to perfection, and tenpieces of huge greatmalls were ready mounted upon Carriages. Six of them he placed against the East side of the City, towards the Plain of Tyravos, and the other four against the Gate; in which places only, Croia, was subjected to battery, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable Rocks, upon the tops whereof were built fair Battlements, more for beauty than needful defence. These two places Amurath battered four days continually, and with the fury of his Artillery had in both places beaten down his Wall, and the towers shaken the rest. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, and with great cheerfulness made all things ready to assault these Breaches, whenever Amurath should command, striving among themselves who should their self most forward in that dangerous Enterprize. And Mahomet the young Prince, the more to encourage the Soldiers, besides the great Rewards by his Father promised; promised of himself to give an hundred thousand Afers unto him that should first set up an Ensign upon the Walls of the City. The Garrison Soldiers on the other side, considering that the whole State and Welfare of Epirus was reposited in their valour; and that the Eyes of most part of Christendom were as it were fixed upon them, were nothing dismayed with the Breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of peril and danger that might possibly chance; but especially the worthy Governor Uranometes, who going through the midst of his Soldiers, and shaking some of them by the hands, withal said:

These, these are the Fortresses of our City, these are the invincible Bulwarks; these are the irremovable Stones and strong Cement. What Honour? what Praise? what Triumphant should we hope for? if these Walls standing whole and strong, we should be brought under the defence of them, and not they defended by us? So can Cowards defend Cities, and Sheep fear the Wolves rage, when they are safely shut up within the Walls of their Sheep-cotes: But that is the praise of the Walls, and not of the Men. Worthy Captain our Prince hath commanded this his City to be defended by us, and not us by it. Honour is attended upon with danger, and suffered up amongst perils; every base Mariner may be a Master in fair Weather; and firm things stand of themselves, and need not our upholding. Wherefore, men of worth (thus such things, which being kept or left, yield little praise. Things ready to fall, need flooring, and thither hasten Fortune, and there (worthy Soldiers) appear Courage and Valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend these broken Breaches, and in stead of these Walls, bravely overcome our lucky and lively armed Bodies against the Force of our Enemies. If these Walls should fall firm, and unbroken, you should then fight from the top of them like Women; but now that they lay flaming broken, you shall as men stand upon several sorts of every ground, and encounter your Enemies hand to hand, the better to satisfy your furious desire. Where I also in the thickets, shall easily view and judge of every mans private courage in particular, and of all your Valour in common. And yet if we will consider of the matter, the place itself doth yet surely make for us; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by these small Breaches diminished; for, the rising of the Hill (not possible to be taken from us) although it be not so high as it is in other places, yet, doth it not serve us sufficiently at great advantage, to charge our Enemies, and hinder their Assaults. The Breaches whereof, as it will be troublesome unto them, so will it keep us most fresh in strength, and make our Shot more forcible. Wherefore they had been a thing of us to have been withheld, for, if we desire the slaughter of our Enemies at this Siege; or if we wish for perpetual Honour and Glory by this War. For this Breach of the Walls will encourage these Barbarians, and allure their armed men to climb up in greater multitude than the Walls were whole; whereof so many shall on every side be easily slain, as we shall but aim at; except you had rather sit still, holding your hands together in your Bosoms as Cowards. Their dead bodies shall fill up the Breaches again, if you be men mindful of your Liberty. What is there worthy Captains and Soldiers? that let us be the victors? or memorable slaughter of our Enemies? by whom only these two places of the City can be of safety; all the rest is out of danger, and fears no Enemies force. Here only is the pains to be taken, this only is left for you to defend, and here shall you all be; the courage, force, and strength of you all shall in this place appear. How will you so many worthy Captains, and valiant Soldiers, in so little room before your selves? We are the many Defendants, for so many Breaches. Yet let us play the Men, and do our endeavour; let us in one Conflict weaken the Tyrants strength, and burst his proud breast; he will forsake this City, and raise his Siege unfortunately begun, so soon as he shall see his first Assaults to cost him the lives of so many thousand of his Men.

When Uranometes had with this comfortable Croia speech thus encouraged his Soldiers, against the Assault which he expected the next day; and had with great care and diligence set all things in order for the same, and repaired the Breaches as well as was possible in that case, he gave them leave for that night to take their rest. In the morning Amurath commanded the Assault to be given to both the Breaches, which was forthwith by the Turks cheerfully begun, and every man busied to perform the Service he was appointed unto. But by that time that the Assault was well begun, a sudden Alarm was raised throughout all the Turks Camp; for Scanderbeg with five thousand valiant Soldiers, had suddenly broken in upon one side of the Turks great Camp, and at the first Encounter had slain five hundred of the Turks, and was now spoiling their Tents. The rumour whereof, troubled the whole Camp, and made the Turks with less courage courage to assault the Breaches, for fear of the danger behind them. Amurath although he had great confidence in them whom he had before left for the safeguard of his Tents, yet for more fury sent Seremet one of his greatest Captains, with four thousand Soldiers, back into the Camp, for more fury, saying, That nothing could be too far, against that wild Beast: meaning the fury of Scanderbeg. Mahomet also the young Prince, halted thither in great choler with his Guard, much against his Fathers will. But Moses, Scanderbeg Lieutenant, knowing himself too weak to withstand the multitude that was swarming thither (counting himself with that which was already done) had before Mahomet coming, speedily retired with all his Army into the safeguard of the Mountains, from whence he came, having done great harm in the Turks Camp, with the loss of ten men. Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmish, forgetting himself, had so far engaged himself among the Turks, that he was by them on every side enclosed, and in great danger to have been slain or taken; yet valiantly breaking through them, he escaped the danger, and recovered the Mountains, and with much ado came at length to his Camp, to the great joy and comfort of them all, being before in great fear he had been lost. This was accounted the greatest oversight of Scanderbeg in all his Wars: for to much as the Office of a good General consisteth not in adventuring his Person to manifest danger, but in the politic Government of his charges. During the time that Scanderbeg thus assailed the Turks Camp, Amurath but faintly assailed the Breaches, expecting the success in the Camp; but when he understood that Scanderbeg was retired, and all quiet, he brought all his Forces to the Walls, to fight with the multitude of his Archers, and small Shot laboured to drive the Defendants from the Walls, overwhelming them with Arrows falling as thick as Hail. And likewise at the same time other common Soldiers of baser account, brought Scaling-Ladders and other things needful for the taking of the Walls. After whom also followed the Janizaries and other chosen Soldiers, ready to mount the Ladders so soon as they should be set to the Walls. But whilst they climb up the high Hills in this order, the Garrison Soldiers made high laughter of them, with Shot from the Walls and out of the City, that they would have presently retired, had they not been forced forward by their Captains, who spared neither stripes nor wounds, when words would not serve. By this tyrannical means, the Scaling-Ladders were with great slaughter of the common Soldiers set up against the Walls, and the Turks climbing up, came to hand-to-hand with the Defendants at the Breaches; nothing was to be heard but the crying of People, the clattering of Armour, and the Instruments of War, which was terribly redoubled with the Echoes from the Mountains round about. The Turks doing what they might to win the Breaches, were by the Christians worthily resisted, and with their Ladders tumbling headlong down the Mountain, with such horrible slaughter and discomfiture, especially of the common Soldiers, that none of them would for one foot forward again toward the Walls, although they had small hope to save themselves by retiring back; for the fierce young Prince Mahomet even then making they of his cruel disposition, caused them that returned, to be flung by the terror thereof to drive others forward. These common Soldiers, whom the Turks make small reckoning of, are for the most part miserable Christians, which live in such Countries as had sometimes received the Faith of Christ, but are now under the Turkish Faith; of which sort of wretched people the Turkish Tyrants draw forth their great multitudes in their Wars, most commonly untrained, because they dare not well trust them in War against the Christians; these carry all the Baggage of the Camp; these serve to fetch Wood and Water for other Soldiers of better account; these serve in flood of Pioneers, to cast Trenches and raise Bulwarks; and when battle is to be given, if it be in plain field, these barely untrained are put into their hands, and thrust into the fore-front of the battle, to blunt the Enemies Swords; but if a City be to be besieged, these serve as fit matter to fill up the Breaches with their dead Bodies, or to make Bridges for other Soldiers to pass over upon; and if they think to attempt any thing they are commanded, then are they more cruelly used by their Commanders than by their Enemies. When Amurath saw his Soldiers so discouraged, he stood in doubt whether it were better for that time to found a Retreat, or to send a new Supply; but being irritated with the loss of his Men, and desirous to be in some part revenged, he sent divers Companies of his better Soldiers, for the encouragement of them which were before discouraged, and to give a fresh Assault; but with as evil or worse success than before; for Uruncanter had withdrawn from the Breaches all those Soldiers which had injured the former Assault, and placed other fresh and lusty Men in their stead; who encouraged with the former Victory, and loth to be accounted inferior to their Fellows, repulsed the Turks with double slaughter; until that the aged King, not able longer to behold the endless loss of his Men, caused a Retreat to be sounded; which all his Soldiers were glad to hear, and so returned into his Camp, having lost in those two Assaults eight thousand Men, without any notable harm done unto the Defendants worth the remembrance.

This shameful Repulse much grieved all the Captains and Commanders of Amurath's Army, but especially Mahomet the young Prince, whose violent nature unacquainted with mispath, burnt impatiently with Revenge. Wherefore understanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched upon the Mountain of Tamontis, not far from his Fathers Army, he drew the most of the best and readiest Soldiers of all the whole Camp, into that quarter which was nearest unto Scanderbeg; of purpose that if he should again assail the Camp in that place (as it was most like he would) he should be encountered with so many brave and valiant Men there in readiness, as that it should be hard for him either to do any great harm, or for himself to escape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certain Fugitives had Intelligence, as also in what order the Camp lay; whereupon he left Moses with five hundred Soldiers in the place where he lay; taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certain appointed hour in the night following, should assail the Turks Camp in the quarter next unto him where Mahomet lay; and having there raised some tumult, speedily to retire again to his assured strength in the Mountain. Scanderbeg himself with the whole strength of his Army, in number about 8000, in the mean time took a compass and by circuitous way, by-way through the Woods and Mountains, came unto the farther side of the Turks Camp, to a place called Muscle. The night following, Moses at the appointed hour with his 500 Soldiers assailed that part of the Turks Camp next unto him, with much noise and tumult as if it had been some great Army. By occasion whereof all the Turks Camp was in alarm, and drew in half to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the same instant, Scanderbeg with all his Army brake into the other side of the Turks Camp, where he was least feared or looked for, and from whence the best Soldiers were before drawn by Mahomet; and there made such slaughter and havoc of the rest (not knowing which way to turn themselves) that the loss a little before received under the Walls of Croia, was now forgot, as a small thing in comparison of this. Moses having raised a great fear, and done little harm, returned in safety to his well known strength; and Scanderbeg having made great spoil in the Camp, fearing to be oppressed with the multitude of his Enemies, if he should there longer stay, returned in good time, having scarce lost one Man.

Amurath after this great loss and trouble of his Camp, withdrew most of his small Ordnance which he had before bent against the City, into his Trenches, placing it as commodiously as he might, for the defence thereof against the sudden Attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hot season of the year so closely incamp his great Army, but that some part thereof would still be in like danger as before; he therefore appointed Sebalis with 16000 Soldiers to attend upon Scanderbeg, that he should for no more trouble the Camp. After which order taken, he battered the Walls of Croia afresh, and with his great Ordnance overthrow whatever the Citizens had repaired, making the Breaches greater, and more assailable than before, intending once again by a new Assault to prove his Fortune; and the force of his works he caused final Alarms daily to be given unto the City, to the intent that the Defendants busied therewith, should not perceive the secret work of the Mine. About which time his Provision of Corn began to fail in his Camp; for which cause he sent his Purveyors for Corn to Lissa, a City of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in League, and bought of them great store of Corn. But as his Officers were conveying it to his Camp, Scanderbeg having Intelligence thereof, slew the Convoy, and carried away with him all that Provision, dividing it among his own Soldiers. Howbeit, not long after, Amurath received great abundance of Corn and other Provision out of Macedonia; beside that, the Venetian Merchants afterward furnished him with plenty of Corn, Oil, Honey, and other necessities; which Scanderbeg might well have hindered; but that he would not in so doing offend the Venetians, which were also his secret Friends, considering that Amurath might have had all the same Provision out of the further part of Macedonia, Thracia, Mysia, and such other places, if he had not otherwise had it from the Venetians.

Whilst Amurath thus lay expecting the success of his Mine, four hundred of the Garrison Soldiers of Croia falling out of the City, chased divers of the Turks that were come back again unto the Camp; whereof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with that good hap, would to their further loss give the like attempt afterwards. But the flat direction of the Governor deceived that his expectation, who considering the danger, would not suffer his Soldiers any more to fall out of the City. Scanderbeg also at this time having increased his Army with a new Supply of two thousand Soldiers, divided the same into three parts;

Force may not prevail, Fortune may find some mean that we look not for, as it fell out at the Siege of Steigrade; beyond all our expectation. Treason is ingenious, and men desire great, where great Rewards are propounded.

With these and like Speeches old Amurath encouraged his Captains and Soldiers and the next day early in the morning began the Assault, which the Turks valiantly attempted; and without regard of danger came to the Gates of the City, assailing but with vain and desperate labour to have broken them open. In this Assault Wild-fire was cast into many places of the City, and the great Artillery oftentimes discharged into the Breaches; whereby many of the Turks themselves were slain with their own great shot, together with the Christians; for Amurath desperately flew was content to buy the life of one Christian with the loss of twenty of his Turks. But the Christians still valiantly repulsed their Enemies, so that of them that came to the Gates, none escaped alive; and of them that assaulted the great Breach, they which were most forward, were first slain, and they which stood farther off, were fore wounded by Shot. Yet for all that, Amurath still maintained the Assault, by sending in of new Supplies, delighting to see them go forward, but grieved at the heart to see them to slain; until at last weary with beholding the slaughter of his Men, he caused a Retreat to be sounded, and so ended the Assault; perished by his own rage, not willingly to cast away his valiant Soldiers where there was no hope to prevail, but to reserve them for his better Service.

Amurath now out of hope to win the City by Assault, thought good to prove what might be done by undermining of the same; during which work he caused final Alarms daily to be given unto the City, to the intent that the Defendants busied therewith, should not perceive the secret work of the Mine. About which time his Provision of Corn began to fail in his Camp; for which cause he sent his Purveyors for Corn to Lissa, a City of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in League, and bought of them great store of Corn. But as his Officers were conveying it to his Camp, Scanderbeg having Intelligence thereof, slew the Convoy, and carried away with him all that Provision, dividing it among his own Soldiers. Howbeit, not long after, Amurath received great abundance of Corn and other Provision out of Macedonia; beside that, the Venetian Merchants afterward furnished him with plenty of Corn, Oil, Honey, and other necessities; which Scanderbeg might well have hindered; but that he would not in so doing offend the Venetians, which were also his secret Friends, considering that Amurath might have had all the same Provision out of the further part of Macedonia, Thracia, Mysia, and such other places, if he had not otherwise had it from the Venetians.

Whilst Amurath thus lay expecting the success of his Mine, four hundred of the Garrison Soldiers of Croia falling out of the City, chased divers of the Turks that were come back again unto the Camp; whereof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with that good hap, would to their further loss give the like attempt afterwards. But the flat direction of the Governor deceived that his expectation, who considering the danger, would not suffer his Soldiers any more to fall out of the City. Scanderbeg also at this time having increased his Army with a new Supply of two thousand Soldiers, divided the same into three parts;

he termed it) and that in the fight of his contemptible Enemy. After that, turning himself to his Son Mahomet, he earnestly commended him to the faithfulness of his Baffles, and gave him many grave advicements, sometimes in secret betwixt themselves, and sometimes in the hearing of others; want of strength, and abundance of tears running down his aged Face (upon the sight of his Son) oftentimes interrupting his Speech. Yet sick unto death as he was, and drawing fast unto his end, he forced himself, to warn his Son of such things as now at his death grieved him most.

I, I mine enemy (quoth he) be a warning unto thee my Son, never to concern thine Enemy, he be never so weak of whom one thing above all others, I have repented my self of long, and shall do after my death, if any feeling of humane things remain in the dead, and that I was so foolish, and inconsequence, as to prefer it as it were in my beloved this my domestic and neglected Enemy; whereby I have purchased unto my self this calamity, and for ever blighted the Honour of the Ottoman Kings; whilst I so basely ending my days under the Walls of Croia, shall become a byword unto the World, and all Posterity for ever. This Traitor should even then have been oppressed, when he by great Treachery, first recovered his wicked Kingdom's in that venue of his Estate, and before the minds of the People were assured unto him, then it had been an easy matter, without bloodshed to have utterly extinguished the wretched, together with his name. His Baffles, who evil Fortune was the cause of his loss of his good; Nor the other Generals, who by him slain or taken Prisoners, increased his strength and credit unto his Subjects, should not have been sent against him; a thing which I have oftentimes thought upon, but could scarce have believed, that ever I should have thereby received such damage, together with the ignominious renting of my Kingdom, if I had not been taught the same by mine own experience, to my great loss and hearty grief. We entered into Epirus, and have encamped an hundred and three-score thousand men strong; now if I leave thee, you take view of them, examine the matter, you shall find a great want of that number. The Field could not contain our Regiments and the multitude of our men; but now, how many Tents stand empty? how many Horses want Riders? You shall go to Hadrianople with our Forces much impaired. As for me, the Destiny have crowned my Spirits to this Country of Epirus, and unto this fatal Fate. But wherefore do I importune my self with these importunate and tedious thoughts of Fortune? For then first began this seed of mischief in Epirus, when the Hungarians with their Christian Princes, rose up in Arms against us; at which time we fought not with them for Sovereignty, but for the whole State of our Kingdom; at the bloody Battle of Varna and Collova full witness is to be seen. So whilst I had neither leisure nor sufficient power to take order for all my important Affairs at once, in the mean time this Enemy grew as you see. But listen to what order you are hereafter to wage War against him, you may not look for any directions from me, which have in all such matters I could direct my self; Fortune never deceived my endeavours more than in this. But happily thou Mahomet my Son, shalt prove a more fortunate Warrior against him; and for so many Honours already given unto me, the Destiny have reserved the triumph of Epirus for thee. It is therefore my Son, thou shalt receive from me this Secret Empire; but upon this condition all things, I leave unto thee this Enemy; I charge thee not to leave my death unrevengeed. It is all I charge thee with, for so great and plenty a Parity as thou art to receive from me it is the only Sacrifice that my old departing Ghost desireth of thee.

Shortly after he became speechless, and striving with the Pangs of Death half a day, he then breathed out his gally Ghost, to the great joy and contentment of the poor oppressed Christians. He died about the middle of autumn, in the year of our Lord 1459, when he had lived eighty five years, as most write; and thereof reigned eight and twenty years (or as some others report thirty;) about five months after the Siege laid before Croia.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erst not inferior unto the greatest Monarchs of the Age, and yet so much in despair; a worthy mirror of Honours frailty; yielding unto the worldly man in the end, neither comfort nor relief. Who had fought greater Battels; who had gained greater Victories; or obtained more glorious Triumphs than had Amurath? who by the Spoils of so many mighty Kings and Princes, and by the conquest of so many proud and warlike Nations, again restored and established the Turks Kingdom, before by Tamerlane and the Tartars in a manner clean defaced. He it was that burst the heart of the proud Grecians, establishing his Empire at Hadrianople, even in the Center of their Borels; from whence have proceeded so many miseries and calamities unto the greatest part of Christendom, as no Tongue is able to express. He it was that first brake down the Hexamile or Wall of separation on the Straits of Corinth, and conquered the greatest part of Peloponnesus. He it was that subdued unto the Turks so many great Countries and Provinces in Africa, in the plain Field and far Barrel overthrow many puissant Kings and Princes, and brought them under his Subjection; who having slain Uladislaus the King of Polonia and Hungary, and more than once chased out of the Field Himadey that famous and redoubted Warrior; had such ambitious Hearts, prompted unto himself the Conquest of a great part of Christendom. But O how far was he now changed from the man he then was! how far did these his last Speeches differ from the course of his life passed life? full of such base passionate complaints and lamentations, as becometh not a man of his place and spirit, but some vile wretch overtaken with despair, and yet afraid to die. Where were now those haughty Thoughts, those lofty Looks, those thundering and commanding Speeches; whereas for many great Commanders, to many Troops and Legions, so many thousands of armed Soldiers were wont to tremble and quake? Where is that Head, before adorned with so many Trophies and Triumphs? Where is that victorious Hand that swayed so many Scepters? Where is the Majesty of his Power and Strength, that commanded over so many Nations and Kingdoms? O how is the case now altered; he lieth now dead, a gally filthy thinking Carcase, a Clod of Clay unregarded, his Hands closed, his Eyes shut, and his Feet stretched out, which erst proudly traced the Countries by him subdued and conquered. And now of such infinite Riches, such unmeasurable Wealth, such huge Treasures, such flatly Honours and vain glorious Praises, as he in his life time enjoyed; his frail Body enjoyeth nothing but left all behind it. O the weak condition of Mans Nature! O the vain glory of mortal Creatures! O the blind and perverse thoughts of foolish men! Why do we to magnify our selves, why are we so prone to Pride? why do we to much fix our minds upon Riches, Authority, and other vanities of this Life? whereof never man had yet one days assurance, and at our most need, and when we least think, quite forsake us; leaving even them that most sought after them, and most abundant in them, shrowded oftentimes in the Secret of Dishonour and Shame.

That his death is otherwise by some reported, I am not ignorant: The Turks saying, that he died miraculously forewarned of his death at Hadrianople; and some others, That he died in a fit, stricken with an Apoplexy proceeding of a Surfeit taken of the immoderate drinking of Wine. But Marinus Barlesius, who lived in his time in Scodra fast by Epirus, whose Authority, in report of the Wars betwixt him and Scanderbeg we follow, setteth it down in such manner as is above.

Prefently after his death, Mahomet his Son, for fear of some innovation to be made at home, raised the Siege and returned to Hadrianople; and afterward with great Solemnity buried his dead body at the West side of Prossa, in the Suburbs of the City, where he now lieth in a Chapel without any roof, his Grave nothing differing from the manner of the common Turks; which (they say) he commanded to be done in his last Will; that the Mercy and Blessing of God (as he termed it) might come unto him by the shining of the Sun and Moon, and falling of the Rain and Dew of Heaven upon his Grave. He whilst he lived, mightily enlarged the Turkish Kingdom, and with greater Wisdom and Policy than his Predecessors, established the same; inasmuch that some attribute unto him the first institution of the Janisaries, and other Soldiers of the Court (the greatest Strength of the Turkish Empire) before he died began the raising of Amurath the first, his great Grandfather (as is before declared) but by him greatly augmented, and the policy of that State, whereby it hath ever since in his Posterity flourished, even by himself plotted. For the better establishing thereof in his own House, and to cut off all occasion of fear, as also to leave all such as might have the heart to arise against him, naked and bare of Forces to resist; but especially the other ancient and noble Families of the Turks; still secretly repining at the great honour of the Ottoman Kings; he as a man of great Wisdom and Judgment, to keep them under in the beginning of his Reign, by manifold favours began to bind unto himself men of strange and foreign Countries, his Servants, and by ordering of his most weighty Affairs by their Authority, so by little and little to call off the service of his natural Turks; they in the mean time little or nothing at all looking unto this his practice. And whereas the Ottoman Kings his Predecessors, had for the most part, or rather altogether raised their Janisaries and other Soldiers of the Court, of such Children of the Christians as were taken in the Wars; he, seeing by experience how serviceable those new kind of Soldiers were, began forthwith to plot, how to have to make himself an Army altogether of such able persons, his own Creatures, and so to bring in a new kind of Warfare, wholly depending of himself. And to that end, by his Officers appointed for that purpose, took from the Christians throughout his Dominions, every fifth Child; the fairest and aptest of whom, he placed in his own Seraglio at Hadrianople, and the rest in other like places by him built for such purpose; where they were by sufficient Teachers, first instructed in the Principles of the Mahometan Religion, and then in all manner of Activity and Feats of Arms. Of these, when they were grown to manhood, he made Horsemen, gave them great Portions, and forcing them into divers orders, appointed them also to guard his Person; honouring the better sort of them with the name of Spahis-Oglus, that is to say, his Sons the Knights; and of these he began to make his Baffles, his Generals of his Armies, and the Governors of his Provinces and Cities, with all the great Offices of the State. The rest, and far the greatest part of these Tribute Children, taken from their Christian Parents, and not brought up in the Seraglio, he caused to be dispersed into every City and Country of his Dominion in Asia, there for certain years to be brought up in all handiwork and painful labour, never tasting of ease or pleasure; out of which hard brood he cured to pains, he made choice of so many of the most lusty and able bodies fit for service, as he thought good; who kept in continual exercise, and by skillful men taught to handle all manner of Weapons, but especially the Bow, the Piece, and the Scimitar, were by him as occasion served added to the other Janisaries, and appointed for the guarding of his Person; calling them commonly by the names of his Sons. The remainder of these Tribute Children, as unfit for the Wars, he put unto other base Occupations and Ministries. But unto those Martial Men of all sorts, so by him ordained, he appointed a continual pay according to their degrees and places; and by great benefits and rewards he seduced upon them, bound them to fast unto him, as that he might now account himself to have of them many Sons, as he had Soldiers; For they together with the Christian Religion, having forgot their Parents and Country, and knowing no other Lord and Master but him, and acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace only, remained ever bound and faithful unto him; and so kept others also, as well the natural Turks themselves, as the other oppressed Christians within the bounds of Obedience and Loyalty. A great Policy proceeding from a deep Judgment, him to weaken the Christians by taking from their best Children, and of greatest hope; and then by them depending wholly of himself, to keep in awe and dutiful Obedience his natural Subjects also; having them always as a scourge ready to chastise the Rebels or Dilloyal. Now the other Ottoman Kings, keepers and Emperors, the Successors of Amurath, keeping this custom, and also increasing it one after another, have thereby not only kept the Empire still in their House and Family, where it was first gotten; but also so maintained the Majesty of their State, as they are of their Subjects feared, obeyed, honoured, not as Kings, but as Gods. For the natural Turks their Subjects loving courage continually, and daily growing more bold and dastardly, by reason they are not suffered to practise the knowledge of Arms; and the Soldiers in whose power all things are, knowing nothing of their own, but holding and acknowledging all that they have to be the best part of their Lords, account them as Lords and Kings of all, ruling much after the manner of the Pharaohs the ancient Kings of Egypt; who were absolute Lords and Masters, both of the publick and private Wealth of their Subjects, whom they kept under as Slaves and Villains. And hereof cometh it to pass, that the better part of them whom we call Turks, (but are indeed the Children of Christians, and seduced by their false instructors) desire to be called Muhammadans (that is to say, Right Believers) holding it a reproachful and dishonourable thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly as above other People; For that they knowing right well, that there is not one natural Turk among all those that bear Authority and Rule, and are had in greater Honour and Reputation than the rest (such as are the Men of War and Courtiers) but he is born a Christian, either of Father, or at the least of his Grandfather, avouch those only to be Turks which live in Narsia, all of them either Merchants, or of base and mechanical Crafts, or poor Labourers with the Spade and Pickaxe, and such like People unfit for the Wars, the rest (as I say) holding it for a Title of Honour to be defended of Christian Parents. Yea the Grand Seigneur himself, although by the Fathers side he be come of Progenitors such as were natural Turks born, yet many of them had Christian Mothers, which they accounted in the greatest part of their Nobility and Honour. Thus by the Wisdom of Amurath was the order of the Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court greatly advanced, though not by him begun, and the politick state of the Turks Kingdom (to say the truth) quite altered; the natural Turks (more than the Sultan himself) now bearing therein no sway; but only these new Souldiers, all of them descended from Christian Parents and by adoption as it were become the Sons of the Turkish Sultans, and under them commanding all; by whom they have ever since managed their estate, and by their good service wonderfully, even to the astonishment of the World, increased and extended their Empire. But of them more shall be said hereafter.

This great King was whilst he lived, of his Subjects wonderfully beloved, and no less of them after his death lamented. He was more faithful of his word than any of the Turkish Kings either before or after him; by Nature melancholy and sad, and accounted rather politic than valiant, yet was indeed both; a great dissembler, and painful in travel, but wayward and testy above measure, which many imputed unto his great Age. He had issue six Sons, Acmetes, Aladin, Mahomet, Hefan, (otherwise called Chafan) Urchan, and Acmetes the younger, of some called Calepinus; three of whom died before; but the two youngest were by their unnatural Brother Mahomet, who succeeded him in the Turkish Kingdom, even in their infancy, in the beginning of his Reign most cruelly murdered.

The LIFE of MAHOMET,

The Second of that NAME,
The Seventh KING and First EMPEROR of the TURKS,

For his many VICTORIES firnamed The Great.

THE report of the death of old Amurat the late King, was in short time blown through most part of Christendom, to the great joy of many; but especially of the Greeks and other poor Christians which bordered upon the Tyrants Kingdom; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkish King, to make exchange also of their bad Estate and Fortune; and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldest Son Mahomet, after the death of his Father, would have embraced the Christian Religion, being in his Childhood instructed therein (as was supposed) by his Mother the Daughter of the Prince of Servia, a Christian. But vain was this hope, and the joy thereof but short, as afterward by proof appeared; For Mahomet being about the Age of one and twenty years, succeeding his Father in the Kingdom in the year of our Lord 1450, embraced in stead the Mahometan Religion, abhorring the Christian; but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other, but as a meer Atheist, devoid of all Religion, and worshipping no other God but good Fortune, derided the simplicity of all such as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions; which graceless resolution he wrought in him, that he thought all things lawful that agreed with his lust, and making conscience of nothing, kept no League, Promise, or Oath, longer than stood with his Profit or Pleasure.

Mahomet
of no Religion.

Now in the Court men stood diversely affected towards the present State; the mighty Baffles, and others of great Authority, unto whom the old Kings Government was never grievous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting lest the fierce Nature of the young King should turn to the hurt of some of them in particular, and the shortning of their Authority in general, as indeed it shortly after fell out. But the lusty Gallant of the Court weary of the old King, who in hope of preferment had long wished for the Government of the young Prince, were glad to see him set upon his Fathers Seat. And the vulgar People (never content but in unconformity, and always fawning upon the present) exceedingly rejoiced in their young King. The Janizaries also at the same time (according to their accustomed manner) took the Spoil of the Christians and Jews that dwelt amongst them, and easily obtained pardon for the same; whereupon he was by the same Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court, with great Triumph saluted King.

Which approbation of these men of War, is unto the Turkish Kings a greater assurance for the possession of their Kingdom, than to be born the eldest Son of the King, as in the process of this History shall appear; for great is the power of these masterful Slaves, in promoting to the Kingdom, whichever of the Kings Sons they most favour, without much regard whether they be the eldest or not.

This young Tyrant was no sooner possessed of his Fathers Kingdom, but that he forgetting the Laws of Nature, was presently in person himself about to have murdered with his own hands, his youngest Brother, then but eighteen Months old, begotten on the Daughter of Spondinier. Which unnatural part, Moses one of his Baffles, and a man greatly in his favour, perceiving, requested him, not to embroil his own hands in the blood of his Brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to some other; which thing Mahomet commanded him the Author of that counsel forthwith to do. So Moses taking the Child from the Nurse, strangled it, with pouring water down the throat thereof. The young Lady understanding of the death of her Child (as a Woman whom Fury had made past fear) came and in her rage reviled the Tyrant to his Face, shamefully upbraiding him for his inhuman cruelty. When Mahomet to appease her Fury, requested her to be content, for that it stood with the Policy of his State; and would her for her better contentment, to ask whatever she pleased, and she should forthwith have it. But the desiring nothing more than in some sort to be revenged, desired to have Moses (the Executioner of her Son) delivered unto her, bound; which when she had obtained, the presently struck him into the Breast with a knife (crying in vain upon his unthankful Master for help) and proceeding in her cruel Execution, cut an hole in his right side, and by peaceable cut out his Liver, and cast it to the Dogs to eat. At the same time also he caused another of his Brethren, committed by his Father to the keeping of Caly Basse, and now by him betrayed into his hands, to be likewise murdered.

Thus beginning his tyrannous Reign with the bloody execution of them that were in Blood nearest unto him, and whom of all others he ought to have defended, he presently after began to frame a new form of a Common-Weal, by abrogating and altering the old Laws and Customs, and publishing of new, better fitting his own humor, and more commodious for himself; imposing imposing also new Taxes and Subsidies upon his Subjects, never before heard of; thereby to increase his Treasures, and satisfy his various desires; which amongst many other his Vices, so much reigned in him, as that he was thought over-rating upon himself, as well in his Apparel as in his Diet. And proceeding further, he called unto that account all the great Officers of his Kingdom; of whom some he put to death, and confiscated the Goods of others; he put the great Fines, or quite removed them from their Offices. In like manner he dealt also with his great Baffles, admitting many false and furnished accusations against them; whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercy was to be looked for. By which means he became no less terrible unto his Subjects, than he was afterwards to his Enemies; and so was of them exceedingly feared, but more hated. Among other things, he much milked in his Court the excessive number of Faulconers and Huntsmen; which was grown to great by the immoderate delight which his Predecessors took in the pleasures of the Field, that there were continually maintained the Kings Charge, seven thousand Faulconers, and not many fewer Huntsmen; saying, That he would not be so much a Fool, as to maintain such a multitude of men to attend upon so mean a vanity. And therefore took order, that from thenceforth there should be allowance made for five thousand and one hundred Huntsmen; the rest he appointed to serve as Souldiers in his Wars. At the same time which he entered into League with Constantin Paleologus the Emperor of Constantinople, and the other Princes of Greece; as also with the Despot of Servia, his Grandfather by the Mothers side, as also with the King of Bulgaria, who was the Father of the Despot's Daughter, Amurat his Wife, was but his Mother-in-Law, whom he under the colour of Friendship sent back again unto her Father, after the death of Amurat, till allowing her a Princely Dowry. But if she were not his Mother (as like enough it is that he was not) much more happy was it that the never groaned for to graceless a Son.

1451. Mahomet was thus occupied about his civil Affairs, Ibrahim King of Caramania, who long before had married Amurat's Sister, and yet for all that, had (as his Ancestors had before him) always envied the prosperous success of the Ottoman Kings, took occasion in the first year of Mahomet's Reign, with Fire and Sword to invade his Dominions in Asia. Which thing when Mahomet understood, he displaced Isa his Lieutenant in Asia, as a man not sufficient to manage to great Wars, and appointed Ismail Balla in his room, a most valiant man of War, on whom not long before he had upon special favour bestowed in marriage the fair Daughter of Spondar, one of his Fathers Wives, of whom we have spoken before. This great Balla passing over unto Asia, raised a great Army. After whom followed Mahomet in person himself with a greater out of Europe; and having all his Forces together, entered with great Hostility into Caramania. But the Caramanian King perceiving himself unable to withstand so puissant an Enemy, fled into the strength of the great Mountains, and by his Embassadors offered unto Alibeg such reasonable Conditions of Peace, as that he was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by solemn Oath on both parts confirmed, Alibeg returned with his Army to Prusa; but when he was come thither, the Jannizaries presuming that they might be bold with the young King; putting themselves in order of Battel, came and with great insolency demanded of him a donative or largess, as a reward of their good service done. With which so great presumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed; but for so much as they were his best Souldiers, and already in Arms, he wisely dissembled his anger for the present, having a little before had warning thereof by Ashin Balla, and Turkhan Beg, two of his great Captains, who had got some officers of the matter; wherefore to content them, he caused ten great Bags of Aspers to be scattered among them, and so pacified the matter. But within few days after, he caused Dogan (the Aga or chief Captain of the Jannizaries) to be brought before him, and to be shamefully whipt; and so profoundly discharging him of his office, placed one Moslim in the lane. The like severity he used against the rest of the under-Captains, causing them to be cruelly scourged and beaten like Slaves; which in that tyrannical Government is an usual punishment, upon the least displeasure of the King to be inflicted upon any man, without respect of degree or calling, if he be not a Natural Turk born. Presently after he sent Isa his Lieutenant against Elia Prince of Manissa or Garia, by whom the poor Prince was driven out of his Country; ever since which time it hath remained in subjection to the Turkish Kings, as part of their Kingdom and Empire.

1452. When this was thus ended the Caramanian War, and was determined with his Army to return to Hadrinople, he was advertised, That the Straits of Hellefponus were so strongly possessed by the Christian Fleet, that he could not there possibly pass over but with most manifest danger; wherefore he took his way through that part of Bulgaria, which lieth about the Strait of Bosporus, and came to the Castle which the Turks call Acce-Chisar, and the Grecians Ακρωκισπος, or White Castle, standing upon the narrow Strait of Bosporus on Asia side, and there passed over into Europe at the same place where his Father Amurat had not many years before in like manner found passage. Where when he was fairly got over with his Army, he by the advice of his Baffles encamped fast by the Sea-side, and there presently began to build a great strong Castle close unto the Straits of Bosporus, near unto Preopontis, on Europe side, directly over against the other Castle, which way thence, he freely accomplished of which work, he assembled thither all the workmen he could possibly get out of Europe and Asia, apportioning unto his Captains and Souldiers of his Army part of the work also; by whose industry and labour, that great building was in shorter time brought to perfection, than by any man at the first expected. This Castle which for the greatness thereof is of most Writers reputed for a City, was by the Turks named Gemickisar, and of the Grecians Neocastron or New Castle, and also Lamecastron, or Castle upon the Straits; and was there by the Turks built, as well for the safety of their own passage too and fro, as for to hinder the passage of the Christians through those narrow Straits, they now possessing the strong Forts on both sides; and thereby also to distress the City of Constantinople, from whence this Castle was not above five miles distant. When Mahomet in the second year of his Reign had finished this great Castle, with four other small Forts about the same, and also repaired the other Castle in Asia over against it, he placed therein strong Garrisons, and furnished the same with Artillery; in such fort that no Ship could pass through the Strait of Bosporus, into the Exius, Exius, or Black Sea, but she was in danger to be sunk; whereby the rich trade which the Marchants of Venice, Genoa, and Constantinople, had to Caffa, and other places lying upon the Exius, were almost quite cut off, to the great hindrance of those Estates. Now Mahomet by Nature ambitious, and wishful desirous to do some such thing as the glory whereof might far pass the Fame of his Predecessors, thought nothing more answerable to his high concepts, and to attempt the winning of Constantinople, and the utter subversion of the Greek Empire, whereupon his Father Amurat, and his great Grandfather Bejaset, had before in vain spent their Forces. Besides that, it grieved him to see that goodly City, the ancient Seat of the Christian Empire, to be so commodiously situated, as it was in the midst of his Kingdom, and not to be at his Command. Hereunto the small power of the Greek Emperor himself, and the other Christian Princes at the same time at mortal discord among themselves, minished unto his greedy desire no small hope of success, and served as Spurs to prick him forward unto so great an enterprise. Whereof all the Winter he caused great preparation to be made of shipping and other warlike provision both for Sea and Land; and gave out Commissions for the levying of a mighty Army, to be readines against the next Spring. But whether he would employ them thus, no man could tell; for he gave out nothing of the thing and none another, the manner of men, when such extraordinary preparation is at hand. Constantinople the eighth of that name, then Emperor of Constantinople, a Prince of a mild and soft Spirit, fitter for the Church than for the Field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkish King, and the fears left that except then growing, should upon the sudden break forth upon himself, first made such preparation as his own small ability would extend unto. And then sent his Embassadors unto other Christian Princes, earnestly craving their Aid and Assistance in his dangerous Estate. But that labour was lost, and all his fruit vain; for they being at variance one with another, and having more care of private revenge, than how to repulse the common Enemy of Christianity, could not, or would not afford him any help at all. Nicholas the fifth of that Name, then Bishop of Rome, with Alphonso King of Naples, and the Senate of Venice, promised to have sent him thirty Gallies, but none for all that came.

There were by chance at Constantinople certain Ships and Gallies of Venice, Genoa; Crete and Cbio, of whom the Emperor made stay; and at which time also it chanced, that Tobias Vysinarius, an Adventurer of Genoa, who had been scouring those Seas, came to Constantinople with two tall Ships, and four hundred Souldiers; where he was entertained by the Emperor. And forasmuch as he was a man honourably defended, and supposed to be both of great Courage and Direction, was by the Emperor appointed General of all his Forces next unto himself. He also entertained six thousand Greeks; which, with three thousand Venezians, Genovais and others, whom he had made stay of, joined unto the Citizens, was all the weak Strength he had to rely upon, for the defence of his State and Empire.

Against the beginning of the Spring, the Turkish King had in readiness a great and puissant Army of three hundred thousand men, of whom, the greatest part were taken out of Bulgaria, Servia, Roscia, Thessalia, Macedonia, and

Greece, which as yet were called the Christian Countries, and were themselves either indeed Christians, or else such Renegades as had not long before forsaken the Christian Faith; unto these also were joined divers other Christians which came out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, to serve the Turk in his Wars. This had been none of the least means, whereby the Turkish Kings have grown to great, and their Kingdom to mightily enlarged; and by this means, allowing Christians to fight against Christians, to the utter confusion of themselves. Among the great multitude of the European Christians, were mingled his effeminate Souldiers of Asia, and his natural Turks and Jannizaries, which were in number fewest, and yet commanded all the rest.

With this great Army well appointed with all warlike provision, came Mahomet the Turkish King from Hadrinople; and the ninth day of April, in the year 1453, encamped before Constantinople, and with the multitude of his Army filled all the main Land before the City, from the Sea side of Bosporus, unto the place where the main Sea compassing in the City on two parts, and running far unto the Land betwixt Constantinople and Pera, maketh there a goodly Haven betwixt them.

This City of Constantinople (called in ancient time Bizantium) is in form of a Triangle, situated in Europe in the pleasant Country of Thracia, upon the south side of the main Land, betwixt the Strait of Asia, called of Pliny and Strabo, the Promontory Chryseiras; where the Sea of Propontis joyneth unto that Strait of Sea, which divideth Asia from Europe, called in ancient time Bosphorus Thracicus; sometime the Strait of Pontus; and the mouth of Pontus; and of the modern Writers, the Strait of Constantinople; and about two hundred years past, or more, S. George his Army. This point of the main, whereon the City standeth, lieth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the ancient City of Calcedon, on the other side of the Strait in Asia; more than thirty miles distant from the Exius or Black Sea, lying from it Northward; and two hundred miles from the Strait of Hellefponus or Calpitolis, from thence South. Which noble City (of all others most fitly fated for the Empire of the World, and with great Majesty overlooking both Europe and Asia) is by the Cosmographers accounted to be in the height of 42 Degrees, upon seven little Hills, of no great, but easy ascent; and was there first built by Pausanias the Lacedaemonian King, and called Bizantium; and so many years flourished as a populous and rich City, until the civil Wars betwixt Severus the Emperor, and Niger; what time he induced the Romans under the redoubted Severus, three years, with such obstinacy, that it yielded not until it was brought to such extremity, that the Citizens did eat one another; and then yielding, had the Walls overthrowen by Severus, and the City it self destroyed, and brought to the low estate of a poor Country Village, and so by him given to the Parthians. In which base estate it continued until the year of Constantine the Great, the Son of Helen (whom some will needs have to have been an English Woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with Buildings so stately and sumptuous, that unto the strange beholders it seemed a dwelling place for Heavens Wights, rather than for Earthly Men. And to grace it the more, translated his Imperial Seat thither, and called it New Rome, or New Rome; and all that pleasant part of Thracia along the Sea Coast of Hellefponus, Preopontis, and Bosporus, by the name of Romania, of the fair Roman Colonies there by him planned; which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turks, called Rumelia and Rum-ili, that is to say, the Roman Country. But as for the City it self, the glorious name of the Founder prevailed, that the City was and yet is of him called Constantinople, or Constantine his City; and now of the barbarous Turks commonly, but corruptly, Stamboli. It is (as we said) built in the form of a Triangle, whereof the longest side, which runneth from North-East to South-West, is on the South-side washed with the Propontia; and towards the ending of the point, which is about the seven Towers, is somewhat indented; being commonly reputed to be eight miles long. The other side lieth East and West five miles in length, being washed with the Haven, which is somewhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the fresh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad; on the further side whereof standeth the City of Pera, commonly called Galata, sometime a Colony of the Genoese. This Haven is very deep, and by that reason as commodious as deep, bearing Ships full fraught, close to the Shore, so that they may discharge their Burthens with the least trouble that may be; and is of Strabo called Cornu Bizantii, or the Horn of Bizantium. The third side of this City towards the Continent, lieth almost North and South five miles also in length, those two sides that lie upon the Sea, and the Haven, are environed and girt with a single Wall, built after the antique manner, with many high Towers, which strongly defend and flank the same. Without which Walls (especially towards the Haven) there lieth a Street between them and the Shore. But the other side, which is the third, that is to say, the main Land (besides the Ditch, which is also fenced) is defended with three Walls; the first Wall standing upon the Ditch being low and the second not far distant from the first, raised somewhat higher; but the third overlooketh and commandeth both the others from whence as from an high fortress both the other Walls and all the Ditch without may easily be defended. But the two inner Walls, with the whole space betwixt them, are now by the Turks but slenderly maintained, lying full of Earth and other Rubbish, even as they were in the time of the Grecians; some cause why with less heart and courage defended the same against the barbarous Enemies. In the East part of the City, on that point which in the Reign of the Grecians was called the Cape of S. Demetria, distant from Asia not much more than half a mile, stands the Seraglio or Palace of the great Turk, containing in it self a great part of an Hill, enclosed round with a Wall, as it were it self a City, in circuit more than two miles; wherein amongst other stately Buildings, near unto the Sea standeth a very fair and sumptuous Gallery, built for pleasure, with a private Gate well fortified and planted with great Ordnance and other Munition, whereby the great Turk at certain times passeth, when he is dispensed in his Gally to take his pleasure upon the Sea, or to pass over the Strait unto his Houses or Gardens of Delight, on the other side of Asia. In this great City are also many other most stately and sumptuous Buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkish Sultans, since they became Lords thereof, as before by the Greek Emperors; amongst which the Temple of S. Sophia standing on the East side of the City, not far from the Seraglio (now reduced unto the form of a Mahometan Mosque, and whither the great Turk goeth oftentimes to hear Service, being indeed but the Sanctuary or Chancel only of the great, stately, and wonderful Church built by Justinian the Emperor) is most beautiful and admirable. That which standeth of it now, is both round and very high, built after the fashion of the Pantheon in Rome, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top, as that is; the Walls thereof being of the finest Marble, and the Floor all paved with fair Marble also. In the midst there is a very great and large Circle, compassed with twelve Pillars of most excellent Marble of divers sorts; and these support a mighty Vault that beareth up as many more Pillars above, standing after the very same order, and in a down right line, almost of the like greatness and goodness of the Marble with the otherbelow; upon which above the second Vault in manner of a Loovar, resteth the great round Roof which covereth all that space of the Church which is compassed with the aforesaid Pillars; being all enameled and filled with the Pictures of Saints, after the antique manner of some great Churches in Christendom; but that the Turks, who like not to have any Pictures in their Churches, have put out their Eyes only, as loath to spoil such a rare piece of work, and utterly to deface it. In like manner the Walls of the upper Vault are wrought, painted, or portrayed after the same order, though in some part decayed, by reason of their long continuance and standing. About the Church are environed or twined two Doores of Brass, right fair and costly, well declaring the magnificence and greatness thereof in more ancient times; when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred Doores of like making and greatness; and besides the hugeness of the Frame and Building it self, had also divers fair Monasteries and Houses of Religion, whereof the most famous belonged fix thousand Priests, whose Houses and Lodgings extended almost all over the place where now the Turks Palace standeth, and the other places adjoining to this great Church, which is now their chief Mosque, and called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia, because they hold even as we do, the Wisdom of God to be incomprehensible and infinite. The next in magnificence unto this, is the Mosque of Sulymann, wherein he lieth buried, and his well beloved Wife the fair Roxelana; a work well becoming the Majesty of so mighty a Monarch. There are besides these almost many other fair Mosques, Seraglios for the Turk his Wives and Concubines, Bezatanes or Burges for Merchants, Obelisks, Bathes, and other publick Edifices and Buildings of great Majesty and State, all well worth the beholding; wherein consisteth all the Beauty of this so ancient and renowned a City; far unlike to that it was in the time of the first Greek Emperors, and before it was spoiled by the Latines. For the Turks private Houses in this so great and imperial City, so much renowned through the World, are for the most part low and base, after the Turkish fashion, built some of Wood, some of Stone, and some of unburnt Brick, laid with Clay and Dirt, which quickly decayeth again; they after their homely manner (by long custom received) never building any thing sumptuously for their own private use, but contenting themselves with their simple Cottages, how mean soever, commonly saying them to be good enough for the short time of their Pilgrimage; and yet not sparing for any costly and stately Buildings and Ornaments of the Common-Weal, which they build with great Majesty and Pomp; but especially their Mosques, wherein they excel. Nevertheless, there yet are in Constantinople some other other Houses also built high and comely enough; but these few, and very old, all inhabited by the Christians and Jews, and not by the Turks; by this of these enough. And so again to our purpose.

Mahomet with his puissant Army thus encamped before the City, placing his Asian Soldiers on the right hand towards the Bosphorus; his European Soldiers on the left hand, toward the Haven; lay himself with 15000 Janizaries and other Soldiers of great Courage in the middle between both, against the heart of the City. On the farther side of the Haven also by Pera, he placed Zaganus, one of his chief Counsellors, with another part of his Army. At which time also a Pantoloe his Admiral came to the Siege, with a Fleet of 30 Gallies, and 200 other small Ships, and a number of other lesser Vessels, which were rowed with three, or five Oars apiece, full of Turkish Archers, fitter for less than Service. But for defence of the Haven, and so of the City on that side, the Emperor had caused the Haven to be strongly chained overwart from the City to Pera; and within the Chain had orderly placed his strong Fleet, the greatest strength whereof was fifteen great Ships of Genoa, with three Gallies, and two Gallies of Venice, three of Creta, and a few others of the Island of Chios; all which were there, rather by chance upon Merchants affairs, than that they were provided for any such service; yet by this means the Turks Fleet was shut out of the Haven, and so the City put in good safety on that side.

When Mahomet had thus conveniently encamped his Army, and surrounded the City both by Sea and Land; he first cast up great Trenches as near as he possibly could unto the Walls of the City, and raised Mounts in divers places as high as the Walls themselves, from whence the Turks with their Shot greatly annoyed the Defendants. After that, he placed his Battery against one of the Gates of the City called Calcaria, and terribly battered the same, specially with one piece of Ordnance of a wonderful greatness, which with much difficulty was brought from Medinople with an hundred and fifty Yoke of Oxen, and carried a Bullet of an hundred pound weight, made (as his other shot was) of a kind of hard Black Stone brought from the Euxin Sea; for as yet (as it seemeth) so soon after the invention of that fatal Engine, the use of Bullets of metal was unknown. There with continual Battery, he terribly shook the Walls, which although they were very strong, yet were they not able to withstand the fury of so great a Battery. The Christians also out of the City discharged their great Artillery upon the Turks, but so sparingly, as if they had been afraid to shake their own Walls, or loth for good Husbandry, to spend Shot and Powder, which was to the Canons there was so well bestowed, that the Turks were thereby grievously annoyed. The Breach also which they had made at the aforesaid Gate, was by the Defendants with great and dangerous labour again repaired with Faggots and Earth, and such like matter left faring for that purpose, and so made stronger than before. In which most dangerous work, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Justinian the Governor, the Emperors Lieutenant-General for defence of the City.

Yet for all this diligence of the Christians, Mahomet continued his Battery with no less fury than before; but reposing greater hope to find a way into the City, by the Spade and Mattock, than by Battery; he employed his Pioneers, whereof he had great force, to dig a Mine; being altogether directed by Christians skilful in that kind of work, whom he had for that purpose entertained. By whose cunning direction, with the industrious labour of the poor Pioneers, the Mine was brought to such perfection, that part of the Wall, with one of strong Towers in the same, was quite undermined, and at length fell down; but with such untimely falls as the Pioneers had left for the bearing up thereof till such time as it should be by the Tyrants appointment blown up. This dangerous work was neither perceived, neither yet feared by the Constantinopolitans, as a thing not possible to have been done; forasmuch as Bajazet and Ananath had both with great labour before in vain attempted the same, at such time as they hardly besieged the City. But that which those great Kings had with much vain labour by unskilful men made proof of, Mahomet had now by men of greater device, brought to pass; although it took not such effect as was wished; for one Jo. Grandis, a German Captain, and a man of great experience, suspecting the matter, had caused a Countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turks was in good time discovered; and they with Fire and Sword driven out of the Mine, and the same strongly filled up again, and so the City for that time delivered of a great fear and danger. Mahomet perceiving that it availed him not to continue his Battery against that place, which was again so strongly repaired, removed the same, and planted it against a Tower called Basilatima, near unto the Gate called Porta Romanorum, the Roman Gate. Which Tower was then with continual Battery, at length fell down, and filled the Ditch before the utter Wall, even with the ground. But this Breach was also speedily and with great courage made up again by the Defendants, although the Turks did what they could, with continual shot, to have driven them from the same. At which time they also erected certain high Towers of Timber, covered with raw Hides to defend the same from fire, out of which they with their Shot flew many of the Christians upon the Walls, and in making good the aforesaid Breach; but Mahomet seeing this valiancy of the Defendants, openly said, That it was neither the Grecians skill nor courage; but the Frenchmen that defended the City; for the Turks commonly call all the Christians of the West by the Name of Franks or French-men.

The cheerfulness and industry of the Christians in defending and repairing the aforesaid Breach, was so great, that the Turkish King began almost to despair of winning the City; which he could no way Assault but on one side. When as a bad Christian in his Camp, put him again in good hope, by shewing unto him a device how to bring a great part of his Fleet over Land into the Haven, and thereby to Assault that part of the City by water; which the Citizens least feared; by which ingenious device, and by the great strength of men, Zaganus Bassa (to whom that charge was committed) brought twenty of the lesser Ships and Gallies, with all their Sails abroad (to the great admiration of all that saw them) up a great Hill, and so by dry land, out of the Bosphorus behind Pera, the space of eight miles, into the Haven of Constantinople, which running in between the City and Pera, runneth into the main Land, (as we have said) about eight miles. The Christian that discovered this device unto the King, is supposed to have learned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the Lake of Bonanus. Glad was Mahomet to see so many of his Ships and Gallies in the Haven, and the Christians with the fight thereof not discouraged. Nevertheless they attempted to have burnt those Vessels as they were in launching, but the Turks had so commodiously placed certain pieces of great Ordnance for their defence, that the tumult of the Gallies of the Christians, approaching the Turks Fleet, was presently funk; wherewith the rest dismayed, returned back from whence they came. Certain of the Gallies of the Christians, whom the Turks took up swimming in the Haven, were the next day cruelly slain in the fight of the Christians; in revenge whereof, certain Turks before taken Prisoners into Constantinople, were forthwith brought to the top of the Walls, and there in the sight of the Camp with like cruelty put to death.

A wonderful bridge made by the Turks over the Walls of Constantinople.

Mahomet thus possessed of the Haven, shortly after caused a wonderful Bridge to be made quick over the Haven, from Zaganus his Camp which lay by Pera unto the Walls of Constantinople, which Bridge was built with Timber and Planks, born up with small Boats and empty Cask, after a most strange manner, and was in length more than half a mile; by which Bridge his Army came over the Haven, to assault the City on that side also.

In the mean time, three tall Gemoway Ships laden with Men and Munition from the Island of Chios, with one of the Emperors laden with Corn from Sicilia, came with a fair Wind to the Walls of Constantinople. The Turks great Fleet then lying not far off, within the sight of the Camp, let upon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turks were slain with Shot, the Gallies boarded the Ships; but being much lower, were far from doing any good, as that the Turks could not well look out, but as they were from above slain or wounded. Mahomet from the shore beholding the unequal fight, and slaughter of his Men, cried out aloud, swearing and blaspheming God, and in great rage rid into the Sea as far as he durst; and coming back again rent his Clothes, faring with himself like a mad man. The whole Army of the Turks beholding the same fight at Sea, was filled with like Indignation also, but could not rightly remedy the matter. The great Fleet ashamed in the fight of their King to be overcome of so few Ships, did what they might desperately to enter; but all in vain, being continually overwhelmed with Shot and Stones from above, and valiantly beaten down by the Christian Soldiers. At length weary of their loss, they were glad with dishonour to fall off again, and to get them further off. The report of the loss the Turks sustained in this fight, is almost incredible; some of the Turks Fugitives reported, almost ten thousand Turks to have there perished; but certain it is, that such was the loss, as filled the whole Army with Indignation and Sorrow, many having lost their Kinsmen or Friends. Three of these Ships that had made this fight, arrived in safety at Constantinople, the other was lost. Mahomet upon this Overthrow conceived such displeasure against Panagolis his Admiral, who in that fight had lost one of his Eyes, that he nevertheless thrust him out of his Office, confiscated his Goods, and was hardly by the great Baffles intreated to spare his life.

Whilst Mahomet thus lay at the Siege of Constantinople, and had thenceunto given many great Attempts, with more loss unto himself than to the Defendants, a rumor was raised in his Camp, of great Aid that was coming out of Italy by Sea, and out of Hungary by Land, for the relief of the besieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due consideration of the danger of the Siege, filled the Turks Camp with fear; so that the Soldiers commonly murmured amongst themselves, saying, That to falsifie the ambitious humour of their young Kings, they were led to fight against impregnable Walls and Fortresses, yea against the Bars of Nature it self, without all reason: Whereupon Mahomet entered into Consultation with the three great Baffles his Counsellors. Whether it were best for him to continue the Siege or not. When Caly-Bassa, sometime his Tutor, a man of great Authority among the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withall secretly favouring the distressed Emperor, after he had with long and grave Discourse declared the difficulty or rather impossibility of the wished Success in that present War; and confirmed the same, by producing the examples of Bajazet his great Grandfather, and of Amurath his Father, who had both in vain made proof of their strength against that City; at length concluded, that in his mind it were best for him to raise his Siege, and to depart before he had sustained any further loss or disgrace; but Zaganus, a man of great favour also with Mahomet, and secretly envying the Greatness of Caly-Bassa, perfwaded the King to proceed in his honourable Enterprise; assuring him of the good Success thereof, and with all the reasons he could devise, impugned that which Caly-Bassa had said. And of the same opinion with him was also the third Baffa, rather of purpose to cross Caly-Bassa, and withall to tie the Kings humor, than for any great hope he had in the good Success of that he so much desired. Howbeit the Speech he and Zaganus delivered, to well agreed with the Kings affection, that he resolved to continue the Siege; and thereupon gave full Authority to Zaganus to appoint a day for a great and general Assault to be given, resolving at once to engage all his Forces upon the winning of the City. Which charge Zaganus gladly took upon him, and with his good liking, appointed the 29th day of May for the general Assault, being then the Tuesday next following. In the mean time he sent one Imad, the Son of Alexander Prince of Simp, Ambassador unto the Emperor, to offer him Peace; but upon such hard Conditions, as were no less to be refused than death it self. Which thing he did, partly to falsifie the minds of his Turks (who are for most part of opinion, That God will not prosper them in their Assaults, except they first make unto their Enemies some offer of Peace, how unreasonable soever it forthwith) and partly to make proof what confidence the Enemy yet had in himself, for the holding out of the Siege. But that dishonourable Peace so offered, together with the intolerable Conditions, was by the Emperor honourably refused; who no less feared the Turks Faith (if he should have accepted thereof) than he did the hardness of the Conditions. Three days before this fatal Assault was to be given, the Turks (according to their manner) kept their Solemn Fast, eating nothing all the day until night; and then making the greatest cheer and joy they could devise, if they in the winding up of the fame, took their leave one of another, with such kissing and embracing as if they should never have met again. At the same time Mahomet to encourage his Soldiers, caused Proclamation to be made through his Camp, That he would freely give all the Spoil of the City for three days unto his Soldiers, who should win it; and for confirmation thereof, solemnly swore the Turks great Oath, by the Immortal God, and by the four hundred Prophets, by

by Mahomet, by his Fathers Soul, by his own Children, and by the Sword wherewith he was girt, faithfully to perform whatsoever he had to them in his Proclamation promised.

Whilst these things were in doing, Caly-Bassa disclaiming that his counsel was rejected, and the Opinion of his Adversaries followed; by secret Letters advertised the Emperor of the day appointed for the general Assault, together with all the preparation made against him; perfwading him not to be afraid of them, who were themselves no less afraid of him; but carefully to provide to have all things in readinesse of his part, and to his City, and valiantly to withstand the rash and last Attempt of his Enemies.

This woful Emperor had already done what he could to the uttermost of his Power for defence of the City, all the time of the Siege; but such was the disloyalty of the Citizens his Subjects, that many times they could hardly be drawn from their private Trades and Occupations, unto the Walls to withstand the Enemy; foolishly affirming, That it was to no purpose for them to fight against the Turks at the Breaches, and to tharve for Food at home in their houses. For which cause, the Emperor commanded a View to be taken of all the Corn in the City (which then began to grow very scarce;) but upon diligent search made, such store was found in many Mens hands, (which was by them either altogether kept in to sell afterwards at unreasonable prizes, or else so sparingly uttered, as if they had none to spare at all; it appeared, the dearth and scarcity which then began to increase, to proceed rather of the covetousness of men, than of any true want of Grain; this store the Emperor caused to be proportionably divided unto every Family at reasonable prizes, according to their spending; and so eased the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for Bread. The Grecian mercenary Soldiers also, regarding more their own private Profit than the Publick Service, refused any longer to go to the Walls, than they were sure of their daily pay; which the poor Emperor, otherwise unable to give them, was glad to convert the Church-Plates, and Jewels into Money to content them. For he had many times before with tears, in vain requested to have borrowed money of his covetous Subjects, to have been employed in the defence of the City; but they would still swear, that they had it not, as men grown poor for want of Trade; which in few days after, their Enemies found in such abundance, that they wondered at their Wealth, and derided their folly, that possessing so much, they would be so poor to little in defence of themselves and their Country. But this had been their usual manner of dealing with their Emperors, in that declining State of the Empire; as well appeared in the time of the Emperor Bajazum, who for lack of money was glad first to sell away many of the goodly Ornaments of the City, and afterwards to Pawn his own Son unto the Venetian Merchants, for Money to maintain his State, as in the former part of this History is declared.

But to return again to the course of our History. The Emperor certainly advertised of the Enemies purpose, for the general Assault, shortly to be given, first commended the defence of himself and the City to the Protection of the Almighty, by general fasting and prayer; and afterwards appointed every Captain and Commander, to fortify certain place of the Wall, for defence thereof; which was done by the direction of Ta. Jusfinianus his General, in whose valour the Constantinopolitans had reposed their greatest hope.

But the City being on every side now beset with the Turks great Army, and the Defendants in number but few, for so great a City (in compass eight miles) the Walls could but slenderly in many places be manned; and especially on both sides toward the Sea, where indeed least danger was. The greatest strength and best Soldiers, were placed for defence of the utter Wall, where the Breach was, and the Assault expected by Land. Jusfinianus the General himself, with three hundred Gemoways well armed, and certain chosen Greeks undertook the defence of that part of the battlement, near unto the Roman Gate, where the fall the Tower Baburina had filled the Ditch as is aforesaid; against which place Mahomet himself lay encamped, with his Janizaries and best Men of War. Near unto Jusfinianus lay the Emperor himself, for defence of another part of the Wall; and so other Captains orderly with their Companies, all along the utter Walls, and because the Defendants should have no hope to save their Lives, more than their own Valour, the Emperor caused all the Gates of the inner Wall to be fast shut up; and in this sort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the Assault should be given; all which time they might hear great lury burly and noise in the Turks Camp, as they were putting things in readinesse for the Assault.

A little before day, the Turks approached the Walls, and begun the Assault, where Shot and Stones were delivered upon them from the Walls, as thick as hail; wherof little fell in vain, by reason of the multitude of the Turks, who pressing fast unto the Walls, could not see in the dark how to defend themselves, but were without number wounded or slain; but these were of the common and worst Soldiers, of whom the Turkish King made no more reckoning than to abate the first force of the Defendants. Upon the first appearance of the day, Mahomet gave the sign appointed for the general Assault, whereupon the City was in a moment and at one instant on every side most furiously assaulted by the Turks; for Mahomet, the more to distress the Defendants, and the better to see the forwardness of the Soldiers, had before appointed which part of the City every Colonel with his Regiment should assault. Which they valiantly performed, delivering their Arrows and Shot upon the Defendants, so thick, that the light of the day was therewith darkened; other in the mean time courageously mounting the Scaling-Ladders, and coming even to hand-strokes with the Defendants upon the Wall; where the former were for most part violently born forward by them which followed after. On the other side, the Christians with no less courage withstood the Turkish fury, beating them down again with great Stones and weighty pieces of Timber, and so overwhelmed them with Shot, Darts, and Arrows, and other hurtful devices from above; that the Turks dismayed with the terror thereof, were ready to retire.

Mahomet seeing the great slaughter and discomforture of his Men, sent in fresh Supplies of his Janizaries and best Men of War, whom he had for that purpose reserved as his last Hope and Refuge; by whose coming on his fainting Soldiers were again encouraged, and the terrible Assault begun afresh. At which time the barbarous King ceased not to use all possible means to maintain the Assault; by Name calling upon this and that Captain, promising unto some whom he saw forward, golden Mountains; and unto others in whom he saw any sign of Cowardice, threatening most terrible death; by which means the Affair became most dreadful, death there raging in the midst of many thousands. And albeit that the Turks lay dead by heaps upon the ground, yet other fresh men pressed on still in their places, over their dead bodies, and with divers event either flew, or were slain by their Enemies.

In this so terrible a Conflict, it chanced Tufinians the General to be wounded in the Arm, who losing much blood, cowardly withdrew himself from the place of his Charge, not leaving any to supply his room, and to go into the City by the Gate called Romana, which he had caused to be opened in the inner Wall; pretending the cause of his departure to be for the binding up of his Wound, but being indeed a man now altogether discouraged.

The Soldiers there present, dismayed with the departure of their General, and fore charged by the Janizaries, forsook their Stations, and in half fled to the same Gate with Tufinians was concerted with the fight, whereas the other Soldiers dismayed, ran thither by heaps also. But whilst they violently thrived, all together to get in at once, they to wedged one another in the entrance of the Gate, that few of great multitude got in; in which to great a press and confusion of minds, so persons were by them that followed trodden under foot, or thrust to death. The Emperor himself, for safeguard of his life flying with the rest, in that press as a man not regarded, miserably ended his days, together with the Greek Empire. His dead body was shortly after found by the Turks among the slain, and known by his rich Apparel, whose Head being cut off, was forthwith presented to the Turkish Tyrant; by whose Commandment it was afterward thrust upon the point of a Lance, and in great derision carried about as a Trophy of his Victory, first in the Camp, and afterwards up and down the City.

The Turks encouraged with the flight of the Christians, presently advanced their Engines upon the top of the uttermost Wall, crying Victory; and by the Breach entered as if it had been a great Flood, which having once found a Breach in the Bank, overflowed, and beareth down all before it, to the Turks when they had won the inner Wall, entered the City by the same Gate that was opened by Tufinians, and by a Breach which they had before made with their great Artillery, and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further resistance became Lords of that most famous and Imperial City. Some few there were of the Christians, who professing death before the Turkish slavery, with their Swords in their hands fold their lives dear to their Enemies; amongst whom, the two Brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochards Italians, with Theophilus Paleologus a Greek, and Joannes Stavrus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deserve to be had in eternal Remembrance; who after they had killed many made slaughter of their Enemies, died in the midst of them, embued with their blood, rather oppressed by multitude, than by true valour overcome. In this fury of the Barbarians, perished many thousands of Men, Women, and Children, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition. Many for safeguard of their lives fled into the Temple of Sepia; where they were all without pity slain, except some few reserved by the barbarous Victors, to purposes more grievous than death it self. The rich and beautiful Ornaments and Jewels of that most sumptuous and magnificent Church (the stately Building of Tufinians the Emperor) were in the turning of a hand, plucked down and carried away by the Turks; and the Church it self built for God to be honoured in, for the present converted into a Stable for their Horses, or a place for the execution of their abominable and unpeakeable filthiness; the Image of the Crucifix was also by them taken down, and a Turks Cap put upon the head thereof, and so set up and shot at with their Arrows, and afterwards in great derision carried about in their Camp, as it had been in Procession, with Drums playing before it, ranging and spitting at it, and calling it the God of the Christians. Which I note not so much done in contempt of the Image, as in the derision of Christ and the Christian Religion.

But whilst some were thus spoiling of the Churches, others were as busy in ransacking of private houses, where the miserable Christians were enforced to endure in their persons whatsoever pleased the insolent Victors; unto whom all things were now lawful that stood with their lust, every common Soldier having power of Life and Death, at his pleasure to spare or kill. At which time Riches were no better than Poverty; and Beauty worse than Deformity. What Tongue were able to express the misery of that time? or the proud Insolency of those barbarous Conquerors? where by so many thousands, every man with greediness fired his own unreasonably desire, at all which the poor Christians were enforced to endure. But to speak of the hidden Treasure, Money, Plate, Jewels, and other Riches there found, passeth credence; the City themselves wondered thereat, and were therewith enriched, that it is a Proverb amongst them at this day, He hath been as the lacking of Constantinople; whereof if some reasonable part had in time been bestowed upon the defence of the City, the Turkish King had not so easily taken both it and the City. But every man was careful how to increase his own private Wealth, few or none regarding the Publick State; until in fine, every man with his private abundance was wrapped up together with his needy Neighbour in the self same common misery. Yea the feourty of the Constantinopolitans was such, that being always environed with their mortal Enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of so much as the inner Wall of the City (which for beauty and strength was comparable with the Walls of any City in the World, if it had been kept well repaired) but suffered the Officers which had the charge to fee to the fortifying of the City, to convert the greatest part of the money into their own Purges; as appeared by Manuel Gignarus, a little before a very poor man; and likewise by Neophilus, who then having that Office to see into the Fortification of the City, had in short time gathered together twenty thousand Florens, which became all a worthy Prey unto the greedy Turks.

After that the barbarous common Soldier had thus by the space of three days without controulment taken his pleasure in the City (as Mahomet had before promised) and thoroughly ransacked every corner thereof, with their recurrent poor Christian Captives before them, as if they had been droves of Cattel, or flocks of Sheep; a Spectacle no less lamentable, than was the sacking of the City. It would have grieved any stony heart to have seen the noble beautiful women and great Ladies, with their beautiful Children, and many other fair Personages, who lately flowed in all worldly Wealth and Pleasure, to be now become the poor and miserable Bondslaves slaves of most base and contemptible Rascals; who were so far from shewing them any pity, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heap more and more misery upon them, making no more reckoning of them than of Dogs. There might the Parents see the woful misery of their beloved Children, and the Children of the Parents; the Husband might see the shameful abuse of his Wife, and the Wife of her Husband not able to mourn together (the least part of heavy comfort) being in the Thralldom of divers cruel Masters, by whom they were kept asunder, like in few days to be dispersed into divers far Countries, without hope that they should ever find Release, or one foe another again.

The Soldiers being all retired into the Camp, Mahomet as a proud Conqueror, with great Triumph entered into the City of Constantinople, then desolate and void of all Christian Inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkish Kings, made a sumptuous and Royal Feast unto his Baffees and other great Captains; where after he had feasted himself with excess of Meat and Drink, he caused divers of the chief Christian Captives, both Men and Women (of whom many were of the late Emperors Line and Race) to be in his presence put to death, as he with his Turks late Banqueting, deeming his Feast much more lately by such effusion of Christian blood. Which manner of exceeding cruelty he daily used, until such time as he had destroyed all the Grecian Nobility that was in his Power, with the chief of the late Constantinopolitan Citizens. At which time also divers of the Venetian Senators, with Bajazet their Governor, and many rich Merchants of Genoa, and other places of Italy, were by the same manner murdered; so that of seven and forty Senators of Venice which were there taken (whereof most part came thither by chance, bound for other places, but there unluckily shut up) some few found the favour, with exceeding great Ransoms to redeem themselves.

Amongst these Noblemen thus lamentably executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Nataras, commonly called Lucy-Lucas, or Lord Lucas, but of late great Chancellor of Constantinople, a man of greatest account next unto the Emperor himself; whom the Turkish Tyrant seemed greatly to blame, that he being a man in so great credit with the late Emperor, perished him not in time to have sought for Peace upon any condition, or else to have yielded up the City, rather than to have run that extreme course of wilful misery. He to excale the matter, said, That the late Emperor his Master was enraged to hold out one Siege by the Venetians and Citizens of Pera, from whom he received Aid; as also by some of the greatest Men about his own Person; for proof whereof, he drew out of his bosom the Letters which Caly-Bassa had to that purpose written unto the Emperor, and delivered them to Mahomet, hoping thereby to have found some favour. But when he had said what he could, the eldest of his Sons then living (for he had lost two elder in the time of the Siege) was cruelly executed before his face, and the youngest referred to the Tyrants lust; and after all this misery, had his own head struck off with the rest appointed for that day Sacrifice. Our Turkish general Calamity escaped Tu-Tufinians the General, who with all speed fled at first to Pera, and from thence to Chier, where in few days after he died, of grief of mind (as was thought) rather than of his Wound, being happy if he had honourably before ended his days upon the Walls of Constantinople; flidius also the Cardinal and Legate from the Pope, disguised in simple Apparel, and being of the Turks unknown, redeemed himself for a small Ransom, as if he had been a man of none account, and so escaped; whom if Mahomet had known, he had undoubtedly been made shorter by the head.

The glory of this famous City of Constantinople continued many hundred years, commanding a great part of the World, until by civil discord and private gain, it was by little and little weakened, that the Emperors of later times, for the maintenance of their Estate, were glad to rely somewhat upon one, and functions upon another, yet still holding the Title and State of an Empire, by the space of 1121 years, when as (God his judgment far apart, wonderful and shameful it is to consider how) it was by this Turkish King Mahomet so quickly taken, and the Christian Empire of the East there utterly overthrown; which happened on the nine and twentieth day of May in the year of our Lord, 1553. Constantinus Paleologus, the Son of Iskenas, and last Christian Emperor, being then slain, when he had reigned about eight years. Since which time it hath continued the Imperial Seat of the Turkish Emperors, and so remaineth at this day.

The Potestates and Citizens of Pera, otherwise called Galata, a City standing opposite against Constantinople, on the other side of the Haven, and then under the Government of the Genoaves, doubting to run the same course of misery with their Neighbours, sent their Orators unto Mahomet (the same day that Constantinople was taken) offering to be the Keys of their Gates, and to be to become his Subjects. Of which their Offer Mahomet, accepted, and sent Zoganus with his Regiment to take possession of the City. Who coming thither, according to Mahomet his Commandment, there established the Turkish Government, confiscated the Goods of all such as were fled, and used the rest of the Citizens which staid, with such Insolency and Oppression, as that their misery was not much less than theirs of Constantinople; and because it was doubted, that the Genoaves might by Sea give Aid unto the Citizens, if they should at any time seek to revolve, he caused the Walls and Fortresses of the City which were toward the Land, to be cast down and laid even with the ground. Thus is the fatal period of the Greek Empire run, and Mahomet in one day became Lord of the two famous Cities of Constantinople and Pera; the one taken by Force, the other by Conspiration. At which time the misery of Pera was great, but that of Constantinople justly to be accounted amongst the greatest Calamities that ever happened to any Christian City in the World.

Mahomet had of long time born a secret grudge against Caly-Bassa, sometimes his Tutor, for that by the means Amurath his Father, in the dangerous time of the Hungarian Wars, had again resumed unto himself the Government of the Turkish Kingdom, which he had before resigned unto him, then but young. But forasmuch as he was the chief Baffa, and had for many years ruled all things at his pleasure, to the general good liking of the people, during the Reign of old Amurath, and was thereby grown to be of great Wealth, Credit, and Authority, as no man had at any time obtained greater under any of the Ottoman Kings; Mahomet in the beginning of his Reign, before he was established in his King Kingdom, durst not take Revenge of that Injury (as he deemed it) but yet fill kept it in remembrance, warily dissembling his deep conceived hatred, as if he had quite forgot it. Nevertheless sometime (for all his warlike) words fell from him whereby the wary Courtiers (which as curiously weigh their Princes words) as the cunning Goldsmith doth his finest Gold) easily perceived the secret grudge that stuck in his stomach against the Bassa; and thereby divided his fall to be at hand. So it happened one day that as Mahomet was walking in the Court, he saw a Fox of the Bassas tied in a chain which after he had a while earnestly looked upon, he suddenly brake into this Speech; *Alas poor Beasts! hast thou no money to give thy Master to set thee at liberty? Out of which words, curious heads gathered much matter concerning the Kings disposition towards the Bassa. This ominous furnishing of the Courtiers (which oft-times proverb too true) was not unknown unto the Bassa himself, but troubled him much; wherefore to get himself out of the way for a season, more than for any devotion, he took upon him to go in Pilgrimage to visit the Temple of the great Prophet (as they term him) at Mecca, which amongst the Turks is holden for a right Religious and Meritorious Work; hoping, that the young Kings displeasure might in time be mitigated, and his malice asswaged. But Mahomet perceiving the distrust of the Bassa, and whereof it proceeded, seemed to take knowledge thereof, and with good words comforted him up, willing him to be of good cheer, and not to misdo anything; neither to regard the vain Speech of foolish people, assuring him of his undoubted Favour; and the more to put him out of suspicion, continually lent him rich Gifts, and heaped upon him new Honours, as if all others he had effaced him most. Until that now at the taking of Constantinople, it was discovered by Luca Lescamiere, that he had Intelligence with the late Emperor of Constantinople, and his Letters produced. For which cause, or as the common report went, for the old grudge that the Tyrant bare against him, as also for his great Wealth, he was by Mahomet's commandment apprehended and carried in bonds to Hadrampole; where after he had with exquisite torments been enforced to confess where all his Treasures lay, he was most cruelly in his extreme old age executed. After whose death, his Friends and Servants (which were many, for he was a man greatly beloved in Court) in token of their grief, put on Mourning Apparel; so that in the Court appeared a great show of common sorrow; wherewith Mahomet being offended, caused Proclamation to be made, That all such as did wear such Mourning Apparel should the next day appear before him; at which time there was not one to be seen about the Court in that heavy Attire; for fear of the Tyrants displeasure.*

After that Mahomet was thus become Lord of the Imperial City of Constantinople, as is aforesaid, and had fully resolved there to place his Imperial Seat, he first repaired the Walls and other Buildings spoiled in the late Siege; and by Proclamations sent forth into all parts of his Dominions, gave great Privileges and Immunities to all such as should come to dwell at Constantinople, with free liberty to exercise what Religion they pleased. Trade was opened up, whereby that great and desolate City was again well peopled, with such as out of divers Countries resorted thither; but specially with the Jewish Nation, which driven out of other places, came thither in great numbers; and were of the Turks gladly received. So when he had there established all things according to his hearts desire, he took upon him the Name and Title of an Emperor; and is from that time not unworthily reputed for the first Emperor of the Turks.

Now among many fair Virgins taken Prisoners by the Turks at the winning of Constantinople, was one Irene a Greek born of such incomparable Beauty and rare Perfection; both of Body of Mind, as if Nature had in her, to the admiration of the World, laboured to have shewn her greatest skill; so prodigally she had bestowed upon her, all the Graces that might beautify or commend that her so curious a Work. This Paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, presented unto the great Sultan Mahomet himself, as a Jewel to fit for no mans wearing as his own; by the Beauty and secret Vertues whereof, he found himself even upon the first View not a little moved. Nevertheless, having as then his head full of Troubles, and above all things careful for the assuring of the Imperial City of Constantinople, by him but even then won, he for the present committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and sent her away, so to be in safety kept until his better leisure. But those his Troubles overblown, and his new Conquests well affected, he then began forthwith to think of the fair Irene; and for his pleasure sending for her, took in her Perfections such delight and contentment, as that in short time he had changed state with her, she being become the Mistress and Commander of him to great a Conqueror; and he in nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greatest Honour and Service he could. All the day he spent with her in discourse, and the night in dalliance; all time spent in her company, seemed to him short; and without her nothing pleased; his fierce Nature was now by her well tamed, and his wonted care of Arms quite neglected: Mars slept in Venus lap, and now the Soldiers might go play. Yea the very Government of his Empire and Empire seemed to be of him, in comparison of her, little or not at all regarded; the care whereof being by him carefully committed to others, that so he might wholly himself attend upon her, in whom more than in himself the people said he delighted. Such is the power of disordered affections, where reason ruleth not therein. But whilst thus he indulged himself, spending in pleasure not some few days or months, but even one whole year or two, to the lighting of his Credit, and the great discontentment of his Subjects in general; the Janizaries and other Soldiers of the Court (men desirous of Employment, and grieved to see him so given to his Affections, and to make no end thereof) began at first in secret to murmur thereat, and to speak hardly of him; and at length (after their insolent manner) spared not openly to say, That it were well done to deprive him of his Government and State, as unworthy thereof, and to set up one of his Sons in his stead. Which Speeches were now grown so ripe, and his discontentment of the Men of War so great, that it was not without cause by some of the great Bassas feared, whereunto this their so great Insolence would grow. But who should tell the Tyrant thereof; whose frown was in it self death? or who durst take in hand to cure that his sick Mind; which being brought with the sweet and poisonous potions of love, was not like to listen to any good counsel, were it never so wisely given; but as a man metamorphosed, to turn his fury upon him which should presume to wholly (but contrary to his good liking) to

to advise him. Unhappy man, whose great Estate and fierce Nature was not without danger to be modelled or tempered with, no, not by them who of all others ought in so great a peril to have been thereof most careful; but were now for fear of all become silent and dumb. Now amongst other great Men in the Court, was one Alpharasp-Bassa, a man for his good Service (for that he was of a Child brought up with him) of Mahomet greatly favoured, and by him also highly promoted; and he again by him as his Sovereign no less honoured than feared; who no less than the rest, grieved to see that great a change in the great Sultan, of whom they had conceived no small hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and moved also with the danger threatened unto him, by the discontented Janizaries and Men of War; cyping him at convenient leisure to be spoken unto, and prefiguring of the former credit he had with him, adventured thus to break with him, and to give him warning thereof.

How dangerous a thing it is for a Subject or Vassal, without leave, presumptuously to enter into the secrets of his dread Lord and Sovereign, the useful Example of others (most mighty Mahomet) have so justly warned me, as that were it not for the dutiful Loyalty I owe unto your Graciously, for delecting me then mine own life, I would not at this time adventure my self unto the hazard of your doubtful acceptance of my faithful Speech and meaning; but with others keep silence, and in secret mourn together with my heavy thoughts; which if I should in so great a danger lose of your Life and Empire now dead, without warning you thereof; I were not to be counted unworthy only those your great Favours; and Honour, most bountifully on me bestowed; but as a most vile Traitor both unto your State and Person, to be of all men detested and abhorred. The life you have of late led, ever since the taking of Constantinople, as a man careless of his Estate, and wholly wedded unto his own Pleasure, hath given occasion not unto the vulgar people only (always ready to say the worst) and Soldiers of the Court, the Guardsers of your Person, but even unto the greatest Commanders of your Armies and Empire, to murmur and grudge; I dare not say, to Conspire against you. The praise of a great Sovereign, if I should so say, for that there is no man without great distinction for merit marvellous not much to see so great an alteration in your Heroical Disposition and Nature; whereby you are become far unlike that noble Mahomet, which having overthrown the Greek Empire, and taken the great City of Constantinople, promised both unto himself and others the Conquest of Italy, and the taking of Rome, the fately Seat of the ancient Roman Emperors. You have given your self over (as they say) for a spoil and prey unto a poor simple Woman, your Slave and Vassal, who with her Beauty and Allurements hath so bewitched your Understanding and Reason, as that saying, your most pollutions and inordinate desires; which have much the more you will them, so much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your self (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead with the like time heretofore you spent in treading Honours steps, and you shall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the first ruler of your House and Family so given himself over unto Pleasure, you had not now inhabited the Countries of Bithynia and Galatia, with others more along the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his Son Orchans (the lively Image of his Father, and Follower of his Vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed over Licaonia, Phrygia, and Caria, or extended the bonds of his Empire so far as unto the Straits of Hellespontus. What should I speak of Amurath his Son, and Successor in the Empire? who in Person himself, first of the Othoman Kings, pulled down the Europeans, placed his Imperial Seat at Hadrampole, conquered Thracia, Bulgaria, and Rascia. Yea he himself your great Grandfather is in his misfortune to be more than you commended, as conquered in field by the mighty Tamerlane, for hundred thousand Horsemen, and six hundred thousand Foot, and was by a silly Woman; confounding his mishap with the Honour and Greatness of him by whom he was overcome. Neither may I with silence pass over your worthy Grandfather the Noble Mahomet, who not contented to have restored the shaking Empire, conquered also a great part of Macedonia, even to the Iconian Sea, and carrying the terror of his Arms over into Asia, did great matters against the Caramanians and others. As for your Father Amurath (of worthy Memory) I cannot but to my great grief and sorrow speak of him, who by the space of thirty years made both the Sea and Earth to quake under his Feet, and with strong hands more than once conquered the Countries of Phocis, Beotia, Etolia, with a great part of Morcia; and to speak of him truly, brake even the very heart and strength of the Grecians, and other his brave Enemies. Let all these former Conquests of your noble Progenitors, whose worthy Praises (as eternal Trophies of their Honour) are dispersed unto every corner of the World, awake you of this heavy Lethargy wherein you have been too deep, yea, let the remembrance of the Conquest of this Imperial City by you to your Immortal Glory, stir you up to greater things; and let it never be said of you, That you were able with your Sword to overcome your greatest Enemies, and not with reason to subdue your inordinate affections. Think that your greatest Conquest, and suffer not your self to be great a Conqueror, to be led in Triumph by your Slave. What advantage if you to have won Constantinople, and to have left your Self? Shake off these golden Fetters wherein the wily Greek hath so fast bound you; which at the first thought it seem unto your hard and painful, yet shall time digest it, and make you to think it both good and necessary for your State. Wean your self from your desires, and give rest unto your troubled thoughts; to which if you cannot do at once, first by little and little do it; pleasure groweth by the sedulosity thereof, and satiety bringeth back himself. Advise your self before, and again take up Arms. Your Soldiers if they be not employed abroad, will to your further trouble (as themselves) to work at home: Idleness maketh them insolent, and want of Martial Discipline corrupteth their Manners. Hered proceedeth their intemperance and dissipated Speeches. Think you will not lead them forth for the Honour and enlargement of the Othoman Empire, as did all your most noble Progenitors, they will let you see that shall, even one of your own Children. And what the common Soldiers foolishly say, their great Commanders maliciously purpose; which, what a confusion it would bring unto the whole State of your Empire, together with the danger of your Royal Person, I labour to think. Whosoever he be, that now hath time for you to shew your self, and with the Majesty of your Presence to repress their tumultuous insolency, before it break further out. Rebellions are by far, more easily prevented, than in their heat appeased. The discontented multitude is a wild Beast with many heads, which once enraged, is not a little to be feared. If you will not be turned, yet do you bid show your self Master of your own affections, and you shall easily Master them also. But what is fit for you to do, becometh me not for to say; yea, pardon me I beseech you, that I have thus much (contrary perhaps to your good liking) already said.

provoked (by what divine Inspiration I know not) even half against my will, to discover unto you the secret of my heart, and to lay open unto you those things which others knowing as well as I, do yet for fear keep the same from you. And if I have gone too far, or in any thing that I have said forgot my self, impute the same (my dread Sovereign) unto the zeal of my Love and Loyalty towards you, or unto my fidelity (so often by you tried, or to our ancient Education (the ground of your affection towards me) or to what else [shall please you, rather than to my presumption] or to your Majesty, how far I have always been, I appeal even to your Majesties own knowledge.

Having thus said, he fell down at his Feet, as there to receive his heavy doom of his so free Speech; if it should be otherwise than well taken of the angry Sultan; who all this while with great attention and many a stern look had hearkned unto all that the Bassa had said; for well he knew it to be all true; and that in so saying, he had but discharged the part of a trusty and faithful Servant, careful of his Masters Honour. And so the beauty of the Greek was still fix'd in his heart, and the pleasure he took in her, so great, as that to think of the leaving of her, bred him many a troubled thought. He was at war with himself, as in his often changed countenance well appeared; Reason calling unto him, for his Honour; and his amorous Fancy, to fill forgetting unto him all delights. Thus toll'd to and fro, till a ship with contrary winds arriv'd, and considering the danger threaten'd to his Estate, if he should longer follow those his pleasures, so much displeasing to his Men of War, he resolv'd upon a tripping point whereby at once to cut off all those his troubled passions and will to strive after a thrice even into the stoutest heart that had before continu'd so long unable to govern his own free and disaffected affections. Whereupon he resolv'd to declare his inward discontentment, he said unto the Bassa, yet prostrate at his Feet,

Altho'gh thou hast unreverently spoken, as a Slave presuming to enter into the great Secret of thy Sovereign's (not thus offering to be of thee once thought upon) and therefore deservest well to die; yet for that thou wast a Child brought up together with me, and hast ever been unto me faithful, I for this time pardon thee, and before to-morrow the Sun go down, will make it known both to thee, and others of the same opinion with thee, whether I be able to bridle mine affections or not. Take order in the mean time that all the Backsides, and the chief Commanders of my Men of War be assembled together to-morrow, that I may know thy farther pleasure; whereof sail you now.

So the Baffa being departed, he after his wonted manner went in unto the Greek, and faloing himself all that day and the night following with her, made many of her than ever before; and then more to please her, dined with her; commanding, that after dinner he should be attired with more sumptuous Apparell than ever she had before worn; and for the further giving of her, to be deckt with many most precious Jewels of inestimable value. Whereunto the poor Soul gladdly obeyed, little thinking that it was her Funeral Apparell. Now in the mean while, Adapha (altogether ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as he was commanded, caufed all the Nobility, and Commanders of the Men of War, to be assembled into the great Hall; every man much marvelling, what should be the Emperors meaning therein, who had not of long do publicly chewed himself. But being thus together assembled, and every man according as their minds gave them, talking diversely of the matter; beheld the Sultan entred into the Palace leading the fair Greek by the hand; who beside her incomparable Beauty and other the greatest graces of Nature, adorned also with all that curiosity could devise, seemed not now to the beholders a mortal Wight, but some of the lately Goddesses, whom Poets in their Extravagant conceits have made. Returned to them done all these things present; he stood still with the fair Lady in his left hand, and so furiously looking round about him, said unto me, I understand of your great discontentment, and that you all murmur and grudge, for that I, overcome with mine affection toward this so fair a Paragon, cannot withdraw my self from her presence; but I would fain know which of you is so temperate, that if he had in his possession a thing so rare and precious, so lovely and so fair, would not be thrice advised before he would forego the same? Say you unto me, Prince, I give you my answer, I will not do so. But there was such an incredible admiration to see so fair a thing, the like whereof they had never before beheld, fad all with one consent, That he had with greater reason so passed the time with her, than any man had to find fault therewith; whereunto the barbarous Prince answered, Well, but now I will make you to understand how far you have been deceived in me, and that there is no earthly thing that can so much blind my senses, or deceive me of reason, as not to see and feel that I should bequeath my high Place and Calling, as you would have me do, to a woman, who is so fair, and so lovely, so should all know, that she is the fairest Conquest of the world. And then he, with noble Progenitors, is so fazed with the Beauty, with such a desire in my self to exceed the same, that nothing but death is able to put it out of my remembrance. And having so said, presently with one of his hands catching the fair Greek by the hair of her head, and drawing his Falchion with the other, at one blow thruck off her head, to the great terror of them all; and having so done, said unto them; Now by this judge whether your Emperor is able to bear such afflictions or not. And when he had thus said, proceeded to discharge the rest of his choler, caused give passage to be made for the Conquest of the Princess, and the beheading of Belgrade.

And as it commonly falleth out, That one evil hapneth not alone; so at the same time it appeared, that the Albanians life in Arms against the said two Princes their Sovereigns; and under the leading of their Rebellious Captain Emanuel Catecuzescu, grievously troubled both the poor Princes. These Albanians were a rough and hardy kind of people, which living after the manner of the rude Scythian Herdsmen, by feeding of Cattel, had of long time placed themselves in Peloponnesus; differing from the natives, both in their manner of living, and Language. This diversity was no small cause that their offences were poured, as now, against the Government of the Grecian Princes. In this extremity, the two distressed Princes (not well knowing which way to turn themselves) sought for Peace at Mahomet hands, offering to become his Tributaries. Of which their Offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full Conquest of that Country; and sent Turachan Governor of Theffalia, one of his greatest Men of War, with an Army into Peloponnesus, to subdue those Princes against whom he was sent. And those Princes who were in short time discomfited, and the Country of Peloponnesus quieted; yet so, that it was now become Tributary to the Turkish King.

These two Princes Demetrius and Thomas, the last of all the Christian Princes that reigned in Peloponessus, having thus lost their Liberty, lived for a few years as the Turks Vassals; paying such yearly Tribute as they had before promised. During which time many Displeasures arose betwixt the two Brothers, being both jealous of their Estate, and desirous to be the most plausible means to win the hearts of their Subjects one from another; whereby it came so to pass, that whilst they both desired to become popular, they weakened their own Credit, and had not their Subjects at such command as belt flood with the safety of their Estate. Nevertheless, as soon as they understood that the Christian Princes of the West were making great preparation against the Turk; and that the Bishop of Rome had already put a Fleet of Gallies to Sea, which did great spoil upon the Borders of the Turks Dominions, they vainly perfwading themselves that the Turks would in short time be again driven out of Greece.

a Fleet of Gallees to the Turkish Kingdoms, they vainly perfwading themselves that the Turks would have in short time to be again driven out of Grecia, refused to pay any more Tribute to the Turkish King, or to keep League any longer with him. Upon which occasion, Mahomet with a puissant Army came down and first beleagged Cornith, and afterwards entering into Peloponnesus, took divers strong Towns, and destroyed the Country before him; and forced the two Princes to be aſſeſſors of their Oves to fly, the one to Mantinea, now called Ragium. The poor Princes destitute of such Aid as they expected, and altogether unable to withstand the Power of the mighty Tyrant, began again to sue for Peace; which he, having now spoiled their Country, granted upon condition, That all such places as he had already taken, should be still his own; and also that the City of Patras with the Country adjoining, should be delivered unto him; and also for the rest, the fairest conditions that he could demand, which hard conditions the poor Princes, now in danger to lose all, were glad to accept of; whereupon a Peace was for that time again concluded.

In his return he took the City of Athens in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciajol by Composition (by means of Omares the Son of Turachan, one of his great their Neighbours, forthwith yielded themselves; and amongst others, Salunarium, a great and strong City of Acadia; where he caused all the Inhabitants, Men, Women, and Children, to the number of ten thousand to be cast into bonds, looking for nothing but present death; all which afterwards he commanded to be sent Captives to Constantinople, and with them peopled the Suburbs of that City. After that, he by the counsel of Demetrius, sent one of his Captains called Jofus, with certain Companies of Greek Soldiers, unto the strong City of Epidaurum, to command them in the Name of the Prince, and deliver unto him the City, with the Prince his Wife and Daughter, which lay there. But the Governor trusting unto the strength of the City, refused to deliver the same; yet suffered the Princess with her Daughter to depart out of the City, being willing to go to her Husband, whom the Captain having received, returned, and presented them to Mahomet. By whose Commandment they were presently sent into Boetia, there to attend his return to Constantinople, and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the young Lady, who had so warmed Mahomet's affection, that he took her afterwards to his Wife. At the same time he also subdued the most part of Achaia and Elis, by Zogus Bassa his Lieutenant; whither he came not long after himself, and laid Siege to the City of Salmenica, which for lack of Water he held most notably unto him; but the Castle was by the space of a whole year after valiantly defended against the Turks left to besiege it, by Thomas the Prince; of whom Mahomet afterwards gave this commendation, That in the Country of Peoponissus he had found many Slaves, but never a Man but him. This valiant Prince seeing the miserable ruin of his Country, and the State thereof utterly ruined, after he had most notably endured a years Siege in the Castle of Salmenica, got to Sea, and so arrived in Italy; where traveling to Rome, he was honourably received by Pius Secundus, then Bishop there; who during his life, allowed him a large Pension for the maintenance of his State. Thus Mahomet having thrust both the Grecian Princes out of their Dominions, and subdued all the Cities, excepting such strong Towns and Castles, as bordering upon the Sea coast were yet holden by the Venetians, left Zogus Bassa his Lieutenant to Govern that new conquered Province, and with great Triumph returned himself towards Constantinople, carrying away with him Demetrius the Prince, with his Wife and Daughter, and many other Noble Prisoners. But after he was come to Hadrinople, and placed in his Royal Seat, he removed the Eunuch from the fair young Lady, and took charge of her himself. As for Demetrius her Father, he gave to him the City of Æzum, with the Custom arising of the Salt there made, as a Pension for him to live upon. Thus this most famous and populous Country of Peoponissus fell into the Turkish Thraldom, about the year of our Lord, 1460. seven years after the taking of Constantinople. Which I have here together set down, as it is reported by them who lived in that time, and in the same Countries; omitting of purpose other great Occurrences of the same time (which shall in convenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great Empire, with the common misery of the delicate Grecians, might appear under one View, which otherwise being delivered by piecemeal, as it did concur with other great accidents according to the course of the time, would but breed confusion, and require the Readers great attention.

The Christian Princes, especially such as bordered upon the Dominions of the Turkish Tyrants, were no less terrified than troubled with the subversion of the Constantinopolitan Empire; for they saw by the continual preparation of the Turk, that his ambitious Desires were rather increased than in any part satisfied with so great and late Victories. Wherefore they with all carefulness fortified their frontier Towns, and provided all things necessary for the defence of themselves, and for the repelling of so mighty an Enemy. Among the rest, George the old Despot, or Prince of Servia (whose Dominions of all other lay most in danger of that Tempest) speedily mustered his Men of War, fortified his strong Cities, placed his Garrisons, and left nothing undone that he thought needful for the defence of the Country; for he had many times before to his great loss, endured the fury of the Turkish Kings, although he were joynted to them in the bonds of nearest Alliance. And having thus politically set all things in order at home, in Person himself took his Journey into Hungary, from thence to procure Aid against such time as he should have need. But the Hungarians, and especially Huniades (who at that time bare greatest sway in that Kingdom) having before had sufficient trial of the uncertainty and light Faith of that aged Prince, who had so often falsified himself according to the occurrences of the time, that he was counted neither right Turk nor good Christian; refused to promise him any Aid, but left him to his own Fortunes; wherewith he returned discontented, and full of Indignation. But shortly after he was come home, he died of a hurt received in a Skirmish with Michael Zilago, Governor of Belgrade; whose Brother Lazarus of utterly unknown after he had most notably endured a years Siege in the Castle of Salmenica, got to Sea, and so arrived in Italy; where traveling to Rome, he was honourably received by Pius Secundus, then Bishop there; who during his life, allowed him a large Pension for the maintenance of his State. Thus Mahomet having thrust both the Grecian Princes out of their Dominions, and subdued all the Cities, excepting such strong Towns and Castles, as bordering upon the Sea coast were yet holden by the Venetians, left Zogus Bassa his Lieutenant to Govern that new conquered Province, and with great Triumph returned himself towards Constantinople, carrying away with him Demetrius the Prince, with his Wife and Daughter, and many other Noble Prisoners. which means the with much trouble, held her State for a season. Until such time as the Servians, feeling small assurance in that manner of Government, and weary of the harms they daily received of the Turks, yielded themselves with their Country, unto the Possession of the Turkish Emperor Mahomet, who for ever united the same unto his Empire as a Province thereof, and so it remained at this day.

Now was Mahomet by the continual course of his Victories grown to that height of mind, that he thought no Prince able to abide his Force; neither any Enterprize so great, which he was not of Power to bring to pass; wherefore he ceased not on every side continually to vex and trouble the Princes, whose Countries bordered upon his. But above others, his heart was greatest against the Hungarians; for that by them the Turkish Kings his Ancestors, had been more troubled, and their State more endangered, than by any or all other the Christian Princes. Wherefore he resolved now to take them in hand; which thing he had from the beginning of his Reign greatly desired. And because the City of Belgrade standing upon the great River of Danubius, was accounted the Key of that Country, he determined there to begin his Wars, and by taking thereof to make an entrance into the heart of Hungary. Hereupon he levied a great Army of an hundred and fifty thousand of his best Soldiers, in whom he reposed such an assured trust and confidence, that he accounted the City already as good as taken, and a fair way made into Hungary, for as they were to pass into our selves, the things we earnestly desire. For the better accomplishment of these his Designs, he had provided in readiness a Fleet of 200 Ships and Gallies, which he sent up the River of Danubius from Vidua to Belgrade, to the intent that no Relief or Aid should be brought unto the City out of Hungary, by the great Rivers of Danubius and Savus, whereupon the City of Belgrade standeth. With this Fleet he kept both those Rivers so strictly, that nothing could be possibly conveyed into the City by water; and not so contented, sent part of his said Fleet farther up the River of Danubius, and so landing his Soldiers in many places, spoiled the Countries all along the River side. Shortly after he came with all his Forces by Land, and encamped before the City; whereunto at his first coming he gave a most furious Assault, thinking to have taken the same unprovided; but finding greater resistance than he had before imagined, and that the Hungarians were ready to Skirmish with them without the Walls, he began to proceed more warily, and entrenched his Army; and to provide for the safety thereof, by casting up deep Trenches and strong Rampiers against the sudden Salies of his Enemies; and after, planting his Battery, began most furiously to shake the Walls with his great Artillery. By the fury whereof, he overthrew a part thereof, and laid it flat with the ground; which the Defendants with great industry and labour speedily repaired, by casting up of new Fortifications and Rampiers, in such sort, that it was rather stronger than before.

In the mean time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a most worthy Captain) being then General for the Hungarians, sent a Fleet of Ships and Gallies, well appointed with all War-like Provision, down the River of Danubius from Buda; which encountering with the Turkish Fleet, took twenty Sail of them, and so discomfited the rest, that they were glad to run themselves on ground near unto the Kings Camp. All which were by Mahomet's Commandment presently fired by Fire, because they should not come into the Power of the Hungarians. By this means the Christians became Malters both of the Rivers of Danubius and Savus; and so at their pleasure, by water conveyed into the City all things needful for the defence thereof. Huniades also himself, with five thousand valiant Soldiers, and Tu Capistrano, a Minorite Friar (by whose persuasion forty thousand voluntary Christians out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, were come to that War) entered into the City that way with their Soldiers and Followers.

Mahomet resolutely set down for the winning of the City, had with continual Battery made the same at length affailable; and so determined the next day to give a general Assault, appointing which part of his Army every Colonel with his Regiment should assail. But as they were with great diligence and greater fire, preparing all things needful for the next days Service, it fortuned, that Carazias Bassa, Mahomet's Lieutenant-General in Europe, and his best Man of War, was by chance slain with a great shot out of the Town. With whose death Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the evil which afterwards ensued upon him and his whole Army. For all that, prosecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning he commanded the Assault to be given; and with the dreadful found of Trumpets, Drums, Cornets, and other Instruments of War, brought on his Janizaries to the Breach; who as courageous Soldiers fiercely assailed the same, and without any great resistance, entered both there and in divers other places of the City, reckoning the same to be now their own. For Huniades having before stored every corner of the City with his most valiant and expert Soldiers, had taken order that the Defendants, upon the first charge of the Janizaries, should forsake their stations, and as men discouraged, retire towards the City, of purpose to draw the fierce Enemies faster on, to their farther destruction; and upon a sign given to see them upon them fresh, and to repair to their former places of defence; which was accordingly done; so that as soon as the Janizaries, with other of the Turks most forward Soldiers, were in great numbers entered, upon the retiring of the Defendants, and the sign before appointed in the City given, the Defendants, as men quickly changed, turning again, fiercely charged the Turks which were entered, contrary to their expectation; and the taken the same time issuing out on the valiant Huniades, and his most resolute Soldiers, who oppressed the Turks, that few of them that were entered escaped with life, but were there in the City either slain or taken Prisoners; and the rest with exceeding slaughter beaten from the Walls. Presently after, in this confusion of the Turks, strengthened with the Soldiers which came with Capistrano the Friar, made a Sally out of the Town, and with the Turks appointed for the defence of the great Ordinance, which was with such resolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great slaughter to forsake their charge, and to leave the Ordinance to their Enemies.

The Turkish Tyrant fore troubled and thoroughly chafed with the loss of his great Ordinance, courageously charged the Hungarians afresh, to have recovered the same again; but was so valiantly repulsed by Huniades, and so beaten with the murdering hot out of the City, that he was glad when he had got him out the danger thereof into the Trenches. Huniades also retiring turned the Ordinance he had lately won, upon the Turks Camp, and with the same did them no small harm.

The Turks repulsed by the Turks.

In this huro, a great part of the Christian Army (which then lay on the other side of Danubius) was speedily transported over the River; and making no stay in the City, joined themselves with Hunades, then lying without the Walls of the City. Who nobly strengthened with this new Supply, assailed the Turks Trenches, as if he would even presently have entered their Camp; at which his preumption, the proud Tyrant (never before so braved) disdainful, went out of his Trenches, and valiantly encountering him, beat him back again to the great Ordinance; from whence he was again by the Christians driven to his Trenches. Which manner of doubtful and dreadful fight, was on both sides notably maintained, until the day was almost spent: Victory with indifferent Wings, hovering now over the one side, now over the other.

In this hot Skirmishes and Conflicts, Chafanes Captain of the Janizaries, with many other valiant men were slain. And Mahomet himself performing the part as well of a courageous Soldier, as of a worthy Christian, was fore wounded under his left Pap; so that he was taken up for dead, and carried into his Pavilion, to the great discomfiture of his whole Army. But coming again unto himself, and considering that he had in that Siege lost his whole Fleet, his great Ordinance, with most part of his best Souldiers, and yet in no possibility of the Town; secretly in the night arose with his Army, and with great silence shamefully departed; still looking behind him when the Hungarians should have pursued him into Servie, or have troubled him upon his way towards Constantinople. At this Siege (beside many of his best Captains and chief Commanders) were slain forty thousand of his best Souldiers. The loss that he there sustained was so great, and so stuck in his mind, that ever after during his life, when he had occasion to speak of that Siege, he would shake his head and sigh deeply, and many times with, that he had never seen that City, whereat both he and his Father had received so great dishonour. Many were of opinion, that if Hunades had there had his Horsemen on that side of Danubius to have presently pursued the fearful Enemy, that the whole Army of the Turks might have there been overthrown. This notable Victory was obtained against the Turk the sixth of August, in the year of our Lord, 1456.

Shortly after, this most valiant and renowned Captain Hunades, worthy of Immortal Praise, died of a hurt taken in these Wars; or as some others write, of the Plague, which was then rife in Hungary; who when he felt himself in danger of death, desired to receive the Sacrament before his departure, and would in any case (sick as he was) be carried to the Church to receive the same; saying, That it is not fit, that the Lord should come to the house of his Servant, but the Servant rather to go to the House of his Lord and Master. It was the first Christian Captain that showed the Turks were to be overcome; and obtained more great Victories against them than any one of the Christian Princes before him. He was unto that barbarous people a great terror, and with the spoil of them beautified his Country; and now dying, was by the Hungarians honourably buried at Alba Julia, in St. Stephens Church; his death being greatly lamented of all good men of that Age.

Mahomet the Turkish Emperor, no less desirous to extend his Empire with the glory of his Name, by Sea than by Land; shortly after the taking of Constantinople, put a great Fleet to Sea, wherein he furnished divers Islands in the Ægean, and hardly besieged the City of the Rhodes. At which time, Calixtus the Third, then Bishop of Rome, aided by the Genovians for the grudge they bore against the Turks for the taking of Pera put to Sea a Fleet of sixteen tall Ships and Gallies well appointed, under the Conduct of Ludovicus, Patriarch of Aquila; who with that Fleet scoured the Seas, and recovered again from the Turks the Island of Lemnos, with divers other small Islands thereabout; and encountering with the Turks Fleet near unto the Island of the Rhodes, at a place called Tris Bureau of St. Paul, discomfited them, sunk and took divers of their Gallies, and forced them to forsake the Rhodes. After which Victory at Sea, he for the space of three years, with his Gallies, at his pleasure spoiled the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions all along the Sea coast of the lesser Asia, and wonderfully terrified the effeminate people of those Countries; and so at length returned home, carrying away with him many Prisoners and much rich spoil.

After that Mahomet was thus shamefully driven from the Siege of Belgrade, and his Fleet at Sea discomfited (as is before declared) he began with great diligence to make new preparation against the next Spring to subdue the Isles of the Ægean, specially those which lay near unto Thrace. But whilst he was busy in those Cogitations, in the mean time Embassadors from Ufian-Caffians the great Persian King, arrived at Constantinople, with divers rich Presents from him from the said King. Where among other things, they presented unto him a pair of Playing-Tables, wherein the men and dice were of great and rich precious Stones of infinite worth, and the Workmanship nothing inferior to the matter; which the Embassadors for Offentation said, That Ufian-Caffians found in the Treasures of the Persian King, whom he had but a little before slain and bereft of his Kingdom, and had there been left long before by the mighty Conqueror Tamerlane. Together with these Presents, they delivered their Embassy; the effect whereof was, That those two mighty Princes might joy and live together in Amity; and that where David the Emperor of Trapezond, had promised to pay unto Mahomet a yearly Tribute, enforced thereunto by George his Lieutenant in Asia, he should not now look for any such thing; forasmuch as that Empire after the death of the Emperor, the living should of right belong unto Ufian-Caffians, in right of his Wife, who was the Daughter of Calfojanet, the elder Brother of David the Emperor, then living; and further required him, from that time not to trouble or molest the said Emperor his Friend and near Alliance, so should he find him his faithful and kind Confederate; otherwise it was (as they said) in his choice to draw upon himself the heavy displeasure of a most mighty Enemy. Mahomet before envying at the rising of the Persian King, and now disdainful such peremptory Requests, little differing from proud Commands, in great choler discomfited the Embassadors, with this short answer, That he would ere long be in Asia himself in Person, to reach Ufian-Caffians what to request of a greater than himself. This unkindness was the beginning and ground of the mortal Wars which afterwards ensued betwixt these two, then the greatest Princes of the East, as shall be hereafter more at large declared. The Embassadors being departed, and Mahomet's Fleet of an hundred and fifty Sail ready to put to Sea, he altered his former determination for the Islands of the Ægean (which after the loss of Constantinople had for the most part put themselves under the Protection of the Venetians) and commanded his Admiral with that Fleet to take his course through the Straits of Bosphorus into the great Euxin Sea, (now called the Black Sea) and to failing along the coast to come to Anchor before Sinope, the chief City of Paphlagonia; and there to expect his coming thither with his Army upon a point of the Main which runs a great way into the Euxin, sometime the Metropolitane City of that Province; but as then, with Caffamona and all the Country thereabout, was under the Government of Ismail, a Mahometan Prince; upon whom Mahomet had now bent his Forces, for no other cause than that he was in League with Ufian-Caffians, the Persian King. Now with great Expedition had Mahomet levied a strong Army; and passing therewith over into Asia, was come before he was looked for, to Sinope. Ismail seeing himself so suddenly beset both by Sea and Land in his strongest City, although he wanted nothing needful for his defence, having in the City four hundred pieces of great Artillery, and ten thousand Souldiers; yet doubting to be able with that strength to endure the Siege, offered to yield up the City to Mahomet, with all the rest of his Dominion, upon condition, That he should freely give him in return thereof the City of Philippopolis in Thracia, with the Country thereto adjoining. Of which Offer Mahomet accepted; and so taking possession of Sinope, with the strong City of Caffamona, and all the rest of the Princes Territory, sent him away with all his things to Philippopolis, as he had promised. This Ismail was the last of the Honourable House of the Ispahdars, who had long time reigned at Heraclea and Caffamona in Pontus. From Sinope he marched on forward with his Army to Trapezond. This famous City standeth also upon the side of the Euxin or Black Sea in the Country of Pontus, where the Emperors of Constantinople had always their Deputies, whilst that Empire flourished and commanded the East part of the World, as far as Partia; but after it began again to decline (as all worldly things have but their time) once Iscax (whose Father, Emperor of Constantinople, the Constantinopolitans had for his civil Government slain) flying to Trapezond, took upon him the Government of that City, with the Countries of Pontus and Capadocia, and many other great Provinces, and was at first called the King of Trapezond; but after he was well established in that Government, both he and his Successors took upon them the Name and Title of Emperors; which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Constantinopolitane Emperors, and therefore are of most account for Emperors. He that then reigned, was called David Comnenus; which most Honourable Family of the Comneni had long time before reigned in Constantinople; and out of the same were many other great Princes descended, which ruled in divers places of Macedonia, Epirus, and Græcia. Mahomet coming to Trapezond, laid hard Siege unto the same by the space of thirty days both by Sea and Land, and burnt the Suburbs thereof, as he had before at Sinope. The fearful Emperor dismayed with the presence of so mighty an Enemy, and the sight of so puissant an Army, offered to yield unto him the City with his whole Empire, upon condition, That he should take his Daughter to Wife, and deliver unto him some other Province, which might yield him such yearly profit as might suffice for the honourable Maintenance of his State. Mahomet perceiving the weakness of his Enemy by his large Offers, refused to accept thereof, and tempted by force to have taken the City, which not forgoing to his desire, the matter was again brought to parls; where after long debating to and fro, it was at last agreed upon, That the Emperor upon the Faith of the Turkish King for his safe return, should in Person meet him without the City, if happily to some good Attainment might be made betwixt them. Whereupon the Emperor following the Turks Faith before solemnly given for his safe return, as was before agreed, went out of the City to meet him, in hope to have made some good agreement with him; but as soon as he was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable and Hellish Doctrine of his false Prophet (That Faith is not to be kept with Christians) presently caused the Emperor to be cast into bonds, and so to be detained as Prisoner. Which when it was bruited in the City, the Citizens utterly discouraged, without further resistance yielded themselves with the City into his Power.

Mahomet now Lord of Trapezond, entering the City, took Prisoners the Emperors Daughter, with all the rest of his Children and Kindred, and all such of the Nobility as he found in the City; whom he caused forthwith, together with the Emperor, to be sent by Sea as it were in Triumph to Constantinople. Of the rest of the Citizens he chose out so many as he pleased for his own Service, and appointed eight hundred of the Christian Children, in whom appeared most towardsness, to be brought up for Janizaries, many also of the other Citizens were sent into Captivity to Constantinople; the beautiful Women and Virgins he divided amongst his Friends and Men of War, certain chosen Paragons of whom, he sent as Presents to his Sons. After he had thus taken his pleasure in the City, and left no more there but the basest of the people, he put a strong Garrison of his Janizaries into the Castle, and a great Garrison of common Souldiers into the City, appointing his Admiral to Govern the same. The rest of the Emperors strong Towns, discouraged with the taking of Trapezond, and the miseries thereof, in short time submitted themselves unto the Turkish Thraldom, wherein they have ever since most miserably lived. So Mahomet in the space of few months having reduced that Empire into the form of a Province, returned in great Triumph to Constantinople; when he had in this Expedition subdued Paphlagonia, Pontus, and a great part of Capadocia, with some other Provinces near unto the Euxin Sea. When he was come to Constantinople, he sent the Emperor with his Children Prisoners to Hadrinople. But afterwards, understanding that the Persian Queen, the Wife of Ufian-Caffians, sought means to get some one of her Uncles Children, whom by the Power of her Husband she might, if it were possible, advance unto her Fathers Empire; he sent for David the woful Emperors of Constantinople, and there cruelly caused him, with all his Sons and Kinsmen, to be put to death; and to the uttermost of his Power rooted out all that most honourable Family of the Comneni, excepting George the Emperors youngest Son, who at his first coming to Hadrinople turned Turk; whose Sister (the Emperors Daughter) Mahomet afterwards took to be one of his Concubines. This Christian Empire was by the Turkish Tyrant Mahomet thus miserably subverted and brought to nought in the year of our Lord, 1461.

The year following, which was the year, 1462, Mahomet having Intelligence, that Wladis Dracula Prince of Valachia, his Tributary, was resolved to cast from him his Obedience, and to join himself unto the Hungarians, his mortal Enemies; thought it best to prove if he could by policy circumvent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpose he sent Carabissus his Principal

Principal Secretary unto him to bring him unto the Court, promising him greater Favours and Promotions from the Emperor, than he had as yet at any time enjoyed. And by the same trusty Messenger, he commanded Chamuzes Bassa, Governor of Bidina, and the Country lying over against Valachia, on the other side of Danubius, to do their utmost devoir for the entrapping of Wladis; promising him great Rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Whereupon Chamuzes deviled with the Secretary, that when he had done his Message to the Prince, and with all his cunning persuaded him to take that Journey upon him, he should secretly before hand give notice unto him of the certain day of his return back again from the Prince; at which time it was like, that Wladis would in courtesy of himself bring the Secretary well on his way, being a man of so great Account in the Court, or at leastwise not refuse to do, being thereto requested by the Secretary; at which time the Bassa secretly passing over Danubius with certain Troops of Horsemen, and lying close in ambush upon the way, should suddenly for upon the Prince, and so either take him, or else kill him. The Plot thus laid, and every circumstance agreed upon, the Secretary held on his way; and coming to the Prince, forced his wit to persuade him to go to the Court; sometime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his Fidelity and Valour; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of greater Honours and Princely Preferments he was to receive at the Emperors hands. But when he had said what he could to obtain his way, and so weary Prince, but good words again, and that he would in courtesy conduct him on his way to the side of Danubius; whereof the Secretary by speedy Messengers gave Chamuzes Intelligence; who secretly passing over Danubius with certain Troops of Horsemen, and riding a good way into the Country, lay in ambush upon the way whereby the Prince and the Secretary must needs pass; according as was before appointed, the Secretary accompanied with the Prince, put himself upon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambush with his Horsemen; who suddenly arising, and on every side assailing the Prince, slew divers of his men before they were well aware of his coming. But Wladis being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Bassa had supposed (for he went always attended upon with a strong Guard of valiant and stout men) so received Chamuzes and his Turks, that he slew many of them, and at length after a hard Conflict took him with the rest Prisoners; whose Hands and Feet he caused to be cut off, and their Bodies afterwards to be thrust upon sharp Stakes for list in the ground, to the terror of all that saw them; and did the Bassa too much honour, as to hang him upon the Secretary upon a Gibbet a great deal higher than the other Turks. And not satisfied with this Revenge, presently gathered his Forces, and passing over Danubius into the Turks Dominions, burnt all the Country before him along the Sea side, killing Man, Woman, and Child, without mercy; after which great spoil and slaughter made, he returned again to Valachia. The report of this News being brought to Mahomet, for him in such a shock and rage, that he commanded the great Bassa Mahomet, which first told him thereof, to be cruelly whipt; which terrible punishment in that Tyrannical Government hath usually been inflicted even upon the greatest Princes of the Court, upon the least displeasure of the Tyrants, especially if they be not natural Turks born; accounting the rest in their anger but as their base and contemptible Slaves, as well appeareth by the woful end of many, even of the greatest of them. But when he understood by more true advertisements that all was as the Bassa had before reported, or rather worse, it is not to be in words expressed into what a rage he fell; the spoil of his Country grieved him much, but the shameful death of the Secretary his Embassador, and of Chamuzes the Bassa, tormented his heart, and filled him with Indignation and desire of Revenge. Wherefore with all speed possible he assembled his Souldiers and Men of War; out of all parts of his Dominions to Philippopolis; and had in short time raised such an Army, as the like he had not at any time employed in the winning of Constantinople. At the same time also, he sent his Admiral with 25 Gallies, and 150 sail of other small Vessels by the Euxine, to enter the River Danubius, and there landing his Men, to join his Forces with the Prince of Podolia; who for a grudge he bare against Wladis, had promised to Aid the Turk against him. When all things were now in readiness, he marched with his Army from Philippopolis, and passing over Danubius, entered into Valachia before which time, the Admiral had landed his Men, and with the help of the Podolian, had burnt the City of Ferula, the greatest Town of Trade in all Valachia; and was besieging Cebium, called in ancient time Lycostomus; where after they had lien a while and received some loss, they left the Siege and departed, the Podolian back again into his Country, and the Admiral to his Fleet.

Mahomet being got over Danubius, burnt the Villages, drove away the Cattel, and made havoc of all that came in his way: As for Prisoners, he took but few; for the Valachies before his coming, had retired their Wives and Children, and all that were unfit for Wars, either into their strong Cities, or into the Refuge of great and thick Woods (whereof there is in that country plenty) or else into the high and rough Mountains where they were in more safety than in any of their strongest Holds; and all such as were able to bear Arms, followed the Prince, who ever kept the Woods and Mountains, still following the Turks Army so near as he possibly could with safety; and many times cut off such as straggled any thing far abroad from the Army, into the Country; yet never durst they himself in plain Field, being indeed but a handful, in comparison of the Turks multitude. Mahomet to small purpose roaming up and down the Country at his pleasure, laid never long in one place; and making no reckoning of such a weak Enemy as durst never show himself, pitch his Tents still in the open Plains, and so lay with his Army in great security, not entrenched at all. Wladis by his Espials understanding of this the manner of *Mahomet*s encamping, came in the dead time of the night, and with all his power furiously assailed that quarter of the Turks Camp where the Asian Souldiers lay, and slew many of them in their Tents; the rest terrified with the suddenness of the Alarm, fled out of their Tents for Refuge unto the European Souldiers; the Prince following them at the heels, and entering into that quarter of the Camp also, did there great harm; and from such a general terror and fear into all the Turks Army, that they were even upon the point to have wholly forsaken their Tents, and broken themselves to flight. Yea, Mahomet himself, dismayed with the terror of the night and tumult of his Camp, and fearing lest the Hungarians had joyntly their Forces with the Prince, not knowing which way to turn himself, had undoubtedly fled, had not

Mahomet Bassa, a man of great experience in Martial Affairs, persuaded him otherwise, and by general Proclamation made through the Camp, That no man should upon pain of death, forsake the place wherein he was encamped, staid the night; and with much ado enforced them to make head against the Prince. Wladis perceiving the Turks now to begin to stand upon their guard, and to make resistance; after great slaughter made, returning took the spoil of the Tents forsaken by the Asian Souldiers, and upon the approach of the day again retired with Victory into the Woods. As soon as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certain Companies of select Souldiers, to pursue the Valachies; who overtaking part of the Princes Army, took a thousand of them Prisoners, and put the rest to flight; so that which Prisoners were by the Tyrants Command, presently put to the Sword. From that time Mahomet every night entrenched his Army, and caused better Watch and Ward to be kept in every quarter of his Camp, than before.

As he marched along the Country, he came to the place where the Bassa and the Secretary were hanging upon two high Gibbets, and the dismayed Turks impaled upon Stakes about themselves which sight he was grievously offended. And passing on farther, came to a Plain containing in breadth almost a mile, and in length two miles, full of Gallows, Gibbets, Wheels, Stakes, and other Instruments of Terror, Death, and Torture; all hanging full of the dead Carcasses of Men, Women, and Children, thereupon executed in number (as was deemed) about twenty thousand. There was to be seen the Father with his Wife, Children, and whole Family, hanging together upon one Gallows; and the Bodies of sucking Babes, sticking upon sharp Stakes; others withall their Limbs broken upon Wheels, with many other strange and horrible kinds of death; so that a man would have thought that all the Torments the Poets feign to be in Hell had been there put in execution. All these were such as the notable, but cruel Prince, jealous of his Estate, had either for just desert, or some probable suspicion, put to death; and with their Goods rewarded his Souldiers; whose cruel manner was, together with the Offender to execute the whole Family, yea sometimes the whole Kindred. Mahomet, although he was by Nature of a fierce and cruel Disposition, wondered to see so strange a Spectacle of extremity; yea for no more but that Wladis knew how to have his Subjects at Command. After that, Mahomet sent Jeyghus, one of his great Captains, to skirmish with the Valachies; who was by them put to the worse; but by the coming in of Omars the Son of Turacban, they were again in a great Skirmish overthrown, and two thousand of their heads brought by the Turks upon their Lances into the Kings Camp; for which good Service Omars was by the King preferred to be Governor of Thessalia.

When Mahomet had thus traced Valachia, and having done what harm he could, saw it to be to no purpose, with such a multitude of men to hunt after his flying Enemy, which still kept the thick Woods or rough Mountains; he returned again to Constantinople, leaving behind him Haly-Beg with part of his Army, to prosecute that War; and with him Dracula the younger Brother of Wladis, who was also called Wladis, as a Stale to draw the Valachies into Rebellion against the Prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little Youth brought up in Mahomet Court, and for his comely Feature of him most passionately affected; which inordinate pertu-bation, so prevailed in the intemperate Nature of the lascivious Prince, that he fought first by fair words and great Gifts to corrupt the Youth, and not so prevailing, attempted at last to have forced him; wherewith the Noble Youth being enraged, drew his Rapier, and striking at him to have slain him, grievously wounded him in the Thigh, and thereupon fled. Nevertheless being drawn back again to the Court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the King, and so became his Ganimede; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloved and honoured, and now fit up for a Stale (as is before said) for the Valachies his Country-men to gaze upon.

Fortuned, that after the departure of the King, divers Valachies came to Haly-Beg the Turkish General, to Ranfome such Friends of theirs as had been taken Prisoners in that War, and were yet by him detained; to whom the younger Dracula by way of dis-course declaring the great Power of the Turkish Emperor, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endless Miseries of his Native Country; cunningly imputed the same unto the disordered Government of his cruel Brother, as the ground of all their Woes; assuring them of most happy and speedy Redress, if the Valachies, forsaking his fierce Brother, would leave unto him as their Sovereign, in special Favour with the great Emperor. Which Speech he delivered unto them with such lively Reasons, and in such effectual Terms, that they there present, persuaded by him, and others by them, in that time all, as if he had been by a secret consent, forsook Wladis the elder Brother, and chose Dracula the younger Brother to be their Prince and Sovereign. Who joining unto him the Turks Forces, by the consent of Mahomet took upon him the Government of that War-like Country and People; yet holding the flame as the Turkish Tyrants Vassal, the readiest way to Infidelity. Wladis seeing himself thus forsaken of all his Subjects, and his younger Brother possessed of his Dominion, fled into Transylvania, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian King, apprehended and laid fast in strict prison at Belgrade, for that he had with-out just cause (as it was laid to his charge) most cruelly executed divers Hungarians in Valachia; yet such was his fortune, after ten years hard imprisonment, to be again enlarged, and honourably to die in battle against his ancient Enemies the Turks.

Mahomet returning out of Valachia to Constantinople, sent the same Fleet which he had used in his late Wars, into the Aegean, to take in such Islands as being before under the Constantinopolitan Empire, had upon the loss of the City put themselves under the Protection of the Venetians; but especially the Isle of Mitylene, called in ancient times Lesbos; pretending that they were anciently his; and that Dracula the younger Nicholaus Catalagus Prince thereof, did harbour the Pirates of Italy, and other places; and also bought of them such Prisoners, and other Booty, as they continually took from the Turks at Sea, or along the Sea coast, out of many places of his Dominions; pretending also the chastising of the said Prince, for that he had by treachery slain his eldest Brother, and so unjustly taken upon him the Government. His Fleet thus far forward, he himself with a small Army passed over into Asia, and came by land to Effidium a City of Ionia over against Mitylene. From whence he embarked himself over the narrow Strait into the Island, where after he had once landed his Army, he in short time overran the whole Island, and miserably spoiled the fame, leading away all the Inhabitants thereof into Captivity; who shortly after were fold at Confiantinople like Flocks of Sheep, and from thence dispersed into all parts of his Dominions. After he had thus harried the Country, and left nothing therein unspoiled, he bestowed the Prince in the City of Mitylene, whereof the Island now taketh Name; and with his great Ordnance continually battered the fame by the Space of 27 days (in which time many sharp Assaults were also given by the Turks, whereby the Defendants were greatly diminished and wasted. The Prince perceiving himself not able long to hold out, offered to yield up the City, with all the strong Holds in the Isle, upon condition that Mahomet should therefore give unto him some other Province, or like value to the Island; which his Offer Mahomet accepted, and himself Oath bound himself for performance of that he had promised. Whereupon the Prince came out of the City, and humbled himself before him, excusing himself for the receiving of the Men of War (wherein he was charged) as done for no other purpose, but that they should forbear to spoil his own Country, much subject to their fury; utterly denying that he had at any time bought, or shared any part of such Prizes as had by those Pirates by Sea or Land been taken from the Turks. With which his excuse, Mahomet seemed to be reasonably well contented, and with good words cheered him up; nevertheless as soon as the City, with all the other strong Holds in the Isle, were by the Princes means delivered into his hands, he no longer made reckoning of the chief Citizens of the City, but cruelly caused many of the chief Citizens of the City to be put to death; and three hundred Pirates, whom he found in the City, to be cut in two pieces in the middle, so to die with more pain. And when he had placed convenient Garrisons in every strong Hold in the Isle, he returned to Confiantinople, carrying away with him the Prince, and all the better fort of the Inhabitants of Mitylene, that were left alive, together with all the Wealth of that most rich and pleasant Island, leaving it almost desolate, none remaining therein more than his own Garrisons, with a few of the poorest and basest people. Mahomet after he was arrived at Confiantinople, called the Prince Nicolas, with Lucius his Cousin (whose help he had before used in killing of his elder Brother) into close Prison; where they living themselves every hour in danger of their lives, to win Favour in the Tyrants sight, yielded to renounce the Christian Religion, and to turn Turk. Which Mahomet understanding, caused them both to be richly apparelled, and with great Triumph to be circumcised, and presently set at liberty; yet still bearing in mind his old grudge, he shortly after, when they least feared any such matter, clapt them both fast again in Prison, and there caused them to be most cruelly put to death. A just Reward for bloody Murderers, and Apostacy, who to gain a little longer life, were content to forsake God.

1464. Shortly after it was found, that Stephen King of Bosnia (in ancient time called Mesfia Superior) who supported by the Turkish Emperor, had wrongfully obtained that Kingdom against his own Brethren, refused now to pay such yearly Tribute as he had before promised; for which cause Mahomet with a strong Army entered into Bosnia, and laid Siege unto the City of Dordevitz, which when he had with much ado taken, he divided the people thereof into three parts; one part whereof he gave as Slaves unto his

Men of War, another part he sent unto Confiantinople, and the third he left to inhabit the City. From Dordevitz he marched to Jacizga, now called Jaisa, the chief City of that Kingdom, which after four months Siege was delivered unto him by Composition; in this City he took the Kings Brother and Sister Prisoners, with most of the Nobility of that Kingdom, whom he sent as it were in Triumph unto Confiantinople. The other lesser Cities of Bosna following the Example of the greater, yielded themselves also. But Mahomet understanding that the King of Bosna had retired himself into the farthest part of his Kingdom, sent Mahomet his chief Basha with his European Soldiers to pursue him; wherein the Basha used such diligence, that he had on every side so inclosed him before he was aware, that he could by no means escape, which was before thought a thing impossible. So the King for safeguard of his life was fain to take the City of Cyssa for his Refuge; where he was so hardly laid to by the Basha, that seeing no other remedy, he offered to yield himself upon the Bashes faithful promise by Oath confirmed, that he should be honourably used, and not to receive in his Person any harm from the Turkish Emperor. Whereupon the Bashes Oath to the same purpose was with great Solemnity taken; and for the more assurance, conceived in writing, signed by the Basha, and so delivered to the King; which done, the King came out of the City and yielded himself. The Basha having thus taken the King Prisoner, carried him about with him from place to place, and from City to City, until he had taken possession of all the Kingdom of Bosna; and so returning unto his Master, presented unto him the Captive King; who was not a little offended with him, for that he had unto him so engaged his Turkish Faith. But when the poor King thought to have departed without suffering further harm, he was suddenly sent for by Mahomet; at which time, he doubting the worst, carried with him in his hand the writing wherein the Bashes Oath for his safety was comprised; nevertheless, the faithless Tyrant without any regard thereof, or of his Faith therein given, caused him presently to be most cruelly put to death, or as some write, to be slain quick. This was the Christian Kingdom of Bosna thus subdued by Mahomet, in the year 1462. After he had at his pleasure disposed thereof, and reduced it to the form of a Province, to be (as it is at this day) governed by one of his Bashes; in great Triumph returned to Confiantinople, carrying away with him many a woful Christian Captive, and the whole Wealth of that Kingdom.

Mahomet following the Example of his Father Amerath, had from the beginning of his Reign by one or other of his chief Bashes or expert Captains still maintained War against Scanderbeg, the most valiant and fortunate King of Epirus; these greatest part whereof, although it did in the course of time concur with the things before declared, and might by piece-meal have been amongst the same in their due time and place inserted; yet I have of purpose for divers reasons wholly reserved them for this place; first, for that I would not interrupt the course of the History before rehearsed; with the particular accidents of this War; And then, for that the greatest part of this Hereditary War, delivered as it were from hand to hand, from the Father to the Son, happened not long after this time; when as Mahomet having conquered the Kingdom of Bosna, had surrounded a great part of Scanderbegs Dominion; wherein I had respect also unto unto the Readers ease, who may with greater pleasure and content, and less pain, also view the same together, than if it had been differently fastened and intermeddled with the other greater occurrences of the same time. In which discourse I will but briefly touch many thing well worthy of a larger Treatise. And if forgetting my self, I shall in some places happen to say something longer than the Readers hand would require, yet I hope, that the zeal and love he bears unto the worthy memory of most famous Christian Princes, together with the shortness of the History, in comparison of that which is thereof written in full Volumes by others, shall easily excuse a larger discourse than this: But again to our purpose.

Mahomet in the beginning of his Reign sent Embassadors to Scanderbeg, offering him Peace, so that he would grant to pay unto him such yearly Tribute as his Father Amerath had in his life time demanded. Which embassage the crafty Tyrant sent rather to cure what confidence he had in himself, than for any hope he had to have his demand granted. This dishonourable offered peace Scanderbeg scornfully rejected, and so returned the Embassadors as they came; and presently upon their departure entered with his Horsemen into that part of the Turks Dominion which bordereth upon Epirus; and when he had wasted the Country, returned home laden with the Spoil thereof. In revenge of which despite, Mahomet shortly after sent Amul, one of his best Masters of War, with twelve thousand Horsemen unto Epirus, to require Scanderbeg with the like Spoil of his People and Country. But Scanderbeg understanding by his Espials of the Turks coming, lay close in ambush with six thousand Soldiers upon the great Mountain Modrissa, over which the Turks must of necessity take their way; and as they were about by night to have passed over that rough and steep Mountain, and were with much difficulty almost got to the top thereof, they were suddenly charged by Scanderbeg his Footmen, who having the advantage of the place, made great laughter of the Turks, and drove them down the Mountain again; at which time their Horses stood them in no stead at all, but were rather unto them an hindrance in that uneven and troublesome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the Mountain, they were in that great fear and disorder, again fiercely charged on the one side by Scanderbeg, and on the other side by his Nepew, called also Amul, who before the Turks coming had placed themselves with their Horsemen in places of most advantage; so that the Turks hardly beat and forced on every side, were in short time overthrowen and put to flight. In this conflict seven thousand of the Turks were slain, and Amul General of the Turks Army with divers other Captains taken, whom Scanderbeg sent Prisoners to Croia. For joy of this Victory at Scanderbegs return, great Triumph and Feasting was made at Croia; during which time, Scanderbeg caused Amul the Turk, with the rest of the Turkish Captains, to be enlarged, to be partakers of that joy, whereof they against their wills had given the occasion; and afterwards used them with all kind of courtesy during the time of their abode. This Amul a messenger of Scanderbeg, that he might send a Reliquester to Confiantinople, to certify Mahomet how the Turks stood with him and the rest, whom happily he might think to have been slain in the Battle; and to procure from him their ransom. Which his request Scanderbeg easily granted, and set down their ransom at thirteen thousand and Ducats. The news of this overthrow forewarned the Turkish Tyrant, but afterwards when he saw the remainder of his Army without their General and Leaders, having for most part lost their Ensigns and Armor, and also the Messenger that was sent from Amul, he fell into such a rage that he denied to give any thing at all for his ransom; imputing all the loss to his Treachery, Folly, or Cowardise. Howbeit he was afterwards persuaded by his Bashes and other great Courtiers, Amul his Friends, to think better of the General, of whose Faithfulness and Valour he had of long time had great experience, and also to send his Ransom; by denying whereof, he should (as they said) discourage his other Generals and Captains, who by chance of War might hap to fall into the like danger. By whose persuasion Mahomet sent an Embassador to Scanderbeg, with the ransom demanded, and other great Presents also. Upon receipt whereof, Amul with the other Captains were set at liberty, and sent with safe convoy out of Epirus. All the money sent for the Turks ransom, Scanderbeg divided amongst his Captains and Soldiers.

This late received overthrow filled the proud Tyrant with desire of revenge, so that he determined forthwith to send another Army unto Epirus; the leading whereof, divers of his great and most expert Captains ambitiously fought for. For Mahomet had promised great Rewards and most honourable Preferments to him whose help it should be to vanquish Scanderbeg. Among the rest, one Debras (a man for his Forwardness and Courage, in great favour with his Sovereign) by great suit obtained to have that charge; promising with exceeding confidence unto Mahomet, to make a beginning of better success in his Wars of Epirus, than others thither by him before sent; for the accomplishment whereof, he required to have no greater power than was sent the year before. But after that Amul was returned to the Court, and had with long discourse set forth the Vertues and Valour of Scanderbeg, with the invincible courage of his Soldiers, Debras became more temperate in his Speech, and was contented to receive a new Supply; so that he had under his Charge fourteen thousand Soldiers; with which Army he marched towards Epirus, and was come to a place called Pologus, where the lay with his Army encamped in a Plain in great security, fearing no danger; for that he was not as yet in the Enemies Country, neither as he supposed, near the Enemy. Of all this preparation, and of the coming of Debras, Scanderbeg had intelligence; and being resolved not to expect the coming of the Turks into Epirus, made choice of Six thousand of his best Horsemen; with whom he marched with as much speed as was possible into the Enemies Country, and came by night unto the Plain, where the Turks lay, hoping to have been upon them before they were aware, and so to have overthrowen them; wherein he was much deceived; for by the light of the Moon (which then shined all night) he was by the Turks in time discovered, yet the fuddleness of his approach with the strangeness of the attempt, exceedingly dismayed the whole Army of the Turks. But Debras mindful of the promise he had made unto his Lord and Master, with cheerful words encouraged his Soldiers, and presently sent out certain Troops of light Horsemen, to receive the first Charge of the Enemy, until he might set his whole Army in order of Battle. Betwixt these Troops, and others sent out by Scanderbeg, began a sharp skirmish; both the Armies standing fast, as beholders, carefully expecting the event thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his Souldiers should in his first encounter be put to the worst, it might tend to the great discouraging of the rest of his Army; seconded his men with other fresh Troops under the leading of Moses and Amefia; by whose coming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten back, and chased even to their main Batrel. In the heat of which chase, Moses forgetting himself, had with great danger in following on too fast, been inclosed by the Turks, had not his Fury been in good time staid by Amefia; for which oversight, he was afterwards blamed by Scanderbeg, that he could not with greater moderation use his good Fortune, commending such forwardness in a private Souldier, but not in so great a Commander.

When Moses and Amefia had thus put the Turks to flight, Scanderbeg brought on his whole Army, and fiercely assailed the Turks, yet troubled with the discomfiture of their Fellows. Debreas on the other side, with cheerful Speech, and his own Valour, so encouraged his Souldiers, that Scanderbeg was thereunto refitted, and his Fortune as it were at a stand; until that Musfuchius, with certain Troops of resolute men, drawn out of the left Wing of Scanderbeg's Army, gave such a fierce Charge upon the file of the Turks Army, that he brake their Ranks, and fore-difordered that part of the Army; which when Debreas perceived, he withdrew himself out of the front of the Batrel wherein he had valiantly stood against Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Musfuchius had difordered the Batrel, and with such Courage cheered up his troubled Souldiers, that his only Presence and Valour seemed to be the very Life and Heart of his whole Army. Whilst Debreas was thus busied against Musfuchius, Scanderbeg in the mean time with might and main fill charged the front of the Enemies Army; who now in the absence of the General began to lose their order and to give ground, making no such resistance as before. At which time, Moses forcibly breaking into the thickest of them, took one of their Ensigns, which he threw back among his Followers; where-with they encouraged, to press upon their Enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therewith discouraged, and their Batrel difordered, were almost ready to turn their Backs and to flee. Debreas seeing all in danger to be lost, halted with all speed unto the place where he saw most peril, and did what was possible to have restored the Batrel, and encouraged his Souldiers; where pressing in among the most, he was by Scanderbeg himself encountered hand to hand, and so by him slain; with whose fall the whole Army discouraged, without further resistance fled. Moses pursuing them on the one side, and Musfuchius on the other, with furious hand flew more in that chase than were slain in the Batrel. Of the Turks were slain in this Batrel four thousand one hundred and twenty, and some Prisoners taken, but of the Christians few or none; so that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a Victory given. All the Spoil taken from the Enemy, together with the Prisoners, was by Scanderbeg equally divided among the Souldiers. Unto Moses he gave Debreas his Horse and Armour; and unto Musfuchius a Prisoner, which by his port and behaviour seemed to be a man of some account.

contention between Musfuchius, and a Turk for his ransom.

This Turk, which Musfuchius upon a ransom of two hundred Ducats, and presently upon agreement made, drew forth the Money out of a little Bag which he had kept secretly about him, and offered it to Musfuchius for his ransom;

who receiving the Money, told the Turk, that he must provide another ransom, forasmuch as that Money was his own before by Law of Arms, as taken with his person. The Turk on the other side alledged for himself the agreement already made, with the payment of the full sum agreed upon. This controversy was brought before Scanderbeg; who with great pleasure heard them both what they could say; Musfuchius laying in hard for another ransom, and the Turk for his liberty urging the agreement. Who when they had both said what they could for themselves, Scanderbeg smiling, told them, that they both contended for that which was in right his, and neither of them for the Prisoner with the Money were both mine (said he) at the first taking of him, since which time I have given to you Musfuchius the Prisoner, which I knew, but not the Money which I knew not of; neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (said he to the Turk) who had by Law of Arms lost your self, together with all that you had about you. After he had thus pleasantly discouraged of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded to Musfuchius the Money he agreed for, and to the Turk his desired liberty; who glad thereof, and having also received his Horse and Armour of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, speaking all the honour he could of so noble a Conqueror. After this Victory Scanderbeg with great triumph returned again to Croia.

When Mahomet understood that Debreas was slain, and his Army overthrown, he became exceedingly melancholy; but after he saw so many of his Souldiers returned as had been sufficient to have restored a lost battel, he was so highly displeased with that Cowardice, as that he could not endure the sight of them. The death of Debreas grieved none more than the King himself; for the Captains generally either envied at his hardiness, or else hated his infidelity. Amefia among the rest took no small pleasure, that his proud Successor had taken part of his evil Fortune, and so in part eased his former infamy. The great Balfas and Men of War seeing their Sovereign so desirous of revenge, offered to spend their lives in that service, whose forwardness he seemed not to refuse; howbeit he had in his mind already plotted another manner of revenge. He was not ignorant, what great matters his Father Amurath amongst the Princes of Greece; which foul practice he purposed now to put in practice himself. There were at that time many famous Chieftains in Epirus, next unto Scanderbeg himself; him, the crafty Tyrant most desired to alienate from Scanderbeg, as one fittest to serve his purpose, and easiest without suspicion to be dealt with; because he commonly lay with a strong Garrison in Dibra, upon the very frontiers of Epirus. Wherefore he directed his Letters unto the Governor of Sfeigrade, commanding him by all means he could possibly devise to withdraw Moses from Scanderbeg; and not to spare for any Gold or golden Promises whereby to allure him; promising also unto the Governor himself great preferments, if he could win him. Upon receipt of which Letters, the Governor began to fall into the snare, how he might best attempt the matter he had in charge; where after many devices, he at last thought upon a shrewd-headed fellow, one of the Christians which dwelt in Sfeigrade; whom for that he was a Christian, he might without suspect use as an instrument in so dangerous and important an action. This Christian the Governor called unto him, and after he had with great Gifts and large Promises won him to undertake the matter, he sent him away, fully be- fore armed with pteuous instructions full of Treason and Deceit. When this subtil Messenger was come unto Moses, and under pretence of great and secret matters of importance, had obtained to speak with him in private; he after some discourse had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length under the covert of fair glozing words, to utter his poyson; shewing unto him (as a Messenger from the Governor) the great and good opinion the Turkish Emperor had of long time conceived of his Valour and Prowess, for which cause his heroical Nature could not but honour him, although he were his Enemy; and therewith also marvel, that he being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commanded by Scanderbeg, whose fate was by him chiefly upheld, whereas if he would do wisely, and managing his affection, follow Mahomet, an Emperor of greatest magnificence and power, he should quickly in his Court find such honourable entertainment, as were to be preferred before the state of Scanderbeg; or if the Sovereignty of Epirus his native Country did better please him, he might easily be thereunto advanced, by joining his own endeavour to Mahomet's great power. It pleased Moses well to hear his own Praise (a thing incident to haughty minds) and he liked well that he was so favoured of the Turkish Emperor; but the hope of the Kingdom of Epirus, began to work in him new conceits, and moved him more than all the rest. Such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things, save themselves; so glorious a thing it is, to stand in the highest place: For all that, Moses neither in word or countenance made any semblance of liking, or disliking the Messenger. Which the wily Messenger taking for a secret consent, and heartily glad that he had been so well heard; not desiring as then any further answer, craved leave to depart, promising in short time to return to him again. After the departure of this Messenger, many troubled thoughts began to arise in the mind of Moses; his mirth was changed into melancholy, and his countenance of his countenance was altered; his haughty thoughts were his solitary Companions, and the imagined Kingdom the Idol he in secret worshipped; so that in short time, he seemed to the wiser sort as a man altogether metamorphosed. Some were so bold, as for to ask the cause of the Messengers coming; unto whom he answered, That he was one, from whom he received intelligence of matters concerning the good of the State; which his answer was holden for true; for who durst once mistrust Moses? Whilst he thus was ruffled up and down with his own thoughts, as a Ship with the Billows of a rough Sea, the same sly Messenger, according to his promise came again; and for his more credit, in secret brought with him such Presents as well might seem to have been sent from the Great Turk, with which Messages were framed than before. Of all which that was sent, Moses is reported to have received nothing but the worst, which was, the very Treason it self. And so returned the Messenger, with answer, that he could not but with great grief accept of the Turkish Emperors great favour, and for the rest of his requests, whatsoever he should chance to do therein, he should not from thenceforth find him any great Enemy; commanding the Messenger at his departure, no more to repair unto him about that matter, for fear of suspicion.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came unto Dibra, to see how all things stood there, and to consult with Moses for the besieging of Sfeigrade; which Moses it grieved him to see in the possession of the Turks. Moses to avert Scanderbeg from that enterprise, wherein he must of force be driven to shew himself, told him, That he understood of late by a certain Messenger which came to him out of Sfeigrade, that the City was so well stored by the Turks, of all things necessary for the defence thereof, that it would cost lost labour to attempt any thing against the same; wherefore he advised him rather to besiege Belgrade (not that Belgrade which is situated upon the River of Danubius, but another of the same name) in the Confinnes of Epirus, then holden by the Turks, but distant from Sfeigrade about an hundred and forty miles; of the taking whereof, there seemed to be more hope. By this persuasion, Scanderbeg relolved with himself to make provision for the besieging of Belgrade. And forasmuch as his Souldiers of Epirus always used to the River, were not so fit for the besieging of Towns, he thought it good to pray aid out of Italy, from his old Friend Alphonso King of Naples, with whom he had been of long time acquainted, and unto him much beholden. Wherefore he sent two of his Noblemen Embassadors unto him, with certain rich Presents, and familiar Letters of this purport.

Scander-

of Naples.

Our Souldiers of Epirus, know only how to fight with men, and them to conquer with Walls they know not how to deal. You Italians (as I understand) have skill in that kind of service, and take pleasure therein; wherefore now at this present, I have need of your help and cunning. There be certain Towns of our Enemies in Epirus, yet almost in the heart of our Kingdom, which eyefore I have of long desired (if it pleased God) to take out of my sight; but being occupied with continual Wars, had no leisure until now, happily to attempt any thing against them. This time I have chosen as most fit, to satisfy my desire, both for the (so)inableness of the time of the year, and for that Mahomet (perish his leisure) whose fury I have twice calmed. You understand in few words, what I have need of; all other things are almost in readiness, and we only look for your help. Lend me such Souldiers as know how to fight a fair fight, I mean Harquebushers and Cannoniers, for of others we have plenty. But hope ye it Apulia, my Alphonso, under thy Government, from whence men fit for all services may be drawn as out of a most plentiful treasury. Whenever we have requested men fit for service, either in Peace or War, you have befitted both our Court and Camp. By you the Kingdom of Epirus hath been preserved with civil Policy, and warlike Strength; all eyefore of People, of what condition soever; you eyefore of Epirus foundeth forth the peace, both at home and abroad. But for mine own part, I do so lovingly embrace your kindness, and so firmly retain the remembrance of your deserts towards me, that sometime I wish you that fortune (although in so doing I may seem unkind) which (as the common saying is) proveth, but getteth no Friends; to the intent, that you might by some more certain proof know, how much I am to you devoted.

When Scanderbeg had sent away his Embassadors, he with all diligence began to provide things necessary for the Siege of Belgrade; wherein he had purposed also to have used the service of Mofes. But he now in heart a Traitor both to his Prince and Country, and a Friend to Mahomet, found many excuses to stay at home in Dibra; alledging first, that it was to be thought that so soon as the Turkish King should hear of the Siege of Belgrade, he would invade some part of Epirus, thereby to withdraw his Enemies from the Siege; and then that no part of all Epirus lay nearer unto the Turks, or more in danger than Dibra; and that therefore he could not do any better service, than to see unto the safety of that Country, long before committed to his charge, and in which also most part of his Living lay. These his excuses, proceeding indeed from deep Treason, were yet nevertheless thought reasonable, and he for his provident care highly commended; and Authority given him with new supplies to augment the Garrison under his command, as time and occasion should require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended Siege, the Embassadors before sent to Alphonso, were returned unto Epirus, and with them such aid as Scanderbeg had before requested, and a great deal more. For Alphonso fearing the greatness of the Turkish Emperor, in what he could furthered Scanderbeg's actions, reckoning himself not above fifty miles distant from his Dominions, to be the strongest Walls of his Kingdom in Alpida (as not many years after, it by proof appeared, when as the Turks having taken Oran, put all Italy in no small fear.) With this aid he also wrote loving Letters unto Scanderbeg, thanking him for his Presents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as bold of all his things, as of his own. But when he came to make mention of the Soldiers he had sent, Alphonso wrote the manner of his pleasant nature, merrily wrote unto Scanderbeg. That he had sent him Italian Soldiers which could according to his desire, fight well both with Men and Walls, but better with Women; and that therefore the Epirots were best to take heed, that they whose help they required for fight afar off, proved not also good Warriors at hand at home in their Houses. The great commendation Scanderbeg had given of the King, was by him returned unto the excess of his love, and by the King requited with the like.

Scanderbeg now furnished with all things needful, set forward, and according to his former determination, came and encamped before Belgrade, with an Army of fourteen thousand good Soldiers; and in short time had so distressed the City, that the Turks were glad to take truce with him for sixteen days, which time expired, they promised to deliver up the Town, if they were not before relieved. Upon conclusion of this truce Scanderbeg encamped himself upon an high Hill near unto the City, with three thousand Horse, and a thousand Foot, and appointed Musachin and Tamfus, with the rest of his Army, to remove farther off into a large Plain, where they might encamp themselves in a more wholesome and fresh Air, in that hot season of the year, during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed also five and twenty Scouts to keep continual Watch upon the top of the high Mountain, to discover afar off the coming of the Enemy, and to give warning thereof unto the Camp by making a fire upon the Mountain; by the negligence of which Watch, Scanderbeg received a great overthrow, as hereafter followeth.

The news of the Siege of Belgrade was brought unto Mahomet, at such time as he was ready to have passed into Alia against the Emperor of Trapezond; which great enterprise he was loath to give over, for the relief of Belgrade, and yet to lose that City unto Scanderbeg, grieved him much; wherefore he resolved with himself so to much; wherefore he would not altogether neglect the one, as that he would not his intended journey into Alia himself, with such fortune as is afore said, he sent Sebalias one of his great Balfaces, with forty thousand Horsemen to relieve Belgrade, promising him great rewards if he could bring him Scanderbeg either alive or dead. This Balface was of the Turks accounted for a wary Captain, but not so courageous, always more pacific than bold; he having received his charge, set forward; with all speed possible, no less careful of ward with him as commanded, than was Mahomet himself, and by great journeys came on so fast, that he still prevented the fame of his coming; and by his Forerunners intercepted, or rather (as some write) corrupted the Watch which Scanderbeg had before placed upon the Mountains; so that no sign was given unto the Camp, of the Enemies, as was expected. By means whereof, Sebalias with all his power were upon that part of Scanderbeg's Army, which lay in the Plains, before they were well aware of his coming; so that most part of them had not so much leisure as to bridle their Horses, or to put on their Armor. In which so suddain a fear, Musachin armed himself, and put his Soldiers in such order, as the shortness of the time and the Enemies approach would permit; doubting much, whether it were better to fight or to flee, but seeing no less danger in Flight than in Fight, he resolutely received the Enemies charge, as a man desirous beforehand to revenge his own death. And at length (seeing to his men slain about him by heaps, and that courage must needs give place unto fortune) fiercely attempted to have broken through the midst of his Enemies, and so to have fled unto the Mountain where Scanderbeg lay; but he was so beset, that no way was possible to be made; wherefore, to resolving there to die, he desperately fought, to the great admiration of his Enemies, until that he, with all there with him, were every man slain. Tamfus, on the other side, after he had given divers brave attempts to have refused his cousin Musachin, finding by proof, that he could do him no more good therein, but to become the wofull companion of his death, exhorted all the rest yet left, for safeguard of their lives to flee: in which doing, most of them were slain, for the Balfaces great Army to filled all places thereabout, and so eagerly pursued the Victory, that it was almost impossible any way to escape. Scanderbeg lying upon the Mountain, and seeing the overthrow of most part of his Armie, was about many times to have defended from the Hill to have helped them in what he might, or else to have died with them; but by other straits, being thereon earnestly resisted by his other most expert Captains; and perswaded, not desperately to thrust both himself and them all into the manifest peril of assured death.

Sebalias having slain Musachin and put Tamfus to flight, followed the chase with the greatest part of his Army, so that few were left in the great Plain, except such as staid to rise the dead. Scanderbeg taking that opportunity, came forth from the Hill whereon he stood, with his down from the Hill whereon he stood, and in a moment slew four thousand Soldiers, and in a moment slew all such Turks as he found in his way; and after following in the tail of the Turks Army, cut off a great number of them, and brought a general fear upon the whole Army; in somuch, that Sebalias perceiving that he gained not so much in the chasing of Tamfus, but that he lost more in the reward of his Army, by the pursuit of Scanderbeg, left the chase, and turned upon his fierce Enemy; where after a sharp skirmish begun, the wary Balface fearing in the maintaining of that disordered Fight to have the Victory wrung out of his hands by Scanderbeg, caused a Retreat to be founded, so to call together his dispersed Soldiers, and in better order to encounter his dangerous Enemy. Scanderbeg in the mean time having assembled the remainder of his Army, valiantly again encountered the Turks, who thought in this battle to have made an end of the Wars in Epirus; and with his own Hand slew Achmet and Barach, two valiant Soldiers of the Turks; which like stout Champions had before sworn unto Mahomet the death of Scanderbeg, if they should chance to meet with him. In this last skirmish a great number of the Turks were slain; but Night drawing on, Sebalias retired with his Army to a Mountain near unto the City, and Scanderbeg likewise to another almost two miles off; and in the dead time of the night rising with his Army, returned in safety into Epirus, leaving strong Garrisons upon all the strait passages as he went, for fear lest the Balface proud of this Victory, should forthwith break into Epirus. This was the only and greatest overthrow that Scanderbeg had hitherto received of the Turks; wherein he lost two thousand Horsemen and three thousand Foot; most part were the Followers of the late Emperor King Alphonso together with his Tents and great Artillery, and about eighty of his Men taken Prisoners. And of the Turks were also slain three thousand.

The next day Sebalias perceiving that Scanderbeg was retired, commanded the bodies of the slain Turks to be fought out and buried; but of such Christians as they yet found breathing, the Turks cut off their Hands and Feet, and to left them among the dead. The Head of Musachin and of many other the slain Christians, which by their Armor or Apparel were thought to be of the better sort, were by the Commandment of Sebalias cut off; which because he could not for the distance of the place, and heat of the weather, without great annoyance carry with him to Constantinople, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is, he caused them to be flayed, and stuffed with Chaff, and so to be carried as the vain Trophies of his Victory. Afterwards, when he had repaired the battered Walls of Belgrade, and put a new supply of seven hundred fresh Soldiers into the City, beside the old Garrison therein before, and for all things in good order, he returned with great Triumph to Constantinople. And the more to set out the glory of his Victory, at the time he entered the City, he first caused the captive Christians to be led by Chains before him; after whom were born the Ensigns taken from the Christians, with the afore said Heads thrust upon Lances, and after them all the Spoil; last of all came Sebalias himself with his Soldiers, as great Conquerors, and was of the People received with such Applause and Joy, as if he had conquered some great Kingdom. No man was now spoken of but Sebalias, his praises were in every mans Mouth, he was the only man (as they said) that did think that Scanderbeg was to be overcome; no preferment was now thought too great for him, or Reward sufficient to countervail his desert. The poor Christian Captives were afterwards for the most part sold; of the rest some were alive thrust upon sharp Stake, some hanged upon iron Hooks, some otherwise cruelly at the Victors pleasure tortured to death.

Mofes lately before corrupted by the practices of the Governor of Szigrad, hearing of the great loss Scanderbeg had received at Belgrade, thought it now a most fit time for his revolt. But forasmuch as the Fate, in the nature of it self, fomented even to himself the door thereof, a great deal sooner and more dishonourable, for that he had therein no complices; he thought it good, if it were possible, to allure some others into the Fellowship of his Treason, so to diminish the infamy of himself, in communicating the fault with many, and to appear with greater credit before the Turkish Tyrants, than if he should as a contemptible Fugitive come all alone. Wherefore upon the bad news from Belgrade, he seemed at the first very grieved, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg; and the common misery of the Country of Epirus, with many words amplifying the same; and then on the contrary part, setting forth to the uttermost the Force and Power of the Turkish Emperor Mahomet, thereby to strike a greater terror and diffult into the minds of them with whom he was conversant; but unto such was more secret and inward with him, he discovered the great affection and favour the great Emperor Mahomet had of long born him, with the large offer of his Gifts and Preferences, assuring them of the like also, if they would conform themselves unto his appetite; seeking hereby so much to allure them, to allure them into the participation of his most execrable Treason; yet when he had said what he could, he found none but a few of the baser sort of the common Soldiers, which were willing to hearken unto him or to follow him. When Mofes saw how much he had laboured, and how little prevailed, fearing to be discovered, he fled by night to Szigrad, accompanied with a few base Fellows; and easily obtained the Governors pass, with safe conduct to Constantinople; where he arrived a little before the return of Sebalias from Belgrade, and was of Mahomet both joyfully received and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg understood that Mofes was thus revolted, at the first report thereof he was so troubled with the strangeness of the Fact, that he stood speechless as a man astonished; but after he had paused a while, and upon further enquiry had found it out to be true, he according to his heretical disposition, said no more, but that he could easily have Mofes excused, for that he was carried away with the violence of such Fortune as might have alienated the mind of a right constant man. And when divers of his Friends (according to the manner of the World) with hard speeches seemed to aggravate his offences he could not abide to hear the same, but commanded them to hold their peace, and no more to use such speeches; wishing that with Mofes and evil Fortune were together with Mofes sent out of Epirus. Upon this news Scanderbeg, accompanied with Amezah his Nephew, and a Troop of Horsemen, presently entered into the Country of Dibra, and there with all care caused most diligent inquiry to be made, if any could be found partakers of the Conspiracy with Mofes. But finding none, he much rejoiced in the fidelity of his Subjects; and having for all things in good order in that Province, returned himself to Crava.

Shortly after that Mefes was returned unto Epirus, Mahomet by like practice allured unto him Amefia, Scanderberg his Nephew; promising to make him King of Epirus in his Uncles stead. For by that means, the crafty Tyrant thought it a more eafie way to draw the minds of the people of Epirus from Scanderberg unto him, defended of the Princes Blood, than to Mefes, or to any other Stranger he should first give Amefia upon this hope of a Kingdom, fled to Cyrtania, and became he would clear the mind of the Tyrant of all Suspition and distrust, he carried with him his Wife and Children, as the most free Pledges of his Fidelity. This Amefia was of Stature low, and the Feature of his Body not so perfect as might sufficiently exprefs the hidden Vertues of his Mind; he was of Courage haughty, and more meafure, full of a pregnant Will, wonderful Memory, and the most exact and beautiful (the chief means whereby Epirus minds feal away the Hearts of Men) whatsoever he got of himself, or had by the gift of his Uncle, he divided it among his Souldiers or Friends; he was very affable, and could notably both cover and diflemble his affections; for which things, he was above all others both beloved and honoured of all the People of Epirus, when Scanderberg was living. But after coming to Ademem, he filled not his Ears with flattery, Promises and vain Praifes of himself as had Ademem.

fellows: Besides that they have with them my graceless Nephew and domestic Foe Amela, who will teach them to forefend and slay such Snarers as in times past he with us was wont to lay for them. Wherefore we must now tower up into the heights of some notable and strange policy, whereby both our Country may be from danger preserved, and also some great Victory, without our own bloodshed (which, I have already obtained; which to the maintenance of our ancient Glory and Renown, we have to this day by many most notable Victories gained: But time and space, and the sight of the Enemy, shall furnish us with this device. Now (that my Discourse may come to the purposed end) first of all, all things subject either to the fury or victory of the Enemy, are to be removed out of the way; all people, of what Age, Sex, or Condition soever, are to be brought out of the Country into places of safety; and then, our Towns are to be furnished with strong Garrisons and all other necessary Provision, against all the chances of Fortune. Besides, who knoweth the secret designs of the Tyrant? or whether he himself (of long time desirous of Revenge, and thirsting after our Blood) will follow the Baffa at the heels, or no? Perhaps I may believe and fear more than is needful; but it is good to fear all that may be feared, that we may indeed fear nothing. If all things shall thus be set in order, if there shall nothing be left in the Fields or in the Villages, that may enrich, feed, or fear our Enemies, and which may withdraw our care and thoughts from our Enemies, undoubtedly we shall be Victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in these Wars, I will assuredly deliver your Enemies into your hands to be slain at your pleasure; and (by the leave of God) will make the Name and Valour of the Emperor more terrible unto the Turk, than ever it hath been in the time of our ancestors. I flatter not my self, I deceive you not; if any thing may be promised in worldly Affairs, this I assure you of, and this will I take upon me. But these things are better done than said. In the mean while, to spend no more time in longer talk and discourse (than which, no greater loss can be to Soldiers) let every one of us take a part in this Charge, for the good disposing of all things, and how to withstand the Enemy. I will not command any thing to others which I will not my self do; I will refuse nothing, or reckon any thing base, which may tend to the common Honour or Profit of us all.

This Speech of Scanderbeg was well liked and joyfully received of all the Hearers, so that many besought him to manifest to them how he purposed to proceed in these Wars; whereunto he with cheerful countenance answered. That it was enough for him, if they did but believe him, promising himself in Person to be in the most dangerous actions as far as any of them, where with they rested contented. And presently dispatching his Lieutenants into divers parts of his Kingdom, as he thought most convenient, provided, that all things were in short time conveyed out of the Country into the strong Towns and other places of Refuge. No Corn, no Cattle, or other things of any worth was left in the Country; but all left desolate, in like manner as was before at the coming of the great King Amurat to the Siege of Croia.

By this time Isaac the great Baffa was come into Epirus, accompanied with Amela; and as he marched, still sent before him his Scouts and his Episcops, carefully to view every corner of the Country, for fear to be surprised as others before him had been: directed in his Journey, for most part by Amela. Scanderbeg had in readiness such an Army as he had purposed to use against his mighty Enemy, but lay with six thousand Horfemen only in shew, as if he had determined with them to have given them battal, but meaning indeed nothing less. For as soon as the Baffa was come in sight, he with those Horfemen, according as he had before appointed, as if he had been discouraged with the very sight of the Turks, turned his back and fled. And because he would not give them any occasion to suspect it to be done for some policy or fineness, and so to make them more careful, he fled not into the Mountains or Woods, as his wonted manner was, but directly toward Lysia, a Town of the Venetians standing upon the Sea coast, as if he had quite despair'd of the keeping of Epirus, and fled thither for Refuge. The Baffa seeing him fly, was glad thereof, and sent certain Troops of Horfemen to pursue him, and diligently to mark which way he took; but encamped himself with his Army in the Plains of Dibra, near unto Ornychium, where Scanderbeg lay before; and there rested his Army, weary of long travel, expecting the return of his Horfemen, sent after Scanderbeg. But upon their return, when it was for a certainty reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handful of men was fled out of Epirus, and not an Enemy to be seen, the Turks began to rejoice, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any loss driven the Enemy out of the Country; yet much grieved, that they could no where yet much thing to satisfy their greedy desires; for why, all things were to clean gone, as if the Country had been swept against their coming, which might have been a sufficient cause for them to have distrustful some great matter; but they flattering themselves, supposed all this to be done for fear of them, upon extreme desperation; such is the frail conceit of men, to lose strength of body, common sense, and understanding, when some great mischief is appointed for their Overthrow or Destruction. The Baffa seeing the Enemy fled, and now no cause of fear, consulted with his chief Captains, what were now best to be done? Amela still persuading him not to remove, but there to stay a time, and to expect the farther event of matters. But the greater number, whose opinion prevailed, said it was better to go farther into the Country; and to take the spoil thereof before the Country people should convey away all their Substance into places of safety, as they had done there in Dibra, and leave them nothing but the bare ground and empty Cottages. By this persuasion, the Baffa early next morning in good order set forward; commanding by general Proclamation, That no man upon pain of death should break his Array or fringe from the Army. Yet before he set forward, he called Amela unto him; whom after he had highly commended, and with great vehemency inveighed against Scanderbeg, he with the great applause of the whole Army in the name of Mahomet created him King of Epirus. That day he marched not far, by reason of the great heat; for it was then about the midst of July. Yet when he had well wearied himself with that day's travel, finding neither Enemy nor any thing else worthy to be accounted in any part of a Victory, he encamped at night, keeping diligent Watch, and sending forth his Scouts every way, but especially towards Lysia. The next day, which was the third day after the Baffa's coming into Epirus, he set forward again, and came at length into Amathia, and there encamped that night.

When Scanderbeg (dying for fear, as the Turks supposed) was gone a great way out of their sight towards Lysia, and come even to the Borders of his Kingdom, he there staid all the rest of that day. And a little before the going down of the Sun, he with a few select Horfemen departed from the Army, and with painful travel got up to the top of the high Mountains, from whence a man might by day well discover all the Plains of Amathia. There he appointed one Tevte Emamus, a politic and valiant Gentleman, with certain Horfemen to mark diligently which way the Enemy held, and by certain secret and appointed watchings and signs, to give knowledge thereof to the Army. After such Order taken, he returned himself, and came again to the Camp after midnight. And presently rising with his Army, and fetching a compass about, came undiscovered, and secretly encamped himself as near as he could unto the Mountains where his Scouts lay, with Eagles eyes waiting for the least moving of the Enemy. The Baffa desired to get as far as he could into the Country, before the heat of the day, began early in the morning to set forward, and came to the Plains of Pharsalia, through the World spoken of for the great battel in them long time before fought, between the two most famous Chieftains Caesar and Pompeius; and now once more to be made famous by the slaughters of the Turks. Here the Enemy finding some fragrant Cereals, and other small things which the Country people had in their fields, hastily left behind them, fell to seeking after Booty, and, as men without fear, spent that day in roaming up and down the Country, in hope to find something; and at night encamped without any great Watch, but towards Lysium, from whence they (in great security) looked for the coming of Scanderbeg; and as it were in disgrace of the coming, carried Amela in Triumph up down the Camp, as if he had been already possessed of the Kingdom of Epirus. Scanderbeg lying on the other side of the Mountains, perceived by his Episcops, which way the Enemy lay; and with great silence under the covert of the Mountains and Woods, secretly bent his course the same way, until he came to a Mountain called Tumpis, at the foot whereof he encamped that night. The next morning the Baffa holding on his way, came and encamped not far from the same Mountain, and there staid himself with half his Army, and sent Amela with the other half to burn and spoil the Country; who about noon returned to the Camp with much prey as he had got, with his Soldiers well wearied with travel, and the heat of the day. Scanderbeg like a careful Householder, who being about to enter and seek some honourable Personages, trusteth not to his Wife and Servants, but looketh to the bestowing of his Provision himself, carefully ordering and disposing and setting forth all things, especially if his Provision (for want of ability) be short, to welcome so great Guests; and setting all things forth to the greatest view, seeketh at least to fill the eyes of his Guests, though he doubt to satisfy their Appetites; so he carefully viewing all the Mountains and thick Woods thereabout without resting, let Amela in one place, Tampus in another, and all the rest in places most convenient. He appointed every man what to do, and intrusted them, and considered of every particular circumstance himself; and so divided his Forces, as might best serve his purpose, and make the most terrible show to the Enemy; for which purpose he in every Company sent more Trumpets, Drums, and other Instruments of War, than he had before at any time used. When he had so to his most advantage bestowed so many of his Captains and Soldiers as he thought good, and as the nature of the places would give leave, he with 4000 Horfemen and the like number of Foot, speedily marching up the rough Mountain of Tumpis, from thence plainly beheld in what Order the Turks Camp lay in the Plains below. The Turks, especially they which were lately returned with Amela from the spoil of the Country, lay scattered abroad in the fields, with their Horfes unbridled and unfilled, resting their weary bodies; some got under the shadows of Trees were vidualling themselves; some having filled their Bellies, lay fast asleep on the green Grass; the rest were passing the time, some with one kind of sport, some with another, as Soldiers do in field when they have little or nothing to do; for it was then the hottest time both of the year, and of the day, being about the midst of July, and the noon-time of the day. The like negligence was also in that part of the Camp where the Baffa himself lay; every man taking his ease and pleasure, with final regard of Horse or Armour; for being out of fear of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to have been a great way off at Lysium, they lay as men without care wrap up in security, the common destruction of great Armies and Commonwealths. Amela with the great Captains, were at the same time all together in the Baffa's Pavilion, consulting what the course they were best to take, to do something to the contentment of Mahomet, and their own commendation; some said it were best with Fire and Sword to destroy all they could in Epirus; and so having laid the Country waste, to return. Others thought it better to march directly to Croia, to prove if the Citizens could be persuaded to yield themselves and receive Amela for their King; otherwise to threaten them with a continual Siege, and utter ruin of the Country, if upon the vain expectation of help from Scanderbeg they should refuse to submit themselves. As for Scanderbeg himself, who then lay hovering over their heads, he was in all that Consultation least feared; who from the top of the Mountain, beholding the security and disorder of the Turks Camp, and delighted with the sight thereof; encouraged his Soldiers, and marshalled them in such order as they were to follow him, for the charging and terrifying of the Enemy. But first of all he determined to oppress the Turks Scouts, which lay at the foot of the Mountain; for which purpose he himself with a few Horfemen first secretly descended the Mountain, the rest of his Army following shortly after, and so suddenly came on the Scouts, that he slew them all except one, who escaping by the swiftness of his Horse, came running to the Camp as one half affrighted, crying out that Scanderbeg was coming. The Turks great suspending nothing less than the coming of him that way, at the present instant hardly believed that he was so nigh; when as he following him at the heels as fast as he could, with his Horfemen and his Footmen after them, was in a moment as if it had been a sudden Tempest, broken in amongst the unarmed Turks, and there making great slaughter of them, filled all the Camp with sudden tumult and fear. Amela who at the first beg for noise had speedily got him to his Charge, with four his Soldiers some half-armed, some on Foot, having no leisure to bridle their Horfes, was the first that made head against Scanderbeg. The Baffa did what he might in that sudden fear and shortness of time, to arm his Men, and to set them in order; but whilst those things were in doing, the Soldiers which lay in ambush in the Woods, came down the Mountains with such horrible shouts and noise of Instruments of War, as if Heaven and Earth should have presently gone together; the Hills and Vallies with their hollow Echoes, increasing the terror of the Alarm. Infomuch, that the Turks dismayed, and fearing that all the Force of Epirus, with the Countries adjoining, had come upon them, began to fly on every side, before that Moses and the rest that lay in ambush were come into the Plains. Amefa acquainted with the Uncles Stragglers, as much as he could encouraged the Turks; crying aloud and telling them, That such Turks; crying aloud and Terrors were not to be feared, vain Tumults and devices of their Enemies to cover their own weakness; and by his own valour flayed many which before were about to have fled. In this while, the Baffa having put his Men in better order he could, was coming to the Aid of Amefa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg; but in his setting forward, he was so valiantly encountered on the one side by Moses with his Horsemen, and on the other by Tamufus and Emanuel with their Footmen, that he was enforced, not without great loss, again to retire unto his Trenches.

All the hope of the battel depended upon Amefa, who still with great courage and blood his Uncle; exhorting his Soldiers valiantly as men to endure that first Assault, which should afterwards they then most assured Victory; heartening them on with hope of speedy help from their Followers if they would but a while endure the fury of their Enemies, whose hearts (as he said) would presently be discouraged, if they prevailed not in that their first and desperate Attempt, having nothing else to trust unto. By which persuasion the Turks were again encouraged, accounting it a great dishonour to fly and leave their Chieftain in the field. But when they saw Scanderbeg still to prevail upon them, and that no help came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbeg Horsemen slain as they were arming themselves; many were by the way cut off as they were coming, and the rest put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with Amefa, turned their backs and fled also. Scanderbeg Horsemen pursued the chafe, and made great slaughter of the Turks, and in the same chafe took Amefa Prisoner. Scanderbeg, having overthrown that part of the Turks battel, was coming with a thousand Footmen and some Horsemen, to have aided Moses against the Baffa; but before his coming, Moses to blot out his former Infamy, had with invincible courage put the great Baffa with all his Army to flight; and Scanderbeg following the chafe, gave him no leave to look behind him, until he was got out of Epirus. Many were in this chafe taken Prisoners, and amongst the rest one Messias a Samack, a man of great account amongst the Turks. In this battel, beside the Prisoners, were taken twenty of the Turks fairest Engins. As for Horses, Armor, and other spoils taken in the field, and in the Camp, all which fell to the Soldiers share, is almost incredible to be told. The number of the slain Turks is of divers diversly reported; they which write of the most, reckon up thirty thousand; and they which speak of the least, account twenty thousand. Of the Christians were lost but sixty. Now if any account it strange, that so great a Victory should be gained with so little loss, not to speak of that is written in Holy Writ, let him but read the ancient Histories of the Romans, or the Chronicles of our own Country, and he shall in them find Victories no less strange. There was to be seen the sudden and strange alteration of these worldly things, no more indeed (whatsoever we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we have not. Scanderbeg possessed the rich Pavillion, erst belonging to the great Baffa; and other of his Captains enjoy Tents, with much other rich Furniture never prepared for their use. Amefa, which the same day as a Victorious Conqueror over-ran a great part of Amathia with his Horsemen, and was carried in Triumph with the general Acclamation of many thousands of valiant Soldiers, and honoured as a King, and of them so called; is now led through the Christian Army to his Uncle, with his hands bound behind him as a Slave, speechless and confounded, unable to hold up his head for shame; whose misery moved most of the beholders to compassion, and forced tears out of the eyes of many.

The next day after this great Victory, Scanderbeg caused the bodies of the slain Turks to be buried, together with their Horses; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their loathsome Carcases should not infect the Country; and after that, returned in great Triumph to Croia. By the way as he went, the Country people, which were before for fear of the Turks fled into the Woods and Mountains in great multitudes met him as he did others also out of the Cities, whose mouths were all full of his worthy Praises. Before him went the Captive Turks with their hands bound behind them, excepting such as were enforced to carry the Turks Engins. Next unto them followed the great Baffa rich Pavillion, in such manner as he went, the Country diers, as if it had been in the field. Then came Scanderbeg himself with the Turkish Samack, and Amefa following him; for Amefa had with great and humble Suit obtained of his Uncle, that he might not, as he well deserved, be carried bound among the other Captives. Last of all came Scanderbeg his Victorious Soldiers in goodly order, every man leading a spare Samack taken from the Enemy, and loaded with spoil. So when he was come to Croia, and there of his Subjects joyfully received, he brake up his Army; and gave every man leave at his pleasure to depart. The Samack and Amefa, were committed to safe keeping, until further Order was taken for them. Amefa afterwards was for his Treason worthily condemned to perpetual Prison, and by an Embassador from Scanderbeg sent unto King Alphonso of Naples, there to be kept in dungeon, and with Ferdinand his Son, to have Amefa restored to him again. But which means he was brought back again into Epirus, and cast in Prison at Croia; but not in such straight manner as before; for Scanderbeg according to his accustomed Clemency, began now to forget the injury to him before done; and at last overcome with the continual Supplication and Tears of his Nephew, pardon- ed him his life; and restoring him to his former liberty, received him also into his former favour. But Amefa remembering what Pledges of his Loyalty he had left with Mahomet at Constantinople, and fearing what would become of his Wife and Children, if he should hastily use that his liberty, giving his Uncle most humble thanks, brake unto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth,

The Speech
of Amefa to Scanderbeg

Whereas you of your own gracious goodness only, without any desert of mine, have regarded my Life and Welfare, it behooves me also to be careful for the life of others; lest whilst I receive your exceeding bounty with too much desire of mine own Health and Honour, I do at this present, by this same benefit of yours, cast away them, whom I have long since by mine own Treachery undone. Mine unfortunate and guilty Wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent Children are with him also; I shal yet live, and shall live, so long as the Tyrant shall think, that I live in heart his; but when he shall once perceive by this your gracious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruel Creature will forthwith cut and rend in pieces the Pledges of my Faith, and their innocent blood shall pay the guilt of their Fathers offence. Wherefore the Ottoman Tyrant is of me by some device to be deceived, that I may in the mean time preserve these Pledges, until I may by some fit occasion afterwards redeem the same. I will by your leave this night take my flight out of Croia, as if I had broken Prison, and escaped against your will, and so fly unto Mahomet, making the greatest hope I can of my wonted Love and Loyalty towards him; not omitting to bear, or speak unto that cruel King, such things concerning your Estate, as I was wont in such things concerning your Estate, as I was wont in my better fortune; that having so cleared my self of all suspicion, which he perhaps hath conceived by reason of my Captivity and long stay with you, I may at length, with my Wife and Children, go escape from him; wherein you may help me much, if you shall openly make known as if you were grieved with the keeping of the Prison for the same. In the mean time, whilst I shall stay in the Tyrants Court expecting some fit time for my escape; I will stand you in stead of an Intelligencer, so that your Enemy shall not so my knowledge either attempt or go about any thing against you, which shall be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refused not to grant whatsoever he had requested, but laid unto him:

The answer of Scanderbeg
Amefa.

Amefa, since we have granted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not allow thee to prohibit you to use that our Gift to your most good, and to the preservation of them who for ever may most justly call upon you, as debtor unto them, for their welfare and liberty. Go thy way, proceed, take thy time and occasion as it seems unto thee best; and at length reform thy self, whilst thou yet hast sufficient time and place. I now believe you in all things, and will leave this your device: Amefa you shall herein deceive no man but your self; if you shall longer follow the Faith and Court of the barbarous King, whereas like danger is both of Body and Soul both to thee and thine. Whenever thou shalt return unto us thou shalt not do us a greater pleasure; and in what regard thou shalt hereafter be with us, in the same thou shalt be with us again.

Amefa.

The same night Amefa by secret Order from Scanderbeg, escaped both out of Prison and out of Croia; and in the morning it was all over the City, that he was gone, and the Keepers sharply rebuked for their negligence. He coming to Constantinople, easily persuaded Mahomet, that he was by chance escaped, with all things else well as of him as before; not for any distrust he had in the man, but for the evil success he had in the former Wars. Now whether Amefa neglected his promised return, or could find no opportunity to perform the same, is uncertain; but certain it is, that shortly after he died at Constantinople.

tinople, poisoned as was thought by the commandment of Mahomet, who could no longer endure the sight of him, whom he reckoned the Author of the notable Overthrow received in Amathia. This was the woful end of this noble and valiant Man, well worthy of remembrance, had not his haughty thoughts feared too high with the desire of Sovereignty.

When Mahomet under stood in what manner Isaac Baffa was overthrown, and his Army difcomfited, he was therewith much grieved, and justly blamed the Baffas security; yet such was his credit with his Sovereign, that the matter was in better sort passed over than was supposed it would have been. Nevertheless, Mahomet in revenge thereof would willingly have employed all his Forces upon Scanderbeg, if his more urgent Affairs would have so permitted. For at the same time, besides that great Wars began to rise betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many years after) he was certainly informed, That the Christian Princes were making a strong Confederation against him. At which time Mahomet dissuading openly to sue for Peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practised by such as were sent to redeem the Prisoners, and also by the Samack himself, to persuade Scanderbeg to require Peace of him; assuring him, that if he did but ask it, it would for a long time be easily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg, well acquainted with the Turkish Policy, utterly refused to do. Wherefore Mahomet for the defence of his Countries bordering upon Epirus, sent two of his most expert Captains, Sinam and Hamur, with each of them 14000 Soldiers into Macedonia, expressly charging them not to enter at any time or upon any occasion, into Epirus, or by any means to provoke Scanderbeg; which his Commandment they so well observed, that the Epirotes by the space of almost two years enjoyed the fruits of Peace, although there was no Peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old injuries wearing out with time, at length by the mediation of the fame Captains, a Peace for a year was agreed on betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg. In which time he passed over into Apulia, and there notably aided King Ferdinand against the French, the proceeding wherein, as not pertinent to our History, I of purpose pass over.

A Peace
for a year
concluded
betwixt
Mahomet
and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the Peace before concluded was expired, all things now going on with Mahomet as he desired, he resolved according to his wonted manner to trouble the quiet Estate of Scanderbeg; and so sending a new supply of Soldiers to Sinam-beg, who then lay with a strong Garrison upon the Frontiers of Epirus, commanded him with all his Power to make Wars upon Scanderbeg. Sinam accordingly, with an Army of 30000 Men, entered into Epirus, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbeg, and his Army utterly overthrown, so that but few escaped by flight with Sinam himself. Presently after he sent Aslam-beg, another of his Captains, into the same Service, with an Army of thirty thousand, whom Scanderbeg also in plain battel vanquished at Orida; in which battel Aslam himself was fore wounded, and finding no way to escape, was glad to yield himself Prisoner to Scanderbeg, by whom he was courteously used, and afterwards set at liberty. Following Aslam with eighteen thousand into Epirus, was set upon by Scanderbeg also, and having so part of his Army, was glad by speedy flight to save himself with the rest. After all this, Caracaz-beg, an old Captain and a man of great experience (who had been a great Commander, and a Companion with Scanderbeg in the time of old Anurath) re-quested

quested of Mahomet, that he might prove his Fortune against his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, afflicting him of better Success than before. The long and approved experience of this old Leader put Mahomet in such hope of good speed, that he gave present Order for the levying of such an Army as Caraxa had requested, and for so much more than he had at the first required. With this strong Army, in number almost forty thousand, Caraxa set forward, having before filled the minds of men with the expectation of some greater matter to have been by him done. Scanderbeg understanding certainly that Caraxa was coming, stood more in doubt of the Man than of his Power; and therefore assembled greater Forces than he had usually done before, and to welcome him, sent two thousand of his best and most expert Souldiers secretly into the Enemies Country; who lying in ambush amongst the Woods and Mountains, whereby Caraxa must needs pass, suddenly set upon four thousand Horsemen (the forerunners of Caraxa his Army) who marching disorderly, and fearing no such matter, were in a trice overthrown, and most part of them slain; those few that escaped fled back again to the Army, as if they had come in the post of bring tidings of some happy News to the General. With which to unfortunate a beginning, Caraxa was so discomfited, that if he might for shame, he could have been content to have returned again and gone no farther; yet for his Honours sake holding on his way, he came into Epirus; where whilst he was (after the manner of old men) long in revolving what course to take, he was upon the sudden assailed by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his Men in order of battle. At which time there fell such a vehement shower of Rain, that both the Armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three days together it rained continually (for it was about the later end of Autumn) all which time Scanderbeg ceased not in one place or other to trouble the Turks Camp; so that the old General, partly diffempered with the extremity of the Weather, which for the violence thereof he took to be ominous; and more discouraged with the restless Attempts of Scanderbeg, who with his Army, and retiring back by the same way he came, returned to Constantinople. Where he was well received of Mahomet, that having promised so much, had performed so little; yet afterwards was again by him in some sort commended, for that he had with less loss looked upon Scanderbeg than other his Generals before sent against him.

Mahomet perceiving that Scanderbeg was not to be subdued but with such Forces as he was not then at leisure to employ on him, thought it not amiss to prove if he could by fair Speeches and glorious shews of Friendship get within him, and so bring him to confusion; for which purpose he sent unto him an Embassador with rich Presents, and Letters of this Purport.

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperor of the East and of the West, and of all parts of the World, unto Scanderbeg, Prince of Albania and Epirus, fendeth greeting.

I Think Friend Scanderbeg, that no Acquaintance can be greater, or Friendship more firm, than that which hath grown of long and mutual conversing and living together, and especially if the same have taken beginning from Childhood and tender Years, as you know it hath done betwixt us Two; who have of long time, even from our Childhood, lived together in great Love and Friendship, when as you first lay as Hostage in my Father's Court. Wherefore I desired Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all these things, with others, whereunto your Youthful years were then delighted; and being mindful also of all those things which you have oftentimes done for the advancement of our Empire and Kingdom, and for the glory of the Ottoman Family, I cannot choose but embrace thee with singular Zeal and Affection. For I take God to witness, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleasing unto me in my life, than to love thee with me, and for a while to enjoy thy Company. Neither need I thou to fear any thing to come unto me, for that my Souldiers without my Knowledge or Commandment have of late broken in and spoiled thy Kingdom; which thing as reason required, was unto me exceedingly displeasing; neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy Forces vanquished and overcome; and so received the just Reward of their evil desert, and that all things fall out with thee according to the equity of thy Cause, and as thy Heart could have desired. But to let these things pass, the remembrance of our old Love and Friendship persuadeth me to come to agreement, and to join together with thee in a perpetual League of Amity; to the intent that our ancient Acquaintance and Familiarity, which by reason of long absence is almost worn out, may again take life, increase, and be confirmed. Of which Peace, let these be the Capitulations, if they shall seem unto you reasonable: for I know it belongs unto him that requirerth me the Peace, to appoint the Conditions of the same. First, we require of you freely and cheerfully to suffer our Armies to pass through your Kingdom, for the besieging of the Cities and invading of the Countries subject to the Venetians our Enemies: Then, to deliver unto us your Son John in Hostage, whom we will always use as one of our own natural Children. And afterwards, that our Merchants and Men of Trade, may peaceably come and travel into all parts of your Kingdom with their Merchandise, and there freely and safely use their Negotiations: Last of all, that your Self in Person may at your pleasure safely and without all fear repair unto us, and in like manner return again. In which things if you will yield unto us, I promise in the Faith of a King, to grant unto you and your Kingdom sincere Peace, with perpetual Tranquillity; and that there shall not be any more dearer unto me than your Self; and will never to the uttermost of my Power permit your Kingdom to be invaded or molested by any of our Subjects, or others. Wherefore you shall further receive from us by the mouth of our Embassador Multapha, you may thereto give full Credence. Fare you well. From our Imperial Palace at Constantinople the 10th of May, 1461.

Scanderbeg having received these Letters, and well considered of the same, returned him Answer by the same Messenger as followed.

The Souldier of Christ Jesus, George Castriot, otherwise called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenies and Epirots, unto Mahomet Prince of the Turks, greeting.

Your Letters (most Magnificent) are delivered unto us, wherein you write of your exceeding Love and singular Affection towards us, confirmed as you say by old Acquaintance; which being grown up betwixt us, and by tract of time firmly rooted, as it were into nature converted, shall always retain his force and strength. But fearful as it (seemeth unto you good to awake the same, having of long time and many years lien as it were asleep, and to make a motion that we should enter into a certain new League and Confederation, whereof amongst other Conditions of the League by you propounded, this is one. That your Forces may freely pass through my Kingdom, to invade the Venetians; Unto this your Request, worthy Mahomet, it standeth neither with Equity nor with mine Honour to consent, for so much as the Venetians are my especial good Friends and Confederates. As for that you desire to have my Son John with you in Hostage for the better assurance of the Peace betwixt us, I should peradventure do it (most noble Mahomet) if fatherly affection would give me leave; but since I have no more but him, and he as yet a tender Child, it is not for the good either of him or us, to have him now taken from us, whom as the wife of us to be most tenderly cherished, and carefully instructed. As for that you request concerning your Merchants, that they may freely and safely Traffique into my Kingdom at their pleasure, I can be content thereto, and with heartily that there might be a free Entertrade for our Merchants indifferently with their Commodities into both our Kingdoms. Further, where as you earnestly persuade me boldly and without fear to come unto you, that by such Interview and Personal Presence, our great desire, grown of long absence, might be the better satisfied; in this thing much excellent Disposition, I cannot but praise your high Honourable Office, and commend your good Nature; and would therefore boldly follow your persuasion, if my other urgent Affairs, with the Government of my Kingdom, would so permit. But what shall I do? My Son John (as I said before) but little, and as yet unfit to Govern; and my people (as you know) love always to have something to do, being by Nature a fierce and valiant Nation, whom my Self have much ado to Rule and Govern: For all that I will come unto you according to your desire, expecting only a more commodious time. So fare you well, and love me still. From our Camp the 30th of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had received these Letters, and well perused the same, he writ to him again in manner following.

Your Letters we have received by our Embassador Multapha, wherein you give us to understand, that you like none of the Conditions of Peace by us propounded, but only that concerning our Merchants and men of Trade, that they might freely and at their pleasure use their Traffique and Trade with their Merchandise to and fro, and upon this condition only you grant us Peace. This your Offer we accept of; and all the rest of your excuses we willingly admit; wherefore I promise unto thee (my loving Scanderbeg) and will perform all that thou dost require, and upon this Revision rest, and will so long as I live observe and keep a sincere and inviolable Peace with thee for ever, except thou first give cause of violating the same. And for that purpose have we with our usual and Imperial Seal signed these our Letters, which we by our Embassador Multapha have sent unto thee, as thereby confirming unto thee this perpetual Peace. Wherefore you also (if you be so content) may subscribe, and with your Seal confirm the Ours, that I in like manner may have also your like Consent and assentment. And would further, that you would Command knowledge thereof to be made by open Proclamation through all your Kingdom, as I will in like manner cause to be done through mine. And for the more manifestation of this my love towards you, I would also that you should understand, that of mine own mere motion and bounty, I do freely give unto you all those things, which you by force of Arms have taken from my Father in Albania and Epirus, so that you may possess and enjoy the same, as if they had always been yours and your Ancestors: Wherefore I give, grant, and confirm unto thee and thy Heirs, all the Rights, Title, or Interests, which I heretofore had therein, and from henceforth will always account and repute thee as Prince of Albania and Epirus, and so call thee. And as I have promised thee in the Faith of a King, will never hereafter with Wars molest thee or thine, except thou thy Self give cause thereof. Wherefore after you have with your Seal confirmed these things, you may command them to our faithful Embassador Multapha, to be by him brought home to us, whom I would you should in all things give full Credence. So fare you well, and render us love for love. From our Imperial Palace at Constantinople, the 22. of June, 1461.

Upon receipt of these Letters, a Peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, and the same by publique Proclamations solemnly published through both their Kingdoms, to the great rejoicing of many. Which Peace was for a season faithfully kept, on both sides, until that the Turks lying in Garrison upon the Frontiers of Epirus, began after their wonted manner again to fetch Preys and Booties out of the Country. Of which Injuries, Scanderbeg by Letters complained to Mahomet; who answered that he was altogether ignorant thereof, and seemed in shew to be much offended with the Infolency of the Doors thereof; and forthwith caused many things to be again restored. By which means the Peace before concluded, was still as before continued.

A little before the conclusion of the aforesaid Peace, great Wars began to arise betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, who all this while being in League with the Turk, peaceably followed their Traffique and Trades of Merchandize, little or nothing at all regarding their Neighbours Harms and Miseries, until that now the flame and fire began to take hold upon their own houses, and as it were to awake them out of a deep sleep. For Mahomet after he had subverted the Empire of Constantinople, and driven Thomas and Demetrius the Emperors Brethren out of Peloponnesus (now called Mora) rested not so contented, but by his Lieutenants and other great Captains began to disturb the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their possession Methone, Corone, Neapolis, Argos, with divers other strong Towns in Peloponnesus, standing upon the Sea coast. And now it chanced that about this time, Folus, Mahomet's Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, had by the Treason of a Greek Priest, upon the sudden surprised the City of Argos; and Omar another of his great Captains, having first spoiled the Country about Nisapattum (now Lepanto) entered farther into the Territory of the Venetians about Methone and Corone; making havock of whatsoever came in his way. With which Injuries plainly tending to open war, oftentimes in Council, deliberating with much care what course to take in a matter of so great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were best to send Embassadors to Mahomet, so to make proof if the matter might by fair means be redressed; others on the contrary part deeming it to be to no purpose for to do; forasmuch as such great and manifest Outrages, nothing differing from plain Hostility, could not possibly be done without the Tyrants knowledge and express Command. After the Senators had oftentimes met together, and with many great Reasons debated the matter too and fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing

A Peace concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

Chriftian Religion; exhorting him in all their names to denounce War againft the Turkifh King. Which thing Scanderbeg moft joyfully undertook; and without delay with all his Power brake into the Turks Dominion, burning and deftroying the Country before him as he went; from whence he returned laden with the Spoil there gotten.

When Mahomet had perfused Scanderbeg's Letters, and certainly underflood of the great preparation made againft him in Italy, as alfo of the great Spoil of late made by Scanderbeg, he became exceeding melancholy, as a man much troubled in mind, which daily more and more increafed; for that he faw not the wanted cheerfulness in his men of War, but all full of heavinefs and deffair, as if they had been men already vanquifhed. Nevertheless, he fpeedily took order for the levying of a great Army; forfifying his Cities and ftrong Holds, leaving nothing undone that was poffible for the affurance of his State. And to repress the fury of Scanderbeg's Gent Sereget Baffa with fourteen thousand Soldiers to lie upon the Borders of Epirus, with charge only to attend upon him. Who mindful of his charge, came into Macedonia, unto the City Oorido, now called Alibria, in the very Confines of Macedonia towards Epirus, and there lay with his Army; fome part thereof lodged in the City, and the reft in places more convenient near about the fame.

The coming of the Baffa, as alfo the manner of his lying, was not unknown to Scanderbeg, who defired nothing more than to be doing with him. Wherefore he fecretly in the night marched towards Oorido with twelve thousand Soldiers, and being come within three miles of the Town, lay clofe in ambuff, and upon the breaking of the day sent out five hundred Horfemen towards the Enemy, under the conduct of Petrus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert Captains, to draw him if they could into the Field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded them, that if the Enemy did come forth to fight, they fhould make but fmall refiftance, but retire back as if they had fled, and fo to train him on to the place where the Army lay. Which was fo well performed by the two fkillful Captains, that the Baffa with all his Power was according as they could have wifhed, drawn into the Field, and brought to the very place where Scanderbeg lay; who fuddenly rifing up with all his Army, affailed the Turks on every fide, and flew them as Deer enclosed in a royl. In this Battel ten thousand of the Turks were flain, the Treafurer of the Army with twelve other of great mark were taken Prifoners, and brought bound to Scanderbeg, who were prefently ransomed for forty thousand Ducats.

Scanderbeg having obtained the Victory, returned with triumph into Epirus, daily expecting the coming of the great Army out of Italy; but fatal Defign, the mighty controller of men's high defigns, had not fo appointed. For when Pius the great Bifhop had out of all parts of Chriftendom affembled a great Army (whereof the greateft part were voluntary Soldiers) and all things were now in fuch readinefs, that he had put himfelf upon the way, and was come to Ancona, a City upon the Sea-fide (where Chriftophorus Maurus Duke of Venice came unto him, with ten Gallies well appointed, to have accompanied him in thofe Wars) and all men were now in expectation of fome great victory to have been done; fuddenly he fell fick of a Fever, and died in the year 1464. Whereupon the Army was forthwith difperfed, and all that great preparation frustrated, to the exceeding grief of many Chriftian Princes; and no lefs joy of the Turks, who now rejoiced to fee themfelves delivered of fo great a fear.

About this fame time, Viftor Capella chief perfuader of this War betwixt the Venetians and the Turks, was by the Senate fent General of their Forces at Sea, in ftead of Laurentius, whole year was then expired. He having received the charge from Laurentius, and falling out of Euboea, in fhort time took from the Enemy the City of Adria in Peloponnesus over-against Chelidra, and alfo the City of Lavium in the Gulf of Thellafonica, with the Ifle of Himber. Afterwards landing his Men by night at Pyræus, he fuddenly furprifed the City of Athens (now called Sethima) fometime the Mother of learning, and moft noble City of Greece; and from thence carried away with him into Euboea all the People he there found, as his Prifoners, together with the rich Spoil of that City. Whilft he lay in Euboea, he was perfwaded that the City of Patras in Peloponnesus would be delivered unto him by the Chriftians that dwell therein, if he did but fhew himfelf before it. Whereupon he departed from Euboea, and coming into the Gulf of Patras, landed four thousand Footmen under the leading of Barbaricus, and two hundred Horfemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was Captain. Barbaricus marching towards Patras, was come within a mile of the City; when many of the Horfemen and of the unruly Mariners diforderly feattered and fought after pillage all about the Country. The Turks Garrifons taking this opportunity, fet upon them with their Horfemen, and fo, eafily overthrew them, being fattered and out of order. At the firft encounter, Barbaricus himfelf was flain; Ragius Captain of the Horfemen was taken alive, and carried off upon a fharp flake. Of all them that were landed, fcarce a thousand were left, who faved their lives by flying unto the Gallies. With this overthrow Viftor the Venetian Admiral was greatly difcomfited, yet having conceived fome hope of better fuccels, in few daies after attempted again to have taken Patras, but with like hap as before; for having loft a thousand of his Men about the City, and the reft glad to take their refuge to the Fleet, he was conftrained with great difhonour to depart thence. And fo full of Sorrow and Heavinefs returning into Euboea, oppreffed with Melancholy, there fuddenly died.

The Venetians deceived of the great hope they had conceived of the general preparation made againft the Turks, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their Wars againft fo mighty an Enemy; by their Embaffadors follicited Mathias, not long before chosen King of Hungary, to join in League with them, and to take up Arms againft the common Enemy, offering prefently to furnifh him with a great fum of Money, befide a large yearly penfion for the maintenance of thofe Wars; for which he fhould to his power by Land defend all their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriaticus, againft the invasion of the Turk.

This Mathias ftrnamed Cornutus, was the younger Son of the moft famous Captain Jo. Huniades, whole elder Brother Uladiflaus, a Gentleman of fuch Courage as might well fhew whole Son he was, being not able to digeft the injuries and difgraces done unto him and his Brother, by Ulricus Count of Cilie, and Uncle to Ladiflaus the young King of Bohemia and Hungary; for the defpite he always bare unto their Father Hunadiades, flew the fame Ulricus at Alba Regalis, even even in the Kings Court. Which outrage the young King was glad for the prefent to wink at; and alfo to grant him pardon; as having taken away the man, whole immoderate power well flood not to the Kings fafety; but indeed fearing the Citizens of Alba, and the Men of War, who exceedingly favoured the Sons of Hunadiades for their Fathers fake. For all that, Ladiflaus returning into Bohemia, caufed both the Sons of Hunadiades upon the fuddain to be apprehended, and moft cruelly executed, Uladiflaus being then fift and twenty years old. His younger Brother was kept in Prifon, expecting nothing elfe but to be partaker of his Brothers hard Fortune, as undoubtedly he had, had not Ladiflaus the young King, upon the fuddain, as he was upon the top of his marriage with Magdalen the French Kings Daughter, by untimely death been taken away. After whole death the Hungarians for the love they bare unto the remembrance of Hunadiades, by a military Election, chose this Mathias his youngft Son, then in pri-ge at Prague, to be their King. Whereof Pograbach (who after the death of Ladiflaus, of an old Governor had made himfelf the young King of Bohemia) having fenfely intelligence as he was fitting at Suppers, fent for Mathias his Prifoner, and when he was come, commanded him to fit down at the upper end of the Table; whereas the young Gentleman, being then but about eighteen years of age, and fore abafhed, began to crave pardon. But when the King would have him to be quiet, and to leave the King to quiet his troubled thoughts, willed him to be good cheer, for that he had good news to tell him. Good news, faid he, if it would pleafe your Majesty to grant me liberty. Yea that, faid the King, and more too; and then faluting him by the name of the King of Hungary, brake unto him the wifdom, how that the King by the general confent of the Hungarians, chose for their King. And fo in few daies after, married to him his Daughter; which done, he furnifhed him with all things fit for his Eftate, and Royally accompanied him into Hungary, where he was with great joy and triumph received of the Hungarians; over whom he afterwards gloriously reigned for the fpace of eight and thirty years. In which time he notably enlarged the Kingdom of Hungary, and became a far greater terror unto the Turks, than ever was his Father Hunadiades. And therewithal (which is not to be accounted in the leaft part of his praifes) was always a great favourer and furtherer of good Letters and ingenious Devices.

But to return again unto our purpofe, Mathias having well confidered of that the Venetians had requested, answered them, that they had many times before in like cafe refufed to give aid unto the Hungarian Kings in Predecessors; yea, and that more was, thought it a thing not reaifonable, that any fuch thing fhould be requested at their hands, fo much as they then received no harm from the Turk, but were in League and Amity with him; fo that the Hungarians Kings wanting their help, had many times received good lofs from the Turks, than otherwise they fhould have done, if they had been by their aid. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all fuch unkindnefs, and to grant them what they had requested; promifing the next Spring to invade the Turks Dominion, and according to their request, to reduce them to his prefention all their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriaticus; which thing he moft honourably performed. For with the firft of the Spring he pafed over Danubius at Belgrade with a puifant

Army, and rafed the Forts which the Turks had built thereabouts; and fo entering into Servia, laid all the Country wafte before him; and afterwards laden with Spoil, returned home, carrying away with him twenty thoufand Captives. Neither fo refted, but with great good Fortune maintained great Wars againft Mahomet during all the time of his reign; and afterwards againft Bajazet his Son alfo, wherein he moft commonly returned with Victory; fo that it is of him as truly as briefly written, That no Chriftian King or Chieftain, during more often or with greater fortune fought againft the Turkifh Nation, or had of them greater Victories.

Mahomet delivered of the great fear he had before conceived of the general preparation of the Chriftian Princes againft him, determined now to work his Will upon fuch as were nearft unto him; and afterward not to forget them that were far off. The proceeding of Scanderbeg, with the late overthrow of Sereget with his Army in Epirus, ftruck in his Stomach; in revenge whereof, he now fent unto Balabanus Badera, a moft valiant Captain, with fifteen thoufand Horfemen, and three thoufand Foot, to invade Epirus. This Balabanus was an Epirus born, a Churlus Son of that Country; and being of a Boy taken Captive of the Turks, as he was keeping of his Fathers Cattel, and of long time brought up in fervitude amongst them, framing himfelf both to their Religion and Manners; after long fervice got the credit of a good common Soldier. But when as at the taking of Constantinople, it was his fortune to be the firft of the Turks Army, that gained the Top of the Walls, and entered the City, he was for that piece of Service ever afterwards of Mahomet greatly efteemed; and befide his other great Prefentment, now fent General of his Army into Epirus. Who as foon as he was come to Alibria (a City upon the Frontiers of that Country) fent many rich Prefentments to Scanderbeg, making fhew as if he had been devoted peaceably to lie upon the Borders committed to his Charge, without farther purpofe to trouble his Country; yet indeed waiting nothing more than fome notable opportunity, fuddenly to do him the greateft mischief he could. But to Scanderbeg well feeing into the malice of the man, rejected his feigned Friendfhip and Gifts, and in defiance fent him a Spade, a Mattock, a Flail, with other fuch Inftruments belonging to Husbandry; willing him to take in hand thofe Tools, and to follow his Fathers trade of life, and to leave the conducing of Armies unto men of greater skill and better place. Which difgrace Balabanus took in exceeding evil part; purpofing in himfelf, if ever it lay in his power, to be thereof revenged. Wherefore knowing that Scanderbeg with a fmall power lay not far off upon the frontiers of his Kingdom, he determined fuddenly in the night to fet upon him before he were a ware of his coming, and fo if it were poffible to overthrow him, but Scanderbeg having knowledge thereof by his Scouts, fet forward in good order to have met him. When Balabanus perceiving that he was difcovered, flaid upon the way, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbeg; who had then in his Army but four thousand Horfemen, and one thoufand and five hundred Foot, but all choice men, and moft expert Soldiers, and then lay in a large pleafant Valley called Valchid; At the farther end whereof Balabanus lay alfo encamped, near unto a rough and woody Hill which ended in that part of the Valley. Whilft both Armies thus lay within view one of another, Scanderbeg well confidering the ground the Enemy had taken, and that it was like he would offer him Bartel, with cheerful speeches encouraged his Souldiers; frantically charging them upon pain of his displeasure, That if the Enemy upon the fortune of the Bartel, should chance to flee or to retire, they should not in any case pursue them farther than the Straits of the Hill where by the Enemy lay; gheffing too truly, that he would in so convenient a place leave part of his Army in ambush, as a fire refuge to trust unto whatsoever should befall. When he had thus encouraged and instructed his Souldiers, he rode with his Army, and in good order retired unto the rising of an Hill, which was a few miles behind the place where he before lay; good way behind the place where he before lay; of purpose to have the advantage of the ground, if the Enemy should follow to give him Bartel. Balabanus seeing him retire, and the small number of his Army, thought verily that he had fled for fear; and therefore to flay him who meant no less than to flee, forward in great haste. The Turks thinking upon to great advantage to have found no great resistance followed after Scanderbeg as if they had had him in chase; and by that time they were come to the place where he staid, were by their halt greatly disordered and out of array. Scanderbeg his old truly Souldiers nothing daunted with the halcy coming and hideous clatter of the Turks, received them with great Courage; so that there began a fierce Bartel, with much laughter on both sides, which for a great while stood doubtful. Yet such was the invincible Courage of Scanderbeg's resolute Souldiers, that the Turks (who as then fought in great disorder) were at last put to flight, and with much slaughter chased unto the Straits of the Mountain, where Scanderbeg had before commanded his men to stay. But certain of his best and principal Captains forgetting what he had said unto them; and led on (whether with the heat and fury of the Bartel, or rather with the visible destiny, is hard to say), undauntedly pursued the Enemy into those Straits, whereof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they should not enter; where they were on every side beset with their Enemies, arising out of ambush; and after they had a long time desperately fought as Wild Beasts inclosed with Hunters, at last oppressed with multitude, were together taken and brought to Balabanus, by whom they were forthwith sent to Mahomet to Constantinople. Who as soon as he heard of their taking, is reported with great rejoicing to have said, Now am I sure that the strength of Scanderbeg is broken. The names of the principal men which were there taken, was Mofé Golumbus of Dibra, the greatest Captain of Epirus next unto Scanderbeg himself; Guriza Uladerini, Scanderbeg's Kinsman; Mufachius, Scanderbeg's Nephew by his Sister Angelina; Ginnus Mufachius; Jobannes Perlatas, who valiantly defended Speigrade against Amurat; Nicholaus Berisius, Georgius Chucna, and Ginnus Manafius; whereof every one of them was able to have conducted a great Army, and might worthily have been accounted amongst the greatest Captains of that Age. The taking of these worthy men brought such a general sorrow and heaviness upon Epirus, that the Victory was nothing accounted of, every Scanderbeg careful of their deliverance, presently sent an Embassador to Mahomet, requesting that he might redeem his Prisoners, either by exchanging of others for them, or else for such ransom as it should please him to set down. But he knowing them to be Scanderbeg's best Captains, would neither exchange them for others, nor grant that they should be ransomed for any

Gold; But after he had used them with all the despiteful he could devise, caused them all by little and little, to be slain quick; in which miserable torment they lived fifteen days, and so died. Scanderbeg hearing thereof, was therewith rather encouraged than discouraged; and in revenge thereof, with Fire and Sword entered into the Turks Dominion, sparing nothing that he could either burn, or possibly by any other means destroy.

Mahomet glad of the taking of these notable men (although they were bought with the lives of many of his People) commended Balabanus highly, as the only man that knew how to fight against Scanderbeg; and in reward of his good service, sent him divers rich Gifts, with commandment to repair again his Army, and to proceed in his Wars to happily begun. Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet trusting more unto his Policy, than his Strength, lying at Alberia, sent again divers rich Presents to Scanderbeg, as desirous to live in peace by him; but seeking indeed to bring him to security, and so suddenly (if it were possible) to entrap him. Which thing Scanderbeg well perceiving, rejected his feigned Friendship together with his Presents, sent from a base Peasant. Whereupon Balabanus entered into a new device, and by secret means, with great rewards corrupted Scanderbeg's his Scouts, whereof some were Balabanus's Kinsmen, thought to be to Scanderbeg unknown. By which means he had upon the fuddain in the night oppressed Scanderbeg, lying encamped in Oromychem, if Scanderbeg himself (who commonly spent most part of the night in careful watch) going about the Camp, had not in the silence of the night a far off perceived the coming of the Enemy by the noise of his Horses; and thereupon with wonderful celerity putting his Army in such order as he best could, was ready to receive him; and at last after a great Fight, put him to flight; and having him in chase, slew most part of his Army. Balabanus himself with a small remnant hardly escaping.

Now when Mahomet understood that Balabanus was overthrown, and his Army lost, he was in doubt, whether to send another General, or else again to prove the fortune of the old. But after he had well considered, that Balabanus was a right valiant Captain, and one that well knew the Country of Epirus, and to stay a mortal Enemy to Scanderbeg, he resolved to lay upon him, and not to send any other. So committing to his charge fourteen thousand Horsemen and three thousand Foot, sent him again to invade Epirus; and the more to encourage him, promised to make him King of that Country, if he could subdue Scanderbeg. Balabanus with his Army coming to Alberia, and still in vain plotting how he might overcome his way Enemy; after his wonted manner sent divers Presents to Scanderbeg; which he still scornfully refused. Three months he lay still at Alberia, with nothing more troubled than with his own thoughts; but finding nothing that pleased himself, he determined to adventure by plain force to subdue him. And upon that resolution marched with all his Army into the great Plains near unto Staigrade, whither Scanderbeg came with his Army also, which then consisted of eight thousand Horsemen and fifteen hundred Foot; with which small power he refused not to joyn Bartel with Balabanus, being in number two to one. But after they were come to handly blows, to have seen Scanderbeg's Men fight, a man would have thought them rather to have been raging Lyons than Men, they so furiously furiously assailed their Enemies, without regard of peril or danger, as men nothing afraid to die. Scanderbeg with great skill governed that Bartel, carefully providing for every danger; himself valiantly fighting in the head of this Battle, but not without care of the rest, still sending speedy relief where most need was, and bringing in fresh supplies instead of them that were wounded or slain, performed all the parts of a most worthy Chieftain and valiant Souldier; where most peril was, there was he bravest, and at his presence angels fled, if Victory should stand upon him. But whilst he thus fought in the midst of his Enemies, his Horse fortune to be slain under him, and falling down with him, bore bruised one of his Arms, whereof he complained long time after. The Turks seeing him down, pressed on fiercely to have slain him; but he was quickly rescued by his own Souldiers and remounted. And forthwith encountering with one Suliman, a great Commander in the Turks Army, flew him in fight hand to hand; whereupon such a terror fell upon the Turks, that they began to retire, and after a while to break themselves to plain flight. Scanderbeg purtuing them with such execution, that of that great Army few escaped with Balabanus to carry news home.

The battle at Speigrade between Balabanus and Scanderbeg.

Balabanus now thrice vanquished by Scanderbeg, and in the last Bartel having lost what he could lose, except he should have lost himself, returned to Mahomet at Constantinople, of whom he was sharply rebuked for his great overthrows he had so often received. At what time Balabanus at first gave place to the Kings Fury; but afterwards when the heat was over, he with a large discourse cunningly excused himself, imputing all these mishaps unto the appointment of God, and the will of His Majesty, and in the end told Scanderbeg plainly, That it was but in vain to send such small Armies into Epirus. But if it would please him at once to send two valiant Captains with a puissant and strong Army, who dividing the fame betwixt them, and entering at one time into divers parts of Epirus, might spoil the Country before them, and enclose Scanderbeg betwixt them, if he should adventure to give either of them Bartel; being before resolved neither of them to offer him Bartel, or yet to accept of the fame being by him offered, except the other were also at hand; and by so mutual consent to undertake him, but never single. By which course he promised unto him an ease and assured Victory; for as much as it were impossible for any man to befer, and as it were on every side coupt up with his Enemies, either to escape, or yet to make any great resistance. This persuasion of Balabanus so well fitted the Tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himself to be the man to put his own device in execution; giving him Commission to levy such an Army as he should think sufficient for the performance of that service; and whilst to associate unto himself for his Companion whichever of his Captains he pleased. Balabanus according to his Commission, took muters of the men of War, and made choice of forty thousand good Souldiers, giving choice to Scap Arnauth (otherwise called Jometa Epirus, because he was also born in Epirus, a valiant Captain) to be his Companion; whom he sent with sixteen thousand Souldiers by the way of Thessalia and Grecia into Epirus, commanding him in no case to joyn Bartel with Scanderbeg, until he himself were first come into the Country with the other part of the Army. And so sitting both forward, Balabanus taking the nearer way through Thracia and Macedonia, came first into Epirus with twenty thousand Horsemen and four thousand Foot, and encamped in the Valley of Valchal. Scanderbeg both by his Ephials and Letters from his secret Friends in the Turks Court, having certain intelligence of all Balabanus's intent and purpose, had in readiness against his coming and a strong Army of eight thousand Horsemen and four thousand Foot, all choice Souldiers. And now hearing that he was come into Epirus, and incamped in Valchal, sent out three Ephials to discover in what order he lay; one of which Ephials was Balabanus's Kinsman, that not so known to Scanderbeg; by whose perswasion the other two when they had taken full view of Balabanus's Army, and should have returned to Scanderbeg to have given intelligence of that they had seen, like false Traitors went over to Balabanus, and discovered unto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg; hoping thereby to have some great reward, as their Fellow had before born them in hand. Scanderbeg marvelling that his Ephials returned not again as they were appointed, and doubting that they had been by the Enemy intercepted, and using many times in matters of such importance to trust himself best; presently went out with five lusty Souldiers, and did forth to discover the manner of the Enemies lying. Balabanus like a crafty Fox, mistrusting that Scanderbeg deceived of his first Ephials would for like purpose feed forth others, laid certain Horsemen in secret ambush in divers places, to intercept them if it were possible. These Horsemen lay not so covert, but that they were in good time discovered by Scanderbeg, and his Followers (who with Argus Eyes, pried into every Bush and Thicket as they went) before he was altogether fallen into their danger; and yet but so that he came to handy strokes, where Scanderbeg and his Followers opposed him, and were glad to flee as fast as they could into the new Wood, the Turks Horsemen following them at the Heels. It fortuned that as they were flying, a great old Tree was fallen across the way, which Scanderbeg putting Spurs to his Horse leapt over with one of his men after him; the other four not able to get over, turned back upon the Turks, and there fighting were slain. One of the Turks which so hardly pursued Scanderbeg being well mounted, forced his Horse, to leap the Tree, and fill followed after Scanderbeg; who looking back and seeing but one, turned upon him and flew him; the other Turks having slain four of Scanderbeg's men which could not get over the Tree, returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his Followers, came back again to his Camp; and there with all speed put his Army in readiness to go against Balabanus before the coming of his Companion, with the other part of his Army. Upon which resolution, after he had with cheerful perswasions encouraged his Souldiers, and filled their minds with hope of Victory, he sent forward, and came with great speed into the Valley of Valchal where Balabanus lay. Scanderbeg had divided his Army into four Squadrons; whereof Tamfus had the leading of one, Zacharias Greppa of another, the third was committed to Petrus Emanuel, and Scanderbeg himself conducted the fourth. So fighting forward, he sent before certain Companies of Harquebushers and Archers, to provoke the Enemy and to draw him forth unto Bartel. Balabanus also showed himself with his Army in feemly order before his Tents, but there stood fast and would not stir, expecting continually the coming of his Fellow. Which Scanderbeg perceiving, and that he thought but daily out the time, and as one unwilling to fight had again retired his Army into the safety of his Trenches;

Trenches; drew nearer and nearer unto him, continually skirmishing with such as he sent out, daring him to do the Field, and braving him unto his Trenches, in such sort, as if he would have forced the fame, and by strong hand have fet him out thence; whereas the Turks fretted and chafed exceedingly, inasmuch that they were ready to rise against their General, because he had promised to Mahomet his great Lord and Matter, did what he might to have deferred time; but when he saw that his Fellow came not, and that he could no longer delay the matter; being so continually afflicted and provoked, were ready oftentimes to have issued out without his direction, and no remedy but that he must needs fight, placed his men in good order, and so went out of his Trenches to give Battle, himself leading the left Wing thereof, where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce Fight, many falling on both sides. But Scanderbeg strengthened with the old Garrison of Dibra, and the most expert Soldiers of Dibra, prevailed upon the Turks and forced them to give ground, yet still keeping their order. The Fight was so great in this part of the Battle, that in other places they stood almost like lookers on, expecting the doubtful fortune of their Generals, which thing Scanderbeg perceiving, drew certain Troops out of the right Wing, whereas he saw was least danger, which speedily fetching a compass about, charged the side of the Enemies Army; and again withdrawing themselves, and with wonderful celerity wheeling round, for upon the back of them that fought in the left Wing; so that the Turks there were charged both before and behind, by the Wing of Scanderbeg his Army, fell in other places with a great slaughter. Balabanus with exceeding Courage gained his Enemies, so long as there was any hope left; but when he saw the fortune of Scanderbeg to prevail, and all about him to become desperate, he made flight for himself, and fled out of the Battle as fast as he could. The rest of the Army being in other places before troubled and disordered fled also, some one way, some another, every man as his Fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus escaped, the rest were for most part either slain or taken Prisoners.

Scanderbeg had scarcely well breathed himself after this Victory and divided the Spoil amongst his Soldiers, but that news was brought to him in Post from the Lady Manna his Sister, then lying at Parella, that Jacuppe Arnaus was by the way of Belgrade come into Epirus with an Army of fifteen thousand Horsemen, burning and destroying the Country before him, and then lay incamped in the Plains of Tyranna the less. When Scanderbeg to prove the minds of his Soldiers, had cheerfully imparted unto them such news, as was like to be the beginning of new labours, and perils; they were therewith nothing dismayed, but ready to follow him with such cheerfulness of countenance and mind, as if they should have gone to some great Feast or Banquet; reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a discomfited Army. This cheerfulness of his Soldiers, Scanderbeg took as an assured token of his good success; and having all things in readiness, presently set forward, and in short time came to the place where the Enemy lay. Jacuppe hearing of his coming, removed his Camp into a corner of the Plain of Tyranna, near unto a little Hill, as a place of more safety for his Army to lie in. Scanderbeg having taken the Plain, incamped his Army in the same place from whence Jacuppe was but a little before departed, where he reigned one whole day. The next morning, to terrify his Enemies (who as yet had not heard of the overthrow of Balabanus) he caused divers of the Turks Heads which were slain in the late Battle (which he had brought for that purpose) to be cast before the Trenches of the Enemies; and withal, divers of them which were taken Prisoners, to be shewn; which Jacuppe beholding, in great despair said, I see the evil hap of Mahomet. Immediately after Scanderbeg sent forth five hundred Horsemen to skirmish with the Turks, commanding them, so soon as they were charged by the Enemy, to retire, if happily they might be so drawn into Battle. Which fell out accordingly; for Jacuppe now seeing his Fellow was not to be looked for, and willing also without further delay to try his Fortune, came readily into the Field, and began a fierce Battle; which endured not long; for Scanderbeg perceiving in what part of the Army Jacuppe was, bent his greatest Force that way, and fingling him out, with his own hand slew him. Whereupon the Turks being discouraged, forthwith betook themselves to flight, and in flying were for most part slain or taken. Those which escaped the present fury of the Sword, straggling through the Country by thick woods and blind ways, were by the Country People either slain or taken Prisoners. In these two Battles were slain of the Turks four and twenty thousand, and six thousand taken. And of Scanderbeg his men were lost about a thousand. Scanderbeg and his Soldiers were so weary of the slaughter of the Turks, that when it was told him the next day, that Balabanus was fled but with one Corner of Horsemen, and might easily be pursued if he were well pursued; he said, O let some of our Enemies live to report their own Slaughter, and our Victory. After that Scanderbeg had thus forth vanquished the great Captains, he presently entered into the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions, and roaming up and down at his pleasure without resistance, made havoc of all that came in his way; and after returning to Croia with Victory, brake up his Army, and gave his Soldiers leave to depart, every man to his own dwelling.

Whilst these things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turks to undertake to kill Scanderbeg. These Traitors came unto Scanderbeg as Fugitives, making such show of the detestation both of Mahomet his Tyrannical Government, and vain Superstition, that they were both of Scanderbeg and others, reputed to be indeed the men, they desired to be accounted; and so after they had learned the principles of the Christian Religion, were by their own desire baptized. But Treason against Princes whom God hath in his most mighty protection, cannot be long covered; much less, without his great favourance performed. So furnished it, that these two false dissembling Traitors, expecting nothing but opportunity to perform their devilish device, upon some occasion fell at variance betwixt themselves, and in their heat let some such words fall, as being taken up by some there present, drew them both into suspicion; and thereupon being fairly examined, it was at last by them confessed, that they were sent by Mahomet, of purpose to have slain Scanderbeg; for which their Treason they were both presently executed, as they had right well deserved. When Mahomet understood that Balabanus was overcome, Jacuppe slain, and both their Armies almost quite destroyed, he after his impatient manner fell into a great rage, rage, and became as a Man almost frantic; and afterwards calling together his great Basha's, resolved by their advice, not to lend any more Generals against Scanderbeg, but to go himself in person, with such an Army as should at once make an end of his Wars in Epirus for ever. Hereupon Commissions were directed through all his Kingdom, and an Army raised of two hundred thousand men. Whereof Scanderbeg having certain advertisement, fortified all his Cities and strong holds, especially the City of Croia; upon the fortune whereof depended the whole State of his Kingdom. Into this City he put a strong Garrison of his most valiant and faithful Soldiers, and thoroughly furnished the same with all things necessary for the enduring a long Siege; and left unto Balabanus Perduci (a grave and worthy Captain) Governor thereof. With like care he provided for the safety of his other Cities, and took order that the Country People were either received into the strong Towns, or else conveyed into other places of refuge, and left nothing abroad in the Country for the Turks to prey upon; as he had in like case done long before, at the coming of old Amurath to the siege of Croia, as is before in his life related.

By that time that Scanderbeg had set all things in order, his old Friend Balabanus with fourscore thousand Horsemen (the fore-runners of Mahomet his Army) was entered into Epirus, and ranging over the Country two days, came and fate down before Croia; upon whom the Governor at his first coming made many brave Sallics. In few days after came Mahomet with his huge Army, and there incamped also; who at his first coming summoned the City, requiring to have it delivered unto him, upon such unreasonable Conditions as it pleased himself (as the manner of the Turk is;) whereunto the worthy Governor returned him no other answer, than by continual thundering Shot into his Camp. Whereupon Mahomet caused such Ordnance as he had to be planted for battery; and commanded other new to be cast, of such metal as he had for that purpose brought in masts all which, he did rather to strike a terror into the minds of the Defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the City by force; knowing by his own experience, that it was a place almost impregnable.

Whilst Mahomet was thus busied, and little or nothing prevailed against him, lying abroad in the Woods and Mountains, with a small Army of most valiant and courageous Soldiers, continually cut off the foragers of Mahomet Army, and such as brought in victual or necessities for his Camp; and many times in the night suddenly brake into one another, or either of the Turks Army; and so marching by night, and with continual Alarms never suffered them to rest in quiet. Mahomet seeing his Army to decrease daily, and no hope of winning the City but by Famine, which would require a long Siege; and tearing also to make that same place again famous by some notable mischance which might happen unto himself under the Walls of Croia, as had before unto his Father Amurath; determined to return himself to Constantinople, and to leave Balabanus, with a great part of his Army to continue the Siege. Upon which determination, he committed the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the Siege, to Balabanus, joining unto him eight of his most expert Captains; yet so, as that they should be all at Balabanus his Command. And so leaving with him three and twenty thousand of his best Soldiers, and every one of the other eight Captains seven thousand more, departed himself with the rest of his Army from Croia, towards Constantinople. But by the way as he went he took from Scanderbeg certain small Forts, and with fair promises corrupting the Governor of a place called Chidra, wherein eight thousand Men, Women, nor Child, lay, had the same delivered into his power, upon his Faith before given, That all the Soldiers with the rest of the People should in safety depart thence. But after the Tyrant had them in his power, without regard of Faith or Promise, he caused them all most cruelly to be cut in pieces, sparing neither Man, Woman, nor Child, to the great grief and weakening of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before received so great a loss. And after he had so ragel, he in great melancholy returned unto Constantinople.

Scanderbeg disdaining to have his chief City besieged by Balabanus, (sometime one of the best of his Fathers Subjects) and yet finding himself unable to relieve the same, for as much as the Soldiers were with continual Wars forewinded, and his wary Enemies lay so encamped, as that they were not but by a strong Army to be removed, sent unto the Venetians and other confederate Princes of Albania, Mytilene, and Dalmatia, praying of them aid now at his need against that Enemy, which prevailing against him, would forthwith set upon them. All which Princes promised forthwith to send their Succors. At the same time also he passed over into Italy secretly, and disguised in his habit of Rome, to crave aid of Papal the Second of that name, then great Bishop; by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing that he came for; so cold was his Devotion; only at his departure he gave unto Jamurio, Scanderbeg his Treasurer, a poor Alms of three thousand Ducats.

Scanderbeg returning into Epirus, found all such aid ready as was promised by the confederate Princes, but especially from the Venetians, which was for most part drawn out of their Garrisons of Scutari, Drivasto, Ajaccio, and Durrachino; so that he had in few days in his Army thirteen thousand four hundred choice Soldiers. With this Strength he marched towards Croia; but understanding by the way, that Ionina was within a days journey, coming with a new supply to his Brother Balabanus, he drew out certain Troops of his best Horsemen; and coasting over the Country in the night, suddenly came upon the Turks, and put them to flight; where amongst others, Ionina himself, with his Son Hadar, were taken Prisoners; whom he shewed the next day brought to Balabanus. This exploit he happily performed, he with all speed returned to his Army; and so marching to Croia, by plain force drove the Turks from the Mountain Croina, their greatest Strength, and nearest to the City of Croia. Which thing when Balabanus saw, he with certain Troops of Horsemen did even to the Gates of the City, persuading the Defendants to yield the City, thinking them in the name of his Master such Offers and Promises as he thought might move them more. But they nothing regarding his words, but rather incensed with his presumption, sallied out upon him, and informed him to retire; but he therewith enraged, and full mad for anger, came upon them with a fresh charge, thinking by plain force to have driven them back into the Country. In which skirmish he was by one Georgius Alexius, with a Bullet, thorow quick through the Throat; and feeling himself mortally wounded, fetching pause to his Horse, ran as fast as he could to his Camp, where he presently fell down from his Horse and died.

The Turks discouraged with the death of their General, and the coming of Scanderbeg, rofe the fame night, and with great silence retired themselves unto the Plain of Tirama, about eight miles from Croia. Scanderbeg the next morning sent great forces of Cavalry and other Victuals; which he caused to be forthwith conveyed into the City, and in triumph followed after himself, to the great joy and comfort of his late besieged Subjects; whom he highly commended for their Fidelity, and bountifully rewarded according to their deserts. The same day he sent certain companies of Soldiers to take the frate passages whereby the Turks must needs pass in their return out of Epirus; which when the Turks understood, they sent two Messengers to Scanderbeg (who seemed to be men of good account in the Army) offering in the name of the rest of the Captains and Commanders, to deliver unto him their Horses and Arms, so that they might in safety depart with their lives. Which request Scanderbeg propounding to his Counsellors and Captains, was by them diversly digested. In conclusion, they received this answer from Scanderbeg himself; That as they came into his Country without his Commandment, so should they not by his leave depart thence. The Turks receiving this short answer by their Messengers, and considering that they must needs in that bare Country in short time perish, either with Famine or with the Sword, the same night the night entered the aforesaid Straits, by plain force desperately brake through and escaped, but not without their great loss: for whose escape the common Soldiers murmured grievously against Scanderbeg, and were not without much ado appeased. In short time after, Scanderbeg recovered all such places as Mahomet had before taken from him, and put to Sword the Soldiers he had left for the keeping of the fame; which done, he brake up his Army, retaining only two thousand Horsemen and a thousand Foot for the defence of his Frontiers.

The Turkish Tyrant hearing of the evil success of his Affairs in Epirus, as that his General was slain, Croia relieved, his Army discomfited, and all that he had done, brought to nought; fretted thereat exceedingly, and was therewith so much grieved, that he could not for a season eat or drink, or take rest, his discontented thoughts so much troubled him. In the end, to remedy the matter, he resolved the next Spring to go again in person himself with a most puissant Army into Epirus, and so if it were possible, to make a full Conquest thereof; of which his purpose Scanderbeg understanding, provided for the Spring coming, as he had in former time. Being come, Mahomet according to his former resolution, with a mighty Army entered into Epirus, and there with exceeding labour and charge, first repaired or rather re-edified the old ruins of the City of Valmet, wherein he left a strong Garrison, of purpose to trouble that part of the Country. From thence he marched to Durrachium (now called Durazzo, but of old time Epidamnus) a City upon the Sea-coast, then in the possession of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Roman Empire, but especially for the Flight of the Roman Senate thither, and their entertainment there in the time of the civil Wars betwixt Cæsar and Pompey. This City Mahomet thought to have taken unprovided, and so upon the suddain to have carried it; but was therein much deceived, finding it strongly fortified and manned both by the

Venetians and Scanderbeg. Where when he had there spent some time, and to his great loss in vain attempted the City, he rose upon the suddain, and retiring into Epirus, came and fate down again before Croia, of purpose by his suddain coming to have terrified the Citizens; and vainly periwaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in Durrachium, for that in the affailing thereof he had discovered many of Scanderbeg's men, and thereby supposed him to have been there also; and came to, cause why he so suddainly rose and came to Croia. At his first coming he offered great rewards and large privileges unto the Citizens, if they would forthwith yield up their City; otherwise he threatened unto them all the calamities of War, vowing never to depart thence before he had it; whereunto he received no other answer out of the City than was sent him by the mouth of the Canon, or brought him by many most brave Sallies. Scanderbeg the mean while continually molesting his Camp, and every night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what small purpose it would be for him to lie there long, rose with his Army, and marched again to the Sea side, to a place now called the head of Redon upon the Gulf of Venice, not far from Durrachium, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new City called Clisura, not yet finished; which Mahomet in despite of the man, rased down to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirus were retired into the Mountains, he went to seek them out, and was with great loss by those Mountain People repulsed; Scanderbeg still following them at the Heels, and awaiting all opportunities, daily cut off part of his Army. So that at last the Tyrant, despairing of any good to be done in this Expedition, was glad to depart out of Epirus, having achieved nothing worth his coming, and so, full of discontentment and melancholy returned to Constantinople.

After all these great troubles, Scanderbeg rid over most part of Epirus, to view the state of his Kingdom, and so at last came to Lysla (a City of the Venetians, which he had always especially liked) and there to confer with the Venetian Legate and other the confederate Princes, of matters concerning their state in general, as his manner was; but more particularly how they might take the City of Valmet, which Mahomet had the last year built in the Seigniory of Arimantes Comynar, and much troubled that part of Epirus.

But whilst he lay there, he fell sick of a Fever, which daily so increased upon him, that he became sick even unto death; and now receiving his end, he drew nigh, sent for his Wife and Son, with the Princes and Lords his Confederates, and the Embassadors of the Venetians, into his Bed-Chamber. Where after he had at large with greater pain notably discoursed of his troublesome life led among them, than he had before passed the fame, and carefully forewarned them of the dangers like to ensue, he earnestly exhorted them to continue in Unity and Concord, and valiantly to stand in defence of their Religion, Country, and Liberty. And afterwards turning his Speech to his Wife and his Son, commended them both with his Kingdom to the tuition of the Venetians; who by the Articles of the Confederation betwixt him and them, were in honour bound to protect his Son and Kingdom, during the time of his Minority, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the same. Last words he wished his Wife after his Death, pass over with her Son into Apulia, where they might in safety and quiet live upon such Possessions as he there held held by the Gift of King Ferdinand. And so after he had with most fervent prayer commended his Soul into the hands of Almighty God, departed in peace the 17th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1466. when he had lived about 63 years, and thereof reigned about 24. His death was worthily lamented of all Christian Princes, but especially of the Venetians and Princes of Albania, who had now lost their most careful Watchman and invincible Champion; the sorrow of his Subjects is not to be expressed, every man bewailing him, as the only stay of the Common-weal, and as if with him they had lost all their hope. His dead Body was with the general Lamentation of all Men royally buried in the Cathedral-Church of St. Nicholas at Lysla; where it rested in peace, until that about nine years after, the Turks coming to the Siege of Scadra, by the way took the City of Lysla, and there with great devotion digged up his Bones, reckoning it some part of their happiness, if they might but see or touch the same; and such as could get any part thereof, were it never so little, caused the same to be fer, some in Silver, some in Gold, to hang about their Necks, or wear upon their Bodies; perfwading themselves by the wearing thereof to be partakers of such good fortune and hap as had Scanderbeg himself whilst he lived; which is not unaptly by Gabriel Fairnus of Cremona, thus in Verse expressed:

Epiri intela, illo jacuere Sepulchro:
Quo quondam invitit cinerum ossa Georgi.
Nunc et membra viri, et diffictum in frustra sepulchrum
Intervixit, flarq; cineres, conficta æque
Ossa, nec in gelida sunt, saltem morte quiescent.
Imperque ut si affertur totius cum lande paternum
Diamurum, exalta moriens etate reliquit:
Illic immanes tenuerunt omnia Turcae.
Tum clari Herois venerati nobili bustum,
Ossaque, marmoraque, invictum condencia corpus,
Adjuerant, sibi quisque in partes scila minias,
Tanquam tjs bellica vis, et Martius arder inellect:
Et genium ferat bonum, fortemque uolentem.
Sic que alij tantum virum parat, affluat illi:
Atque eadem diro venerandum præbuit bos.*

In English thus:

The bloody Bane of faithless Turks, and terror of their Name,
Epirus strong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame.
Within that Tomb wherein long since, Great Cæsar lay;
But now those Limbs and Tomb defac'd, are carried quite away.
The remnants of that worthy Wight out of his grave were torn;
And being dead, could find no rest, but were for Jewels worn.
For after he, far spent with age, gave place to fatal Doom.
Forthwith the cruel Turks prevail'd, and all things there posselt:
Who worshipping his stately Tomb, and place of quiet rest, Dig'd up his Bones, and brake the Tomb wherein he did remain:
And gave away he that could thereof some little part obtain.
As if in them some Martial force, or virtue great had been:

Or fortune rare, such as before in him was living seen.
So Virtue, which to others gives a Sepulture and Grave, Beret it him, yet forc'd his Foe in Honour it to have.

Most part of the times of those Wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by Sea and the Hungarians by Land, kept the Turks thoroughly buied. Matthias Corvinus King of Hungary (according to his promise made unto the Venetians) entered into the Kingdom of Bosnia, where by force he overthrew the strong Forts which the Turks had built for the defence of their Frontiers, and manfully drove them out before him, until he came to Yaziga (of some called Jirza), the chief City of Bosnia, which he at length took; and following the course of his Victory, scarcely suffered the Turks to breathe, until he had by force wrested all that Kingdom out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieved, in great fury came with a strong Army into Bosnia, and laid hard Siege to Yaziga, which was by the Christians right valiantly defended, until Matthias with a puissant Army came to the Relief thereof; who so troubled the Turks Camp with continual Skirmishes on the one side, and they of the Town with desperate Sallies on the other; that at length the proud Turk was driven to such extremity, that he was glad secretly to steal away by night with all his Army into Servia; and for half to leave behind him both his Tents and great Ordnance, which (the Turks Historians report) he caused to be cast into the River, because it should not come into the hands of the Christians. Matthias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his Enemies, and relieved his City, followed the Turks into Servia, and took part of that Country also, which together with Bosnia he united to the Kingdom of Hungary. In these Wars, Mahomet had such proof of the Force and Power of Matthias and the Hungarians, that for a good while after he had no great stomach to provoke them farther; for why, the name of Matthias was now become unto the Turks no less dreadful, than was sometime the name of his Father the valiant Hunyadi.

The Venetians at the same time also with their Gallies scoured the Seas, and landing their Men sometime in one place, sometime in another, did great harm in many places of the Turks Dominion near unto the Sea coast. Amongst other their Generals at divers times sent from that State, one Nicholas Canalis succeeding Laurentinus (whom we have before spoken of) as soon as he had received his Charge, came with his Fleet into the Bay of Salonicchi, and landing his Men, burnt divers Towns and Villages alongt the Sea side: And afterwards returning into Peloponnesus, he fortified the Town of Loggicium in the Gulf of Tarax; which work the Turks with their often Skirmishes laboured to have hindered, but in despite of all they could do, it was brought to perfection, and a strong Garrison therein left for the defence thereof; which done, he returned again to Bosnia. Shortly after, he with the same Fleet put to Sea again; and failing alongt the coast of Macedonia and Thracia, surpris'd the City of Amus which standeth upon the mouth of the River Mæandrus; called in ancient time Hebrus, upon which River the famous Cities Andriopolis and Philippopolis are also situate. Canalis after he had taken the spoil of the City, returned to his Gallies, carrying away with him two thousand Captives into Eubœa. At the same time also, the Venetians giving Aid unto Nicholas Duchaine against his Brother Alexius, then at variance for the Principality of Zadrina, near unto the River of Drino in Epirus, gave a great Overthrow to the Turks which came in the quarrel of Alexius.

Matthias King of Hungary, who was King of Bosnia when the Turks

Alexius.

Mahomet not a little offended with the harms done unto him by the Venetians, and perceiving that the Island of Euboea (now called Negropont) was for the commodious situation and strength thereof, the chief place from whence they wrought him all these wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired again, as unto a most secure place of Refuge; determined to send forth at once to be even with those who had so far surrendred place of Refuge; determined to send forth at once to be even with those who had so far surrendred place of Refuge; determined to send forth at once to be even with those who had so far surrendred place of Refuge;

to employ his whole force both by Sea and Land for the gaining of that place. This Island of Euboea is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth over against that part of Grecia which was of old called Bœotia, from whence it is separated with a narrow strait of the Sea; it aboundeth with Corn, Wine, Oil, Fruit, and Wood fit for shipping. The chief City thereof, was an ancient time called Chalcide, and of late time Negropont, by which name also the whole Island was known; albeit the Turks now call it Egriboz; a populous, rich, and strong City, fortified with Walls and Bulwarks, that (in most men's judgment) it seemed a place impregnable. Unto this strong City, Mahomet resolved to lay siege; knowing well that upon the fortune thereof depended the fate of the whole Island. Whereupon he assembled his Army, and made great preparation both by Sea and Land; and when all things were in readiness, sent Mahomet (the great Basha of the Court) with a Fleet of three hundred Gallies, and certain other small Vessels well furnished with Soldiers, Mariners, and all things necessary, by Sea unto Euboea; and with a great Army marched over against the through Acadia, until he came over against the City of Chalcide. The Venetian Admiral hearing of the coming of the Turks Fleet, set forward to have met them near unto the straits of Hellepontus; but after he had by his espials descried the great number of the Enemies Fleet, finding himself too weak, shaped his course to the Island of Sceos. The Basha coming out of the Straits of Hellepontus, perceived where his henchmen were, and being informed with his purpose, he took care to have his intended course without come to Euboea; where at his first landing, he took Sora and Baficon, two small Towns, which he rased to the ground, and from thence went directly to Chalcis. As soon as this great Fleet was there arrived, Mahomet caused a great Bridge to be made of his smaller Vessels over the Strait betwixt Acadia and Euboea, whereby he passed his Army, and so laybayed the City, cutting off both by Sea and Land. And after he had planned his Battery, began most furiously to shake the Walls; wherein he had in short time made fair Breaches, and the sooner, for that one Thomas of Liberina (chief Canoner of the City) before corrupted by the Turks, by signs agreed upon, gave them certain signals, in what places the Turks might best attack; whereby they so aptly planned their Battery, as if they had taken view on the infide of the Walls. Which foul Treason was at length perceived, yet little prevailed the Tyrant thereby; for such was the industry of the Defendants, that whatsoever he had by the fury of his great Ordnance beat down by day, they would rebuild labour returned again by night. Thus was the Siege continued three days, in which space many a sharp Assault was given by the Turks, to their great loss; and the City still valiantly de-ended by the Christians. At length the Venetian Admiral (to the great comfort of the besieged) came with his Fleet within view of the City, making semblance as if he would have given the Turks battel. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to have raised his Siege, and have got himself over into the Main, for fear the Venetians should with their Gallies have broken the Bridge, and to have flut him up into the Mountains, to have sought his safety. The Admiral might have done so to his great praise, if he would as a courageous Chieftain have adventured the matter, as he was earnestly requested by the Captains of every private Gally; who generally grieved to see him so great a Commander, to let slip so fair an opportunity. But he fearing to come any nearer, came to an Anchor and moved not, neither gave any sign of coming to the relief of the City.

The Turkish King, quickly perceiving, and there with encouraged, having now in divers places beaten down the Walls, and made them affailable, brought on his Men to the Breaches, promising them the spoil of the City, with many other great Rewards and high Preferments according to their particular Deserts, whereof he said, He would Himself be an Eye-witness. Hereupon the Turks gave a most furious and furious Assault; which was attended with invincible success, and made such slaughter of them, that the Ditches were fill'd, and the Breaches made up with the bodies of the dead Turks. But such was the number of that populous Army (the greatest strength of the Turks) that the living little felt the loss of the dead: Mahomet continually sending in new supplies of fresh Men, in stead of them that were killed or wounded; so that one could not see them fall, but twice or three times they would rise up, and so successfully, if new Men had sprung out of the Bodies of the dead. Twice they had even won the Breaches, and were both times with wonderful slaughter beaten out again. This deadly and dreadful Assault, was maintained a whole day and a night without intermission. At length the Defendants being for the most part slain or wounded, and the rest wearied with long fight, and unable to defend the Breaches, were obliged almost all to fly out from the Breaches into the Market-place, and there like resolute Men, sold their lives at a dear price unto the Turks. Amongst the slain Christians, were found the dead bodies of many notable Women, who seeing the ruine of the City: chose rather to die with their Friends in defence thereof, than alive to fall into the hands of their barbarous Enemies.

Mahomet being now become Lord of the City, and having lost forty thousand of his Turks in that Siege, in revenge thereof caused all the men that were found in the City alive, to be put to most cruel death, especially the Italians, upon whom he shewed his Tyranny with most exquisite and horrible Torments. Faulstich Governor of the City, with a thousand men who with him were fled into the City, without resistance, he caused to be put to death, without his faithful Promise, that they might in safety depart; but after he had got them into his Power, the perfidious Tyrant without regard, commanded them all to be cruelly murdered. The Governors Daughter a Maiden of incomparable beauty, was amongst the slain taken Prisoner, and for her rare Perfection by them that took her, presented to Mahomet as the Mirror of Beauty: The Tyrant greedy of so fair a Prey, sought first by flattery flattering words and fair persuasion, to induce her to consent to his desire; but when he could not so prevail, he fell into another vain, and began to thrust himself in his own nature, threatening her with Death, Torture, and Force, worse than Death it self, if she would not otherwise yield unto his Appetite. Whereunto the constant Virgin (worthy eternal Fame) answered so resolutely, and so comely to the Tyrants expectation, that he being therewith enraged, commanded her to be presently slain. This horrible and monstrous Cruelty, with the filthy Outrages by that beastly and barbarous people committed, at the taking of that City, passeth all credit. Chalcis thus won, the rest of that fruitful Island without further resistance yielded unto the Turkish slavery, under which it yet groaveth. This was the first time, when the Turkish Empire, or rather to say rather, the general hurt of the Christian Common-wealth, in the year of our Redemption, 1670.

1470. Canalis the Venetian Admiral, who all the time of the Siege, had in the sight of the City lien at Anchor as a looker on, fearing now the City was lost, to be set upon by the Turks Fleet, hoisted Sail, and laded with dishonor returned in haste unto Venice, where he was by the Commandment of the Senate committed to Prison, and afterward with all his Family exiled to Utinum.

1471. Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his Army out of Euboea, and his Fleet returned to Constantinople; the Venetians with their Gallies, attempted to have upon the sudden surpris'd the City, a little before lost. But Mahomet had therein left so strong a Garrison, that when the Venetians had landed their Men, they were again enforced to retire to their Gallies, and to forsake their Island.

Chaleis thus loft with all the Mland of Euzania, the Venetian chose Petrus Mocenico, a valiant and discreet Gentleman, Admiral of their Fleet, in stead of Canalis; and by their Embassadors solicited Sixtus the Fourth of that Name, then Bishop of Rome, and Ferdinand King of Naples, with Lewis King of Cyprus, and the grand Matter of the Rhodes, to joyn their Forces together with theirs against the great and common Enemy; which thing all the aforesaid Christian Princes promised them to do. And the more to intangle the Turk, they do at the same time send Caterinus Zennu their Envoy-fador with rich Presents unto Sultan, to incite Caffians, the great King of Asia, to use him on that side against the Turk; in which Negociation Zennu so well behaved himself, that the next year following, that great King took up Arms against Amobot, and had with him mortal Wars, as shall be in convenient place hereafter declared. Mahomet not ignorant of the proceedings of the Venetians, and that they did what they might to stir up as many Enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were possible) into hatred with the whole World; and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the Christian Princes with the cruelty he had of late used against them of Chaleis, thought it best to abstain them further to provoke them, and so happily to bring all at once about his ears, but for a few days he still kept Constantinople, as if he had been desirous now to live in peace, not meaning further harm; hoping thereby, that although he concluded no Peace with any of them (which indeed he was not desirous of) yet that tract of the night mitigate the inauspiciousness of the fact, and cool the heat of their displeasure; whereby it came to pass as he wished, that nothing worth the speaking of was that year attempted against him; and because the Perjian King was the man of whom he stood most in doubt, he sought by his Embassadors to pacify him, and to withdraw him from the League of the Christians; requesting him, if it were for nothing else but for the Community of the Mahometan Religion, wherein they well agreed, and were thereby the professed Enemies of the Christians, to withdraw his Arms, and in their cause to cease to take up Arms; urging now (for that it so stood with his purpose) that the Religion, whereas otherwise he regarded (as was thought) no Religion at all. But Zennu the Venetian Embassador lying continually in the Perjian Court, so wrought the matter with Ulm-Casim, that he told the Turks Embassadors plainly, That he could nor would not longer endure the manifest injury and wrong done unto him by the Turkish King; and farther, that he had made a faithful League with the Christian Princes, and therefore would to the uttermost of his Power make it known unto the World, that he would effectually perform what thing forever he had promised; and so dismissed them, now no less discontented than were before the Perjian King's departure. At this time the Perjian King from the Turks Court having obtained nothing else then requested concerning the Emperor of Trapezund.

The year following, Mucennius the Venetian Admiral with his Fleet arrived in the Isle of Labos, where he did great harm. From thence he passed the Bay of Adramittium into the Gulf of Asia, and so spoiled the Country about Pergamus. After that he landed again at Cnidus upon the coast of Caria, where he took a great Booty; and so having done the Turks exceeding much harm in Asia along the coast, he opposed Poloponnesus, returned laden with spoil towards Poloponnesus. In his return about the Promontory of Malea, upon the coast of Poloponnesus, he met with Richenfis coming unto him with seveneen Gallies from King Ferdinand; by whom he was certified, that the great Bishops Fleet was ready to come forth also. After mutual Gratulation, as the manner is at Sea, is, the Admirals joyning their Fleets in one, landed at Marbone, now called Maden, the City of the Venetians; where they landed, and having had their Soldiers, their Souldiers, and taken in fresh Victuals, they put to Sea again; and falling through the Islands, landed in Asia, where they were at their first landing encountered by the Country Turks, whom at last they put to flight, and by the space of four days took what pillage they could in the Country; where the Souldiers found great store of rich Booty, especially of Turkey Carpets, which are there made in abundance. From thence they sailed to Halicarnassus, which is a City of Caria (where sometimes stood the famous Tomb which Queen Artemisia built for her Husband Mausolus), accounted amongst the Wonders of the World) where they took a wonderful spoil. There came unto them Nicholas Bishop of Modrasia, with twenty Gallies sent from the great Bishop; whom the other two Generals welcomed with great joy. At the same time also came thither two Gallies from the great Master of the Sea. With this Fleet of eighty five Gallies, they failed to the Isle of Samos over against Ephesus (some place of great Fame, but then altogether (and unpeopled) there to confute their further proceedings in those Wars. Being from Samos, they took their course along the Sea coast of Asia, and landed at Atalia, the chief City of Pamphilia, a place of great Traffique; where they found in the Suburbs of the City great store of many rich Commodities, brought thither out of Egypt and Syria; whereof they took what pleased them, and burnt the rest together with the Suburbs. Unto the City it self they began to lay siege, but perceiving that it was not without great loss of their Men to be taken, they departed thence; and running all along the coast of Pamphilia, burnt and destroyed what came in their way, and so returned back again to Rhodes, where they met an Embassador from Ufuf-Caffian, the Perfian King, to the Bishop and the Venitians, for great Ordinance; whereof that so mighty a Prince was altogether unfurnished. Of this Embassador they understood, that Ufuf-Caffian was entered into League with the Christian Princes, and now busy in making preparation against the Turk. At which time Mahomet required the Venitians with no less harm in Epirus and Dalmatia, than they had done to him in Asia; for now that Scanderbeg was dead, the Turks mightily prevailed upon the weak Princes of Epirus and Albania, with the Countries adjoining. The Christian Fleet departing from the Rhodes, landed in the Country of the Myndians, a part of Caria, and with great spoil returned to the Island of Naxos, one of the Cyclades; from whence King Ferdinand his Gallies returned home, laden with much rich spoil; for now the war was far from him. Yet after the departure of the Kings Gallies, Mocenius with the Legate returned back again into Asia, and there landing their Men, took the famous City of Smyrna in Ionia, and when they had taken the spoil thereof, set it on fire. At which time also they did great harm about Glazomene, not far from Smyrna. So Winter drawing now fast on, they returned, laden with the rich spoils of Asia, the Legate into Italy, and Mocenius into Molione.

The insatiable desire of Sovereignty, whereunto the Turkish King was naturally inclined, had continually armed him, not only against the Christian Princes, but against others also even of his own Superstition; making no great difference betwixt the one and the other, if so he might extend his Dominion. He had long before under the pretence of a friendly Parley craftily circumscribed the King of Assia, a Country in Assia, and having got him within his danger, cruelly put him to death, and by force subduing his Kingdom, left not one of the Kings blood alive. After that he invaded Cilicia, which the Turks call Caramania, where the two young Brethren, Pyramet and Caffambet reigned, and drove them both out of Cilicia; of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to Ufuf-Caffian's Caffambet, the younger assisted by his old Friends, fought by force of Arms to recover again his Inheritance wrongfully by the Turks possessed, and was besieging certain Towns upon the Sea coast, which being taken from the Turks would easily draw all the rest of the Kingdom after them. Mocenius the Venitian Admiral being now with the first of the Spring come upon the coast of Cilicia, at the request of Caffambet, landed certain Companies of Men under the leading of Vittor Saporantius, and certain pieces of great Artillery, where with he so battered the Walls of Sichinnum, that he enforced the Turks therein to yield up the City; which he delivered to Caffambet. In like manner he took the City of Corycus, which he also restored to Caffambet. At last he laid siege to Seleucia, which standeth upon the River Orontes, and was built by King Seleucus, one of the Successors of Alexander the Great, distant from the Sea about five miles; the Governor of this City discouraged with the sight of the great Artillery, delivered the City to the Venitian Captain, who by the appointment of the Admiral restored the same to Caffambet. Who by this means brought again into his Kingdom, gave great thanks unto the Admiral, promising both for himself and for his Brother to be always Friends unto the Venitians. Mocenius departing from Cilicia, landed his Men in Lyria, and harried that Country along the Sea coast. And this Mocenius failed into Cyprus, to appease a great Insurrection there raised against the Queen, who was by her Husband at his death left to the Protection of the Venitians; which Rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadannus Gritius, was by the Decree of the Senate appointed Admiral, and already come into Peloponnus, he with as much speed as he could hasted thither, to give up his Charge, and so to return home again to Venice.

About this time the great Perfian King Ufuf-Caffian began to make War upon the Turkish Emperor Mahomet, for the better understanding whereof, it shall not be from our purpose briefly to shew by what means this Ufuf-Caffian, of a small Prince aspired to the Kingdom of Perfia, and so in short time grew to that greatness, that he was justly accounted amongst the greatest Monarchs of the World then living; as appeareth by these Wars betwixt him and the great Turkish Emperor Mahomet. This Ufuf-Caffian of whom we now speak, was the Son of that Tachretin, who with other poor Princes was driven into Exile by the violence of Bajazet the first, great Grandfather to this Mahomet the Great, Emperor of the Turks, and was again restored by great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Bajazet. By the death of Tachretin, his Son Ufuf-Caffian (of some called also Alymbicus) obtained that small Territory which his Father had in Armenia; nothing answering unto the greatness of his conceits. Wherefore not contented with such Possessions as was from his Father descended unto him, he began to shoulder for more room, with first weak Persians his Neighbours as he thought he might best deal withall; wringing one Province from this Prince, another from that, and thrusting some others quite out of all that they had; and in short time so enlarged his Dominion, that he had got into his hands a great part of Armenia, and was reputed both for a mighty and fortunate Prince. Infomuch that Calo Joannes, then Emperor of Trapezond (whose Power altogether answered not to the greatness of his Sile, being for most part shut up within the bounds of Pontus, and fearing the greatness of the Turkish Emperor Mahomet, whose name began then to grow dreadful unto his Neighbour Princes) gave to him his only Daughter Delfina in Marriage, by such Alliance to strengthen himself against the Turkish Tyrant, if need should require. At which Marriage it was agreed, that Ufuf-Caffian should be in the right of his Wife enjoy all the Kingdom of Pontus, after the death of Calo Joannes his Father, and of David his Brother; and that Delfina should so long as she lived have the free Exercise of her Christian Religion.

By

By this Woman, Ufuf-Caffian had a Daughter called Martha, whom I willingly remember, for that she was the Mother of Hyfmal, afterwards the great King of Perfia, commonly called Hyfmal the Sephy; of whom more shall be said hereafter in the Life of Selymus. Ufuf-Caffian honoured with this Marriage, and strengthened with this new Alliance, ceased not, after his wonted manner, daily to encroach upon his Neighbour Princes; and proceeded so far, that at length he began to lay hand upon a part of Armenia, which was then part of the Dominion of the Perfian King. Zenzia (whom some call Tschekin, which was indeed the name of his Father) reigning then in Perfia, by his Embassadors admonished, and in short commanded Ufuf-Caffian to hold himself content with his own, or at least, with that he had already wrongfully taken from others, and not to presume to come within the bounds of his Dominion, threatening otherwise to take him as an Enemy to his State, and to turn his Forces upon him. With which Embassage Ufuf-Caffian being much offended, gave the Embassadors no entertainment, but commanded them with speed to get them out of his Kingdom, and to tell their Master, That he would shortly himself in person come and debate the matter with him face to face. With which proud Answer from so mean a Prince the Perfian King moved, levied such an Army for the invading of him, as was thought to have been sufficient to have subdued a far greater Prince; and so appointed, set forward toward Armenia. Ufuf-Caffian much inferior to this great King in Wealth and Number of Men, but not in Haughtiness of Mind, and Vallantness of Courage, stayed not to expect the coming of his puissant Enemy, but full of hope set forward to meet him, and by great journeys sought to come upon him before he could have any knowledge of his coming; yet had he then in his Army scarce one man to ten, but all armed with courageous Hearts, and conducted by a most fortunate Chieftain which feared nothing. So holding on his way, at length he met with a great Army of the Perfians, with whom he presently joynted Battle, and after a long and cruel Fight overthrew them in the plain Field, with such Slaughter as might well have weakened the Forces of a right great Kingdom. The great King more enraged than discouraged with his overthrow, raised a far greater Army than before, the very Strength of his Kingdom; resolving now, not to send any more his Lieutenants, but to go in person himself against to depelate an Enemy. All things being in readiness, he set forward, and length met with the Armenian Prince, whom he found as ready to give Battle, as he was at the first. So being both desirous to trie their fortune, they joynted battle; wherein the Perfians were again discomfited and put to flight, and more of them slain in that Battle, than were brought into the Field in the first Army. Zenzia the Perfian King was slain with Ufuf-Caffian his own hand, and Carpisaphus his Son taken Prisoner, whom the Armenian Prince used with the greatest Honour could be devised, giving unto him the Honour and Title due to the Perfian King, taking to himself the bare name of the Protector of the Perfian State. Which he did only to please the Perfians; and to keep them quiet until he had got some more assured possession of that Kingdom. But after he had in the two former Battles broken their greatest strength, and then won the colour of a peaceable Governor got into his power the regal City of Tauris, with the rest of the Cities and strong places of that great Kingdom, and that all men had him now in great reverence and admiration for his great virtues; he secretly dispatched out of the way the poor titular King his Prisoner, (the last of the Posterity of the mighty Tamerlane) and took upon himself the highest place, which admisteth no Partner. Whilst this reftless Prince was thus tumbling in the World, and not yet well settled in his new gotten Kingdom, Mahomet the Turkish Emperor, no less ambitious than himself, had scornfully rejected the Embassadors and Prefences which Ufuf-Caffian had sent; and having shamefully put to death David the Emperor of Trapezond, his Alliance, had converted all the Kingdom of Pontus (which Ufuf-Caffian of right claimed as his Wives Dowry) into the form of a Province, and so united it to the Turkish Empire. Which fo manifest a wrong, Ufuf-Caffian in the newness of his late achieved greatness, durst not adventure to address; but after that he was fully enraged, and had with the course of time overcome all dangers at home, being daily prick forward with the remembrance of the former injuries (still suggested by the importunity of his Wife Delfina, and the sollicitation of the Venitians, to whom he had by solemn promise bound himself) he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to try his Forces upon his proud Enemy the Turkish Emperor. Hereupon he raised a great Army, and being well appointed of all things necessary, passing through Armenia toward Pontus, near unto the River Euphrates was encountered by Musapha (Mahomet the Elder's Son, a young Prince of great hope) and Amurath the great Baffa of Romania, whom Mahomet (fearing such a matter) had sent before with a strong Army out of Egypt, to joyne with such Forces as Musapha had already raised in Asia, fo to withstand the invasion of the Perfians. These two great Commanders Musapha and Amurath joining Battle with Ufuf-Caffian, were by him in the plain Field overthrow; where Amurath the great Baffa himself, with thirty thousand Turks were slain; Musapha with the rest of the Army by shameful flight saving themselves.

Now when Mahomet understood that Amurath was slain, and his Army discomfited, he was therewith exceedingly troubled; but purposing to be thereof revenged, gave order into all parts of his Dominions for the levying of new Forces; so that at the time by him appointed, was assembled a great and mighty Army of 320000 men. Ufuf-Caffian in like manner was in the Field with an Army, nothing in number inferior unto his Enemy. These two Mahomet the Kings, drawing after them, their huge Armies met together near the Mountains of Armenia, where at the first encounter one of the Turks great Baffa was slain, with 40000 Turks. With which hard beginning the proud Tyrant was so daunted, that he could hardly be persuaded to prove his fortune any further, but contenting himself with that loss, was about to have retired; and had undoubtedly so done, if some of his most expert and valiant Captains which might be bold with him, had not sharply reproved him, that having so populous an Army as scarcely felt that small loss, he should once think of returning without Victory. With which their comfortable persuasions he was again encouraged to give Battle. Yet for his more safety he withdrew his Army into a Strait betwixt two Mountains, and with his Carriages fortified the town thereof, as with a Trench; behind which Carriages he placed his great Ordinance, and on either side his Archers. The Perfians as men of great Valour, and thereto encouraged with their former Victories, came on as men fearing no peril, to have charged the Turks even in their Strength, presenting their whole Army before they were aware, into the mouth of the Turks Artillery; which suddenly discharged amongst the thickest of them, brake their Ranks, and took away a number of them. Besides that, the Persian Horfes terrified with the unacquainted thundering report of the great Ordnance, and not to be ruled by their Riders, but starting back ran some one way, some another, as if they had felt neither Bit nor Rider. Which their confusion Mahomet perceiving, presently took hold of the occasion offered, and with his Horfemen fiercely charged them, being now by themselves intangled and out of order. Nevertheless the Persians made great resistance, and flew many of the Turks; but still fighting confidently and out of order, they were at the last enforced to flee, in which Flight a great number of them were slain, and their Tents also taken. Zeinal Ufian-Cafles his eldest Son, labouring to save the Flight of the Persians, was slain with a small shot. So the Honour of the day remained with the Turks; yet they had no great cause to brag of their winnings, having lost in that Battle forty thousand Soldiers; whereas the Persians fell not above ten thousand. Mahomet contenting himself with this dear bought Victory, returned homewards; and Ufian-Cafles leaving another of his Sons with his Army for the defence of Armenia, returned likewise to Tauris. But whilst the Christian Princes were in their greatest expectation, what might be the Event of these Wars betwixt these two mighty Mahometan Kings; they upon the suddain concluded a Peace, and confirmed the same with new Affinity, exciting the Christians quite out of the fame. This last Barrel betwixt Mahomet and Ufian-Cafles, was fought in the year of our Lord 1474, about four years before the death of Ufian-Cafles, who died the fifth of January in the year 1478.

In the time of these Wars died the noble Musapha, Mahomet's eldest Son, at Iconium, having spent himself with reveling amongst his Paragons, or as some write, commanded to die, by his Father, upon this occasion. This youthful Prince upon a time coming to the Court to see his Father (or as they term it, to visit his Father) became anxious of the Wife of Achmet; Bassa, a Lady of incomparable Beauty, and Daughter to Isac Bassa, the chief men in the Turkish Empire, next unto Mahomet himself; but finding no means to compass her in whom his Soul lived, he awaited a time when as the (after the manner of the Turks) layen to bath her self; there as he found her all disrobed, shamefully forced her, without regard either of his own Honour, or of hers. Of this his foul an outrage, Achmet her Husband, with his cloaths and hat all rent for madness, came and grievously complained to Mahomet, craving vengeance for the same. Unto whom Mahomet again replied, Art thou that thy self my Slave? and if my Son Musapha have known thy Wife, is he not my Bondslave he hath had to do withal? Cease therefore thus to complain, and hold thy self therewith content. Nevertheless he in secret sharply reproved his Son for so infamous and dishonorable a Fact by him committed, and commanded him out of his sight; and as he was of a feverish nature, caused him within a few days after to be secretly strangled. Nevertheless, the wrong done unto the Bassa, sunk to deep into his haughty mind, as that he would never admit excuse therefore, but put away his Wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him and the great Bassa Isac his Father-in-law; and in fine, the very cause of his utter destruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Bajazet.

Mahomet delivered of his greatest fear, by the Peace he had lately concluded with Ufian-Cafles the Persian King, was now at good leisure to employ all his Forces against the Christians. And bearing a deadly hatred against the Princes of Epirus and Albania, with a wonderful desire to extend his Empire unto the Ionian and Adriatick, that he might from thence but look toward Italy, which he began now to long after; he determined with himself, first to subdue those Countries, as standing in his way, both for the invasion of Italy, and of the Territories of the Venetians. And forasmuch as the strong City of Scodra (otherwise called Scutary) then in the possession of the Venetians, for the commodious Situation thereof seemed to give him the best entrance into the Countries of Albania, Epirus, Dalmatia, and to such Cities as the Venetians held alongst the Sea coast, he resolved there to begin his Wars.

This City was of great Strength, as well for the natural Situation thereof, as for the strong Fortifications therein made by the hand of man; which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of, but presuming of his own Strength and Power, vainly persuaded himself, that no place was now able long to hold out against him. Wherefore having prepared all things fit for the besieging thereof, he sent Solyman Bassa an Eunuch (whom he made his Lieutenant General in Europe, in the place of Amurat Bassa, before slain by Ufian-Cafles) with eighty thousand Soldiers to besiege Scodra. This great Bassa according to his charge came, and with great pomp incamped round about the City, the 25 of May. Shortly after having planted his battery, he began most furiously to shake the Walls, and ceased not by all means he could devise, to trouble the Defenders; and when he had by force of the Canon done what he could, gave divers sharp assaults unto the City, but was still with great loss vainly repulled by them of the City. Long it was to be declare, how often, and in what terrible manner that warlike Bassa Mahomet, his chief Captain, attempted to have won the City; as also to hear how they of Scodra, directed by their worthy Governor Antonius Laurentius, valiantly defended themselves and their City; nothing was omitted that the Enemy could do or devise for the gaining thereof; but all his devices and attempts were so met withal by the Defenders, that they served him no other purpose but to the destruction of his people. Whilst the Bassa thus lay at the Siege of Scodra, Moccimica having received such commandment from the Senate, came and joyined himself to Griutu the new Admiral, who then lay with his Fleet in the mouth of Bolania, a great River running out of the Lake whereupon the City of Scodra standeth. These two Commanders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderful consent did what they might for the furtherance of the Common good, a thing not common; first they put strong Garrisons with all things necessary, unto Celenium, Lissa, Dirrachium, and other Cities of their Seignory upon the Sea coast. After that, they went up the River Bolania with certain Gallies, and came within sight of Scodra, and there by Fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the Defenders, as with an assured promise of relief; which thing it grieved the Turks to behold, who therefore went about to have shut in those fame Gallies with a great Chain drawn cross the River, where it was narrowest betwixt them and the Sea; but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their Gallies flew in the midst of the Turks, and wounded divers others, and so returned again to Sea.

It was afterward attempted by the aforesaid Admirals, if a new supply might have been put into the City; but the Enemy had so befet the fame that it was not possible to be done. In the mean time, Matthias King of Hungary (receiving a great yearly portion of the Turkish detestation from their Countries against the Turk) hearing that Scodra was besieged, began to make such Spoil in the Turks Dominions bordering upon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Bassa from the Siege of Scodra, to defend his own Frontiers. So the Bassa after he had lien three months with his great Army at the Siege, and lost fourteen thousand of his men, whereof the greatest part died of Sicknes taken by long lying in the rotten morish ground near unto the River; by commandment from his Master, rose with his Army and departed. The Venetians also, which lay all that while thereabout in their Gallies, were toucht with the same contagion; Triphemus Griutu died thereof, and Moccimica the other Admiral fell thereof dangerously sick, but being somewhat recovered, returned home, and was shortly after for his good service chosen Duke of Venice, Marcellus the old Duke being dead. With this discomfourt taken at Scodra Mahomet was so discontented, that he appointed a yearly Fee unto one, to put him in mind daily of the Siege of Scodra.

Solyman Bassa be siegeth Scodra with an Army of eighty thousand men.

The fame year that this great Bassa Solyman had in vain besieged Scodra, he was afterward sent with a great Army into Valacia, where he was so intangled in the Woods and Fens, by Stephanus the Vayvod, that he lost all his Army, and with much ado escaped himself, by the wonderful swiftness of a Mare wherupon he rid.

The year following, which was the year 1476, Mahomet sent out a great Fleet to Sea, under the conduct of Geduces Achmetis, his chief Counsellor and Man of War, (whose very name was dreadful in all places where he came) in hope to have by Treason surpris'd the Island of Crete, but that Plot was in good time by the Venetians perceived, the Traitors executed, and he of his purpose disappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpose for Crete, and sent the fame Achmet with his Fleet into the Exocine (or as the Turks call it, the Black Sea) to besiege the rich City of Caffa. This City was in the ancient time called Theudisfa, situate in the Country of Taurica Charcinis, fast by the Sea side, and had of long time been in possession of the Genowaises, and was a place of exceeding great Trade, until that this great Emperor Mahomet having taken Constantinople, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his Irons and Canns built upon the Straits of Hellipontus and Bosphorus, taken away both the traffique of Merchants unto those Seas, and all possible means for the Genowaises to find Succour to that City; yet it is credibly reported, that one valiant Captain undertook to carry his Company (in number not above one hundred and fifty men) by Land from Genoa to Caffa, not much less than two thousand miles, and worthily performed what he had undertaken. Achmetis coming thither with his Fleet, enclosed the City both by Sea and Land; which divided in it self by reason of the diverse disposition of the Inhabitants, being of diverse Nations, some Genowaises, some Greeks, some Armenians, but most Tartars, could not long hold out, but was in short time given up to the Bassa, upon condition, That the Genoway Merchants, who were there both in number many, and exceeding rich, might in safety depart thence with their Wealth. Which promise the Bassa performed not; but when he was possessed of the City, sent such as he thought good, to Constantinople, and commanded the rest upon pain of death, not to depart thence, or to convey away from thence any part of their Substance. In short time after, the whole Country of Taurica Charcinis and the Turkish Obedience. At which time also the Tartar Princes, namely the Precoptes and Deshmets, terrified with the greatness of the Turk, cowardly yielded themselves as Tributaries unto him; ever since which time they have lived a most fertile and troublefome life, subject to every command of the Ottoman Emperor; for whom they have done great service many times in these Wars, against the Persians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Transylvanians, and Germans, as in the process of this History well appeareth; and as the aforesaid Nations their Neighbours, with others also further off, have even of late to their great loss felt.

Although the Venetians had in these late Wars lost the great and fertile Island of Euboea, with the strong City of Chalcis, the divers harbour for their Gallies; yet held they still divers strong Towns and commodious Havens by the Sea-Coast, both within Peloponessus and without; as Methone, Corone, Tenarus, Naupactus and others; which standing as it were in the bosome of his Empire, Mahomet fore longed after. And therefore to satisfy his ambitious desire, sent Solyman (the great Bassa of Europe) with a strong Fleet into Peloponessus. Who entering the Gulf of Cerinth, at his first coming laid Siege to Naupactus, now called Lepanto, a City standing in the Gulf of Cerinth, in the Country of Scodra near unto Laureis, over against Peloponessus. Antonius Laurentianus (for his late good service done in defending of Scodra) made Admiral for the Venetians, came with speed to Naupactus, and in despite of the Enemy so furnished the City both with men and whatsoever else was needful, that the Bassa now full of hope to win the City, rose upon the suddain with his Army, and in a great fury departed, after he had lien there four months. In this fire returning towards Constantinople, he put certain Companies of his men to shore in the Island of Lemnos, in hope to have upon the suddain surpris'd the City of Coccyus; but as they were about to have entered, they were contrary to their expectation, manfully resisted by such Christians as by chance were next the Gate; where the notable Courage of Muralla (a maiden of that City) was much commended; who seeing her Father slain in the Gate took up the Weapons that lay by him, and like a fury, Laurentianus notably revenged his death, desperately fighting in defence of her Country, with those few which were there at the first; and so kept the Turks out, until the rest of the Citizens (moved with the Alarm) came to the Gate, and forced them, not without some loss, to retire again to their Gallies. Not long after, Laurentianus came thither with his Fleet; but before his coming, the Bassa was departed thence for Constantinople, having in this expedition done nothing that was expected at his hands.

part, sometime another, had subdued most part thereof. And about this time his Army lay at the Siege of Creia; for relief whereof, the Venetians (in whose protection it was) sent Franciscus Contarini, a Noble Gentleman, their Lieutenant, with such Forces as were sufficient for the raising of the Siege. He finding the Turks in the Plain of Trypana, gave them Battle; which a great while stood doubtful; at length Victory inclining to the Venetians, the Turks began to fly; after whom the Venetians made no great pursuit, but contented to have put them to flight, took their Tents, with such Forts as they had raised against the City. Thus whilst the Venetians think themselves in sure possession of the Victory, and out of fear of their Enemies, they were through their own too much security, by and by themselves overthrow: For whilst the common Soldiers having cured their minds more upon the Spoils, than upon the pursuit of the Enemy (the Battle as yet scarce ended) scatter themselves, and the Captains were consulting, whether they should lodge that night (which began then to approach) in the Enemies Tents, or not; in the midst of their consultation, the Turks having perceived their disorder, suddenly returned again upon them, and without great resistance overthrow them, and put them to flight. In which flight a thousand of them fell, amongst whom Contarini the General, and divers others of good place and calling, were slain also. This overthrow the Venetians took a great deal better than that which shortly after followed in the confines of Italy, at the River of Sonim.

Mahomet having conquered a great part of Albania, and daily incroaching upon the Christians, made divers incursions into the Countries of Dalmatia, Illyria, and Cambril; yes, and sometimes went so far, that he and his Turks entered into the Province of Friuli, called in ancient time Forum Julij, a part of the Venetian Seigniority, and so carried away with them many Prisoners, with much Spoil. For remedy whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and wonderful labour fortified along the River of Sonim, from Gorizia, to the Fens of Asquale, the space of twelve miles, and there built two Forts, wherein they continually kept strong Garrisons for the defence of the Country. Whereby the Country People thinking themselves now in safety, began to fall into security (the dangerous sickness of all Common-Weals) neglecting by their careful watch to foresee a far off the Enemies coming, as they had before used.

It fortuned at this time, that Aspa-Beg (whom some call Al-Beg) the Turks great Captain, upon the fuddain when no such thing was feared, came and shewed himself in an Evening upon the further side of the River of Sonim, with a thousand Horsemen; upon the sight of whom, an Alarm was raised in both Forts, and every man put himself in readines, as if they should even presently have joynted Battle; but it was so night, as that nothing could as then be done; yet the Venetian Garrisons joining themselves together, watch all that night in Arms. There was at that time in both these Forts, three thousand Horsemen, and some few Companies of Footmen, all under the command of Hieronimus Novati Count of Verona, a famous Captain of that time; who with the rest of the Captains resolved if they could, to keep the Turks from passing the River; if not, then to give them battle. Marabec General of the Turks Army, taking good view of the place, in the night time secretly conveyed a thousand of his best Soldiers over the River, four miles off, in such a place as the Venetians feared least, deeming it impossible for any man, there to have passed over. The men he appointed to lie close in ambush behind a great Hill, in sight, not far from the other side of the River, and upon a sign given, presently to discover themselves and charge the Enemy. The next morning very early, he sent certain Troops of his readiest Horsemen over the River, which by offering to skirmish with the Venetians, might draw them into the Field; and then as men in doubt whether to fight or to flee, to tell them to do so to the place where the ambush lay. The Venetians had divided themselves into three Battalions; whereof the General himself had the leading of the first, who seeing these disorderd Troops coming to skirmish with them, encouraged them fiercely, and easily put them to flight, (being so determined before) and in that fight suddenly purified them; especially the Counts Son, a valiant young Gentleman, who with others like himself, thought by that days good service to gain unto themselves great Honour. When the Turks General saw that the Venetians following the chase, were gone a great way from the River, he forthwith passed over with the rest of his Army, and followed the Venetians at the Heels; which the Turks which before fled, now beholding, turned again upon their fierce Enemies, and valiantly withstood them. At which very instant the other Turks upon sign given arising out of ambush, came down from the Hill Leicini, with such violence and clamour, that the Venetians therewith discouraged would have fled if they could have told which way; but they were on every side so beset, that there was no way left for them to escape; but were there all slain, except some few, which yielded themselves, and were saved. The other two Battalions of the Venetians, discouraged with the slaughter of the first, fled incontinently, and in flying were many of them slain. In this Battle the Count himself, with his Son, and many other notable Gentlemen, and half the Horsemen were lost. The Turks encouraged with this Victory, the next day spoiled all the Country of Friuli, betwixt the Rivers of Sonim, (otherwise called Lifonso) and Tiliauentum, by the and cruelly burnt all the Country before them, so that at once an hundred Country Villages were to be seen on a light fire together, which stood so thick, that it seemed as if one continual Fire had wholly covered all the face of the Country. The barbarous Turks laden with the Spoil of that rich Country, and driving before them great numbers of miserable Captives, if they had been Flocks, they returned to Sonim again. But when they had passed the River, and had travelled homeward one day's journey, and all men thought they had now been quite gone, they suddenly returned back again, and posting through the Country they had before spoiled, came to the River of Tiliauentum, which they desperately passed, and did no less harm on that side the River, than they had before on the other; and so carrying away with them what they pleased, returned by the same way they came, having filled all that part of Italy with terror and fear. This overthrow of Sonim the Venetians account amongst the greatest losses which they received from the Turks in all these their long Wars.

The next year after Harveit the Turks came again with a far greater power; and passing the River of Sonim, came before the Forts of Adica, where Carolus Forbrebrachin lay with strong Garrison of the Venetians, offering him skirmishes, so to have drawn him into the Field. But the wary wary Captain considering the great strength of the Enemy, and the loss received the year before, would not be drawn out of his strength, but stood upon his guard, expecting to take the Enemy at some more advantage; which thing the Turks fearing, durst not disperse themselves abroad for the Spoil of the Country, leaving so strong a Garrison of the Enemy behind them. And therefore when they had gone about four miles into the Country, they turned their course up into the Mountains (which are part of the Alps) towards Germany, and there grievously spoiled the Mountain People (travelling through those abrupt and high Mountains with their Horses, where men could hardly either go or stand on) and Foot without something to fry upon. And so when they had done what harm they could, taking a great compass about, returned home another way.

Mahomet remembering the shameful repulse he had about four years before received at Scodra, and having the name of that City daily sounding in his ears, determined now once again to gage his whole Forces upon the winning thereof, and to give Peace to his ambitious desires. And so he purposed to take in hand, he gave out order into all parts of his Dominions, both in Europe and Asia, for the assembling of his best Soldiers and Men of War. Now when all things were in readines, and such an Army assembled, as he seldom or never had a stronger; first he sent forth Al-Beg (Warden of the Frontiers) with his Kingdom along the River Danubius, with his eighty thousand of the Soldiers called Achamczis, towards Scodra. These Achamczis are Horsemen, which for their good service, according to their deserts, have certain Lands given them by the King to live upon during their Lives; for which they are of duty bound to serve upon their own charge, as the forerunners of the Turk his Army, whenever he goeth to besiege any place; these be they which first enter into the Enemies Country, burning and spoiling what they can, until they come unto the place appointed; and have this privilege, That so soon as all the Army is come unto the place to be besieged, they may then at their pleasure either depart or stay.

The Governor of Scodra understanding both by common fame and certain intelligence, of the Turks designs, with all care and diligence fortified the Town, and labouring continually both night and day at the Rampiers, as if the Enemy had been already present; and plentifully provided all things necessary for the enduring of a long Siege. The aged and unnecessary People, he sent out of the City into other places of more safety farther off; in whose stead he took in great numbers of strong and able men which dwell in the Country round about; amongst whom were many Admirers taken out of the Gallies and other men of like quality, which got their living upon the River and Lake of Scodra, lusty bodies enured to hardnes, who in the long Siege following did great service.

Whilst this preparation was making in Scodra, behold the Mountains a far off Northward from the City, began to shine with many great Fires, and all the Country was covered with thick smoke, which every hour seemed to draw nearer and nearer; when within short time after, the poor Country People (which as yet were not all fled) with such Traff as they could well carry, came running for life all over the Country to the strong Cities upon the Sea side, crying out that the Turks were come.

The next day, which was the fourteenth of May, Al-Beg with his eighty thousand Achamczis, came into the Suburbs of the City, and there encamped; so that none could go in or out of the Gates; which was not the least part of his charge. To him, by the commandment of Mahomet, had Scander-Beg Governor of Bosna, and Malcoius with seven thousand Horsemen, joynted themselves upon the way. Of this Malcoius it is reported (as was of Augustus) that the majesty of his countenance, with the resplendent beams issuing out of his Eyes (as if it had been the Rayes of the Sun) were of such piercing brightness, that no man was able with moved and fixed Eye long to behold the same. These Horsemen (the forerunners, as I said, of Mahomet great Army) the Christians much troubled, with often Salles and Shot, out of the Town, and flew many of them with little or no loss unto themselves.

When Al-Beg had thus lien before the City ten days, came Tant Gaida the great Baffa of Constantinople with five and twenty thousand Soldiers, and above twelve thousand Camels, for most part laden with Metal in Mass, for to make great Ordinance of, and other necessities for the Camp. The Baffas great and stately Tent of purple colour, was pitched upon the top of an high Hill called the Baffas Hill, because in that place Solyman Baffa had lien in the former Siege about four years before; the Baffas Army lay encamped betwixt the same Hill and the Town. This Tant Gaida was born in Epirus of base Parentage, and from thence by the Turks carried away young to Constantinople; where for his sharpnes of Wit and rare Activity, he grew into such favour, first with Mahomet, and afterward with Bajazet his Son, that he was by them promoted to the greatest places of Honour, next unto themselves; wherein he became so popular, and had so possessed the hearts of the People, that it was suspected of some, he would have aspired to the Turkish Empire himself. Presently after the coming of this great Baffa, workmen were set a work about the casting of the great Ordinance, and making ready of other things for the Siege. The Christians also were no less busie about their Fortifications, the Governor appointing unto every man his charge, and which part of the Wall to defend; yet keeping continually in the Market place certain Companies (with the Ensigns of S. Mark, and S. Steven) to serve as fresh Supplies, as need or occasion should require. Whilst the great Ordinance was in casting, the Baffa caused a great Bridge of Timber to be made over the River, that he might at his pleasure pass over his men, and command both sides of the River. The Christians in the mean time with vigilant Eye so attending the Turks, that none of them could fit within shot, but he was forthwith set off and slain.

The thirteenth of June, Mustapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of Asia (commonly called the great Baffa of Natalia) came also in great pomp to the Siege with thirty thousand Soldiers brought out of Asia; perfonable men, but not accounted so good Soldiers as they of Europe; for it is a common saying amongst the Turks, Tant Men of Europe, and the Hosts of Asia do but service. This great Baffa was honorably met and welcomed by the other great Baffa of Constantinople, and was quartered upon another side of the City, where his rich Pavillion (all of Green) was pitch in a Vineyard about a mile from the Town. Mustapha to prove the courage of his Soldiers, propounded a reward to who ever of them, as durst adventure to go and assault the Walls of the City. Upon which occasion, two two of his Souldiers passing well mounted, attempted to have performed that enterprize. But making what halt they could possibly, they were both slain from the Wall, and one of their bodies recovered by certain valiant Souldiers, which fell out of the Town, and his head being cut off, was upon a Lance set upon the Walls for the Turks to behold.

The fifteenth of June, five thousand five hundred Janizaries came into the Camp, with four white Ensigns; at whose coming all the Souldiers of both the Baffaes Camps gave a wonderful shout, and welcomed them with great joy. These are the great Turks Guard and best Souldiers, in whom the greatest Strength of his Kingdom consisteth, and are called the Sons of the great Mahomet.

After whose coming, Mahomet himself was ran. Three days after, came two more daily expected. Three days after, came two other great men, attended upon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reverence done unto them by the rest of the Turks, seemed to be men of great place and authority; these men desired, that they might with safety speak with the Governor of the City, and the rest of the Captains, to deliver unto them such a Message, as they had for their good (as they said) brought unto them from Mahomet. Which their request being granted, the elder of them, after he had with many glorious words set forth the power of his Master, and what he had done to other great Cities, with their Princes; and further shewed unto what danger they were like to fall, if they should long stand upon their defence; he began to persuade them to yield up the City, assuring them of all kind usage, with many rich rewards from the great Emperor; whereas otherwise, they were to expect nothing but extreme misery and cruel death. Whose answer was in the name of them all given by the mouth of Petrus Paganini, a grave and worthy Citizen, That they were not afraid of the greatness of Mahomet, or of any thing he had done, or could do; and that he should find it hard to enforce them, but impossible to persuade them to deliver their City; and therefore that he might at his pleasure use his Forces against men fully resolved rather to yield unto nature her last due, than to hearken to any composition; and in conclusion told them, that if they should at any time after make any such motion, they should not expect any other answer than from the mouth of the Canon. With which short answer these great men departed, not at all discontented.

At this same time the strong City of Croia (which the worthy Scanderbeg had living for honourably defended, and dying had left to his Kingdom, in the protection and possession of the Venetians) having holden out a year Siege, after that all the Kingdom of Epirus and most part of Albania was lost, for lack of Victuals was yielded up unto the Turk, upon condition, That the hunger-fattened Defendants (who then seemed rather Ghosts than Men) might at their pleasure in safety depart; which agreement the faithless Turk broke and without mercy put them all to the Sword. This heavy news was delivered to them of Scodra by certain Christians in the Turks Camp; whereupon they were much grieved, but nothing at all discouraged.

Whilst the Turks lay at the Siege, the Watermen, of whom a great number lived upon the great Lake of Scodra (being in circuit about one hundred miles) came many times down the River by night, and did much harm in the Turks Camp; for remedy whereof, they were enforced to build certain small Gallies to keep them in, who for all that, many times stole secretly upon them, and much troubled them.

The two and twentieth of June, the Turks mounted two great Pieces of Ordnance upon the top of the Hill whereon the Baffa lay; whereof the one carried a Bullet, made of an hard kind of round Stone, of three hundred pound weight, and the other a Bullet of four hundred, whereof with they began to batter the Town four days; after that, they placed a third Piece of Artillery at the foot of the same Hill; which delivered a Bullet of four hundred pound weight; and the next day they planted a fourth Piece, greater than the rest, about the middle of the same Hill; which carried a Shot of six hundred and fifty pound weight. In this while, eight thousand of the Turks Souldiers, called Ajaci (which are known from the Janizaries by their red Caps, whereas the Janizaries wear white) came into the Camp. And shortly after came Mahomet himself with all his Army to the River of Drimen, whither the two great Baffaes of Asia and Constantinople went with great Pomp and Triumph to meet him.

The second of July, Mahomet with all his Army before the rising of the Sun came to the Camp before Scodra; where after he had well viewed the situation thereof, he is reported to have said, O what a fair and bately place hath the Eagle chosen out for her self to build her nest, and to hatch her young ones in. Divers rich Pavilions were set up for Mahomet himself, but one far greater than the rest, distant from them about a flight floor, which was the place wherein he held his Council; the other were for his own private use. Round about these his Tents, lay the Janizaries incamped, a good distance off; yet so close one to another, as if it had been a perpetual Rampire or strong Trench, wherein was but one entrance, continually guarded with a most strong Guard. Round about the Janizaries lay all the rest of the Army encamped; so that all the Country as far as a man could see was covered and white with Tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is covered over with a deep Snow; and fill more people referred to the Camp daily; so that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his Army of all sorts of People, about 350000 Men, all gaping to devour that poor City; a sight of it self sufficient to have daunted the Courage of right valiant men; but what can be terrible to them that fear not to dy? Against this terror of the Enemy, the Defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable persuasions and exhortations of one Bartholomew a Preacher, (sometimes one of the worthy Scanderbeg's Souldiers) who afterwards giving himself to the study of Divinity, became a zealous Preacher, and in this Siege did notably comfort the Christian Defendants against the terror of so great an Army of Micreants. All this while the battery was still maintained; and the fifth of July the Turks mounted two other great Pieces, whereof the one was like unto the former before mounted, but the other placed upon the middle of the Baffaes Mount, was of an incredible greatness, discharging a Shot of twelve hundred pound weight, and was called the Princes Piece, in whose name it was with much cunning and industry made; with which huge Piece, the Turks even from the beginning of the Siege had threatened the besieged, willing them to expect the coming of the Princes Piece. The next day they planted upon the same Mount a seventh Piece, which carried a Shot of five hundred and fifty pound weight; from which time they battered the City with the aforesaid seven great Pieces, and ceased not oftentimes by night out of their great Mortar Pieces, to cast great Balls of Wild Fire into the City, so to have set it on Fire; whereby divers of the Citizens were informed to uncover their Houses covered with Shingle, and by men appointed for that purpose, to watch the fall of such Fire works, and so to quench the same; which they so carefully looked to, as that the device of the Enemy took no effect at all. At the same time also the Turks out of their Mortar Pieces, cast huge great Stones of incredible weight, which falling from high, did most terribly crush in pieces whatsoever thing they light upon, wherewith the Defendants were wonderfully troubled. In few days after, the Enemy mounted three other great Pieces, whereof one was greater than that was called the Princes, and carried a Bullet of thirteen hundred weight; from which time they daily battered the City with ten such Pieces, as the like have seldom-times been heard of; and the Arrow fell so thick into the City, as if it had been continual Showers of Hail, so that no man could go or well sir in the Streets without hurt. Yet in the midst of all these dangers the Christians valiantly defended the City, and with their deadly shot from the Walls and Mounts exceedingly annoyed the Enemy. The eleventh of July the Turks mounted another great Piece like unto the former, upon the Baffaes Mount, and the same day battered the Walls with an hundred seventy eight Shot of this huge Artillery.

Mahomet having by the fury of his great Ordnance, beaten down a great part of the Wall, and that now nothing stood in his way but such simple repairs as the Defendants had made of Timber and Planks, with Earth cast in betwixt, was in good hope in short time to become Master of the Town; and therefore sent certain Companies of his Janizaries and other Souldiers (which he with continual Supplies of fresh men still relieved) to assault the breaches, so if it were possible to enter the Town, or at leastwise to burn such Fortifications of Timber as the Defendants had made. But that which seemed unto him at first so easie, he found in execution full of difficulty and danger: for the Turks approaching the breach, found there resolute men, a surer defence than any Wall; whose valiant courage forced them out of a wrong Bulwark. So whilst the Turks desperately strive in the face of the breach either to enter or to set fire upon the new Fortifications made for most part of Timber, and the Defendants with no less resolution do what they may to the utmost to repulse them, many were on both sides slain, but especially of the assailants. Which Mahomet well perceiving, and that by that manner of Assault he gained nothing but notable loss and spoil of his best men, caused a retreat to be founded, and his battery to be again forthwith renewed; every day shaking the Wall with an hundred and sixty or an hundred and eighty most terrible great Shot, and one day with 194, the greatest battery that he made in one day during that Siege.

After this great battery, the Tyrant caused a fresh Assault to be given, but with little or rather worse success than before; for though divers of the Defendants and among them some of good place, as Franciscus Patavinus, Franciscus Scavero, and two Italian Captains, and some other of the better sort of the Citizens were there slain with the great Shot, whereof the Enemy that day discharged into the breaches 193, yet were they with greater loss enforced again to retire, and with shame to give over the Assault.

Notwithstanding this repulse, Mahomet continuing his Battery with no less fury than before, still fought by force of his Artillery to open a way into the City; and the third day after the former Assault, gave a more furious and desperate attempt unto the City than before, informing that the Turks were in the breaches come to handy strokes with the Christians, and there made a most cruel and deadly Fight; wherein many fell on both sides, but of the Turks most; yet were there many of the Christians also slain, especially with the Turks great Ordnance. It was a right rushful fight to have seen the Rampiers at the great Gate of the City beaten down flat to the ground, and to see all of the rest of the bodies of the Christians; at which place the Enemy so prevailed, that he was even now ready to have entered; for the Turks so furiously assailed the Defendants, and the murdering Shot from the Baffaes Mount fell so thick and so terribly into the breach, befell the infinite number of Christians, that there were scarce any of the Christians which defended that place, but they were either slain or grievously wounded. But when all seemed now almost defeated and forlorn, and the greedy Enemy even ready to devour his Prey, a new supply of lusty Souldiers well armed, came courageously to the breach, and as Lyons encountering the Enemy, drove him down again, and so enforced him with great loss to retire. Mahomet grieved with this repulse, Shot to be discharged into the City, and afterwards sending for his great Baffaes and other his principal Men of War, declared unto them his mind, as followeth:

I think none of you are ignorant (right worthy Souldiers) that now is it the third month since this City purpose hath by us been most bravely besieged, and with all to give a manner of Artillery and Engines of War impugned, assaulted, and on every side assailed, the Walls thereof unwarily subverted, and the Bulwarks laid flat with the gun his ground, and (as you see) as good as raised: besides Captains that, so oft as we have for our selves Scodra to fight, therefore, I think we have provoked them of Scodra to fight, therefore, I think we have provoked them with assaults. Last of all, as you know, we have left nothing unpurchased, nothing unattempted, which could be devised, the easier to overcome them, being wearied, worn out, and their strength spent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter is not longer to be put off or delayed, but even to morrow before the Enemy can recover his strength to repair his Breaches, let us enclose the City round, and give them a general and terrible Assault: and therefore every one of you make your selves ready, and exhort your Souldiers in the Camp, that the every one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and well appointed for the winning of the City. Now will I prove and know them that are worthy of my Pay. About the Baffa of Constantinople, with thy Squadrons and certain Companies of the Janizaries our faithful Guard, give charge unto the breach: In the mean time, let the Baffa of Asia with his power assault the other parts of the City: let every Man make ready and bring with him what is needful for this general Assault; my mind giveth me, that to morrow before this time we shall win the City: for who is there can resist us? The Town (as you see) is bared both of wall and of all other defence: the Bulwarks and Ditches are laid even, and an easie way for us to come unto it: the Citizens themselves weary with so many fights and assaults faint and want strength; whereas we are full fresh and lusty, they in number few, we almost innumerable: besides that, we have put them in the force of our Artillery, wherewith many the appointed place, and there gave a sharp and cruel Assault at the breach, with such desperate fury, that in a short time they had slain most of the Defendants. Then prefent, and advanced divers of their Ensigns upon the top of the Rampiers. Which Mahomet beholding from the Mount, rejoiced exceedingly, making free account, that the City was now his own; but by that time he had well conceived this hope, new supplies of fresh and courageous men (of purpose reserved for all events) came to the breach, and with great fury, drove them back, clearing the wearied Turks, drove them back, cleared the breach, and overthrew the Ensigns. Which so fuddain an alteration in the breach, wrought no less alteration in the proud Tyrants mind, his hope was turned into despair, and his joy into choler; infomuch that in his fury he commanded all the great Artillery to be at once discharged into the breach, whereby many of his foragedred and courageous Souldiers were slain together with the Defendants. At the same time, the great Commanders and Captains knowing themselves to be in the Eye of their imperious Lord and Master, with their drawn Swords forced the poor Souldiers again forward to the breach; and the more to encourage them, adventured themselves also among them; whereby the Fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Many of the Turks were there slain; yet such was the force and multitude of them which fill the breach to their place, and the Defendants were so few to their number, that the Defendants oppressed with multitude, and overwhelmed with Shot, were hardly able longer to maintain the place, being for most part either slain or wounded. Whereupon a great cry ran upon the fuddain through the City, that every man without exception should forthwith repair to the breach. Which was with such cheerfulfunds done, that in less time than was to have been thought, a wonderful multitude of all sorts of people was there together, encouraging one another to resist the Enemy's danger; and at last when resolved to lay down their lives in defence of their Country, valiantly encountered the Turks upon the top of the Rampiers, and so hardly laid upon them, that notwithstanding their great number, they began now again to waver and shrink back. Which thing the Tyrant perceiving from the Mount, in great rage commanded his Canoners, as fall as they could to discharge the great Cannon into the breach, with such great fury, that many of the Souldiers with them he might also kill some of the Christians, and wital imperiously commanded his Captains, with all their force and power to maintain the Assault, threatening them with most horrible death, if they returned, without Victory. Hereupon the Assault was again renewed, every man (in view at least) set down there to do his last Devoir. But the great Order of the fil playing upon the breach, and the great fury of the Turks, as well as the Christians. Thrice the great Cannon fell amongst the Turks themselves, and sent in funder a great number of them which were foremost, to the great discouragement of the rest; whereof the Tyrant had small regard, so that together with them he might also diminish the number of the Defendants. Nevertheless, such was the desperate fury of the Enemy, that the City was in no small danger to have been presently taken, had not the great supplies from other parts of the City, which they were appointed to bring, who with great Courage resisted the Enemy. Yet the Turks far exceeding in number (and fresh men continually stepping up in stead of them which lay by heaps under their feet, and served them in Read of Steps to get up to the Rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight; at which time the great Ordnance also fore annoyed the Defendants, so that with one Shot (whereby the greatness of the harms done at other times may be gathered) eighteen of the Christian Defendants were slain. As for Arrows, they flew as thick as Hail into the City, so that they obscured the light of the day, and lay in most places of the space of a Span thick; so that for the space of a month after, the inhabitants used no other fuel to burn, but Turkisht Arrows. It was a ruful sight, to have seen the bodies of the valiant Christians rent in funder with the great Shot, and pieces of them cleaving upon every Wall thereabout, every Street was stained with their Blood, the great Ordnance continually thundred, Churches and Houses came racing down, yea the heavy countenance of the Air it self seemed to bewail the misery of the poor Christians; besides, the noise of Trumpets, Drums, and other instruments of War, and horrible cry of the hellish Cannon, was so great and hideous, that it seemed as if Heaven and Earth should have gon together; nothing was to be heard but the very terror of the Ear; nothing to be seen but death, and the very instruments of death. And now in this extremity a fearful cry ran through the City, That without present help all would be loft at the great Gate; whereupon not only they which were whole, (which were the fewest in number) but they also which lay wounded or sick in their beds, chearing up themselves, with Weapons in their Hand ran with speed to the place where the danger was; chusing rather to die, than to be slain in their beds. Thus whilst the Christians of all sorts, and from all parts of the City, ran desperately to the Gate, the Turks were on every side hardly pressed, and in great number many very fresh men fill coming up, as if they had sprung out of the Earth, the deadly sight was by them fill maintained; for the Turks on the one side, for fear of the Tyrant, laboured with might and main to win the City; and the Christians on the other, knowing no hope left for them if they should be overcome, with no less resolution defended the same. In this obliquity of mind many fell on both sides; sometimes the Turks seemed to have the better, and were fristwaly by the Christians put to the world. Which manner of mortal Fight, with doubtful issue, was continued most part of that day, until that at length many being on both parts slain, and the rest for the most part fore wounded and hurt, the fury of the Assault began to allwage; for the Turks now weary of that long and deadly Fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great stomach to mount up the Rampiers, where they saw no hope to prevail, but all things threatening present death. Mahomet beholding the wonderful issue of his men, and that having done all that was possible for men to do, they were no longer fought as men discouraged, and in despair of Victory himself, caused a Retreat to be sounded, which the Turks no sooner heard, but that they left the Assault, and without order ran to their Tents, as men half scared out of their Wits.

Of this Victory, the Christians (as they had good cause) rejoiced greatly; yet was this joy mingled with much sorrow and heaviness, for the loss of such worthy men as were slain in that Assault, many of whose bodies they were glad to gather up by piecemeal, some here, some there, some cleaving on this Wall and some on that; which they, as the time would give leave, honourably buried with the rest of the slain: At which time also, they with all diligence and expedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in such readines, as if they should have presently received a fresh Assault.

and of all things else necessary for defence thereof; but especially with most valiant Soldiers, of purpose chosen out of many of their Garrisons, for purpose of this City. You have no new to do with the weak and effeminate People of Asia, but with the hard and rough People of Epirus. And you know (most mighty Emperor) the strength and courage of this Nation; it is now thirty years that you made War against this People, and have not yet altogether subdued them; and how dangerous and chargeable this War hath been unto you, who knoweth not? It is now six months since we came first before this City: we have extended our forces round about it, we have day and night laid land Siege unto it, we have battered it of long with eleven Cannons; I speak not of other smaller Pieces or Engines of War, with all kinds of Shot and Fire-works, and whatsoever else we could devise. We have many times to our cost assaulted it; what could be done by force, strength, or multitude of valiant men, is already done in the former Assaults: Nothing hath been left unattempted; no policy, no direction hath wanted in your Leaders, neither courage in your Soldiers. What should I recount the innumerable great Shot, or speak of our Arrows and Darts, delivered into the City as showers of Hail? Did all this, or any thing else we could do, any thing terrify these Defendants? Were they not, nay they are not still ready with great assurance and Courage at all allies to encounter us? You take a wrong course, by force to constrain them; they have taken upon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be removed, there shall you be sure still to find them either alive or dead; and what account they make of their lives, you see, they will sell them unto us dear for their Country, and prefer an honourable death before a servile life. Wherefore against men so fit down, policy is to be used; and then whom we cannot by force subdue, let us by delay and time overcome. If you will win Scodra, block it up, build strong Forts, place cannon round about it, and besiege them with good Soldiers, till you make a bridge over Boliama, with a strong Castle on either side, to stop the passage; which done, besiege the other weaker Cities of the Venetians, which are at it were the Limbs of Scodra; and subdue the Country round about, which will be no hard matter for you to do, being Master of the Fields: so must Scodra at length of necessity yield unto you, as of late did Croatia, injured thereunto by Famine. Thus may you in safety without slaughter of your People, come to the full of your desire.

The wholesome Counsel of the Bassa so well pleased Mahomet himself, and the rest there present, that the Assault was laid aside, and present order taken for the speedy execution of that which was so well by him plotted. Whereupon the Bassa of Constantine with his Forces was sent to Zabiache, a City in the borders of Dalmatia, standing upon the Lake of Scutary, not far from Arvivium, which in few days was yielded unto him. The Bassa possessed of the City, thrust out all the Inhabitants, and leaving therein a Garrison of Turks, returned again to the Camp at Scodra. At the same time, the great Bassa of Asia was also sent by Mahomet against Drivassio a City also of the Venetians; which when he had besieged and fore battered by the space of sixteen days, the great Tyrant came thither in person himself, and the next day after his coming took the City without any great resistance. Such as he found upon the Walls, he sent out to the Sword; of the rest he took three hundred away with him to the Camp at Scodra, and there in the face of the City caused them all to be cruelly slain, of purpose so to terrify the Defendants. The next day after, he sent the great Bassa of Constantine to Lyffa, called also Aleffa, a City of the Venetians, situated upon the River Drinus, about thirty miles from Scodra. The Bassa coming thither, found the City desolate, (for the Citizens hearing of his coming, were for fear before fled) for which cause he set the City on fire. Here the Turks digged up the Bones of the worthy Prince Scanderbeg, for the superstitious opinion they had of the virtue of them; and happy was he that could get any little part thereof to set in Gold or other Jewel, as a thing of great price, (as is before declared.) All these things thus done, Mahomet committed the direction of all things concerning the Siege of Scodra, unto the discretion of Alim Bey, who whose persuasion he leaving a great power for the continuing of the Siege, departed thence himself with forty thousand Soldiers, for Constantine, cursing and banning by the way all the Country of Epirus, all the Inhabitants therein, and every part thereof, their Corn, their Cattel, and whatsoever else was fruitful; but above all other things, the City of Scodra, with all that therein was, for that he had never received greater dishonour or loss, than there.

After his departure, which was about the twentieth of September, the two great Bassas of Constantine and Asia, according to order before taken, built a great bridge over the River Boliama, and on either side a strong Castle, to the intent that no relief should be brought into the City either by Land or by Sea. Which work they brought to perfection, and furnished both Castles with Garrisons, Ordnance, and all things necessary, they left Achmet Bassa with forty thousand Soldiers to continue the Siege, and returned themselves, the one to Constantine, the other into Asia. The wary and politic Bassa mindful of the charge he had taken upon him, took such order, that no relief could possibly be brought unto the City either by Land or by Sea. He was so long lying still before it a long time, he brought it length into such a distress and want of all things, that the poor Christians were fain to eat all manner of unclean and loathsome things: Horses were dainty meat, yea, they were glad to eat Dogs, Cats, Rats, and the Skins of Beasts food; it exceeded all credit, to tell at what exceeding great price a little Moufe was sold, or Puddings made of Dogs guts. All these bare shifts and extremities the poor Christians were content to endure even unto the last gasp, rather than to yield themselves into the hands of their merciless Enemies.

Whilst Scodra thus lay in the fids, the Venetians weary of the long and chargeable War they had to their great loss now maintained against so mighty an Enemy by the relief of their distressed Subjects in Scodra, thought it best to prove if they could procure a Peace from the Tyrant. For which purpose they sent Benedictus Trivissius, a great Senator, and a man of great experience, to Constantine; who so well used the matter, that after long debating too and fro, at length a Peace was concluded; whereof the distinct capitulations were, That the Venetians should deliver unto Mahomet the City of Scodra, the Island of Lemnos and the strong Castle of Tenare in Peloponnesus, and pay him yearly eight thousand Ducats; that they might freely after their wonted manner traffique into the Swine, by the Straits of Hellespontus and Bosphorus Thracicus, and other parts of his Dominions. Concerning the Citizens of Scodra, it was comprised in the same Peace. That it should be at their own choice, either to live there still under the government of the Turkish Emperor, or else at their pleasure to depart safety with their Goods whither they would. Trivissius having in this manner concluded a Peace, in his return homeward, the fourth of April found the Venetian Admiral riding at Anchor in the mouth of Boliama, from whence they both by Letters certified the Governor and Citizens of Scodra, in what manner the Peace was concluded with the Turk, and what provision was therein made for them. Upon receipt of which Letters the Governor calling together the Citizens, declared unto them how the case stood; and there with them entered into consultation upon this hard question, Whether they would remain there still in their Native Country under the Turkish Tyranny; or forsaking the same, live amongst other Christians in perpetual exile? But after the matter had been thoroughly debated, and many reasons on both parts alleged; at length it was by general consent concluded, That they should all forgo the City and the House of Bondage, as dangerous both to their Souls and Bodies, and live as it should please God amongst other Christians. So the Turks giving Pledges for the safe departure of the Christians in Scodra, they all at an appointed day with bag and baggage came out of the City, and were by the Venetians carefully transported into other parts of their Territory in Italy, where they lived in peace. The Turks (who have now possessed the City) a while after the departure of the Christians entered the City with great joy and triumph; which, with many others thereabout, hath ever since, to the great ruth of all Christendom, remained in the possession of the faithless Infidels. Thus was the strong City of Scodra lost, and the long War ended betwixt Mahomet and the Venetians; which happened in the year 1478.

Mahomet now, when with the Venetians, sent the same Achmet Bassa (by whom he had been but a little before taken in Scodra) with his Fleet of Gallies against one Leonard Prince of Noritur, Zacynthius, and Cephalania, Islands near unto Peloponnesus; where the Bassa arriving, easily took the same Islands, the poor Prince for safeguard of his life being glad to fly into Italy with his Wife and Treasure, to King Ferdinand, whose high Kinshipman he had married.

About the same time Ali-Beg, firnamed Michael Oglis, Isa-Beg the Son of Cassians, and Bali-Beg, firnamed Malcozogli (men of great account amongst the Turks, and most honourably defended) entered into Transilvania with a great Army of an hundred thousand men, and brought such a general fear upon the Country, that Stephanus Bator, the Vayvod, was glad with all speed to flee unto Matthias King of Hungary, to declare unto him the danger of his Country, and to crave his Aid. Matthias at the same time lay sick of the Gout; nevertheless he took such order by his Captains, Stephanus Choresperus, and Paulus Kinisfus Count of Temeswar; that the Turks were encountered not far from Alba Julia, and there in a great and bloody Battel overthrowen; wherein Isa one of their great Captains was slain, with thirty thousand Turks more. Neither was this Victory gained by the Christians without loss, Bator the Vayvod himself being sore wounded, and eight thousand men slain.

Mahomet in his ambitious humor, had long time desired to have in his subjection the Island of the Rhodes. For why, it grieved him that so small an Island should be in the night his great Dominions in Asia, holden by a few Christians, to the great trouble of his Merchants trading in the Mediterranean, beside many other harms daily from thence received, and to have no feeling of his greatness. But for as much as the winning of that place was thought to be a matter of great difficulty, and in former times unfortunately attempted by some of the Mahometan Princes; he purposed now with good advice to take this enterprise in hand. Wherefore calling together his grave Counsellors and most expert Men of War, after he had declared unto them the manifold injuries received from them of the Rhodes, he propounded the matter; Whether it were best to attempt the winning of that Island or not? Some forward men perswaded him to revenge the injuries done by those Christians, and to subdue that Island, which for the nearness unto Carus, might of right be accounted as part of his Dominion; and not to forbear that enterprise for fear of repulse, so far as he was able to bring more Men to assault it than were Stones in the Wall about it. Others better advised, declared the Strength of the Island, with the Valor of the Defendants; Men always brought up in Arms, as it were chosen out of all parts of Christendom; so that it was (as they said) like to prove a matter of more difficulty than was by some supposed; whereof some of the Mahometan Princes had to their no small dishonour, already made sufficient trial; alleging farther, that that small Island which scarcely appeared in the Sea, was not of that worth, as that he should thereon engage his honour, and the lives of so many good men, and most valiant Soldiers as might be sent for the conquest of a Kingdom. For all that, Mahomet prick forward with the Spurs of Ambition, and continual solicitation of Antoniua Meligalus, a fugitive Knight of the Rhodes, resolved to follow the counsel of them which perswaded the War. This Meligalus was a Knight of the Order, which when he had prodigally consumed his substance, which was great, with two others, Demetrius and Sophianus, made of his own quality and disposition, fled unto the Turkish Emperor; presenting unto him a perfect plot of the City with all the strength both of it, and the Isle wherein it stood, and which way he might with most ease win it. In which service they frankly offered to spend their lives; but hoping indeed, by such foul Treachery to repair their broken Estate. All things being now in readiness, Mahomet appointed Mehmet Pailologus, one of his chief Bassas (the near Kinship of Constantinus Pailologus the last Emperor of Constantinople) General for that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that so great an action. Mehmet embarking his Army, in number eighty thousand, and thoroughly furnished with all things necessary for the Siege, set forward from Constantinople, and with a pleasant gale of Wind, sailed along the coast of Asia the less, towards the Rhodes; where by the way he called unto him Demetrius (one of the fugitive Knights) to learn of him the best means for the safe landing of his Army. As for the Arch-Traitor Meligalus, and chief Author of this War, he was taken sick upon the way; and in the extremity of his sickness, growing both troublesome and loathsome unto the Turks that were with him in the same Gally, was by the Mariners thrown over board alive, crying out in vain for help, no man vouchsafing to have any compassion upon him; and so swallowed up of the Sea, received amidst the Waves, the just guerdon of his Treachery.

At this time Peter Dambovis a Frenchman an Auvergne, a man of singular Government, was Great Master of the Rhodes; whose vigilancy was such, that commonly once in eight days he had certain intelligence what great matters passed in the Turks Court; and therewith of such deep judgment, that he was seldom or never overtaken or deceived with any false advertisements. The careful Grand Master, was not ignorant of all these great preparations, neither of the coming of the Bassa; and therefore had before strongly fortified the City, and so stored the same with all things needful, as might well have served for many years siege; especially with such Shot and Powder, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an especial means whereby the City was afterwards preserved. At the same time, many noble and valiant Gentlemen hearing of the Turks designs, repaired thither out of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, and other places of Christendom, cheerfully to adventure their lives, in defence both of the place, and of the Christian Religion, against the common Enemy of Christianity. The Great Master taking a general view of all the Forces he had, to oppose against so puissant an Enemy, found that he had in the City sixteen thousand able men; in which number were reckoned many Jews and other men of servile condition; who in the Siege following, did right good service. The great Bassa conducted by the false Traitor Demetrius, safely landed both his Army and Artillery in the Island the two and twentieth day of June, not far from the City. At which time the Great Master considering that the safety of the City consisted more in the lively valour of the Defendants, than in the Strength of the dead Walls, or other warlike provision; thought it requisite, as a part of his duty, by cheerful persuasions to encourage them valiantly to withstand the force of their Enemies. And therefore calling them all together, spake unto them, as following:

*The waiting to the Great Master to the rest of the Knights
a d. Secdists, to

At length valiant Soldiers and Fellows at Arms, who see the Turks our mortal Enemies (as we were before advertised, as well by Letters from our friends, as by common fame) breathing after our destruction in readiness to destroy our Churches, our Oratories, our Altars, our Religion, and whatsoever else we account sacred or religious; seeking the ruin of this noble City, and the cruel death of us all; gaping at once, to devour our lives, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And truly as I cannot deny but that the chance of War is doubtful, and the event thereof uncertain; So when I consider your valiant courage and cleanness of Mind, I presently conceive a most assured hope of Victory. They have entered into Arms against us, not so much for any desert of ours, or upon any other quarrel; as for the unsatisfiable desire of Rule, and the great delight they bear against us and the Christian Religion. But to withstand their Fury, and to frustrate their Design, we want neither Weapons nor Artillery, nor Provision for many years, we have a most strong Garrison of Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germans, English, and others, the very Chivalry of Christendom; and that which more is, Christ Jesus our Captain and General, by whose power, we shall no doubt easily repulse the vain force of our most wicked and graceless Enemies. The care we have for the defence of the Christian Faith, wherewith we are by special profession bound, will animate and encourage us, against them which seek for nothing more than to extend their wicked and gross superstition, to the great dishonour of God, and of his Son Christ Jesus. Besides that, we are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germans, and other worthy Christians; they are of Caria, Lydia, Capadocia, and the other delicate Countries of Asia, effeminate persons brought up to pleasure. I say it not to draw you into any manifest or inevitable danger, neither to feed you with vain hope, or to fill your ears with windy words; but that I promise and assure you of, that if this Siege shall continue long, hither will come such strong Aid out of France, Italy, and Spain, as will serve not only to raise the Siege, but to recover again the Empire of Constantinople and Trapezond. Then shall our Enemy see no good end of their Councils; but all their devices so confounded, as that they shall hardly be able by speedy flight, to save themselves. But suppose the worst should happen; which I fear not; would not any man account his life most happy, and his quarrel of Christ Jesus? Truly my great years, and the number of life, now almost spent, in defence of the Christian Religion (as I ever desired) doth call me forth, as one so assured of that good laid up for me, in Heaven by Christ Jesus (whose Battle we are to fight) that I no whit fear any Enemies force or future chance; which for all that, I have as far as I could, and to the uttermost of my power so provided, for, that we will not (I hope) be therewith overthrown; But you therefore of good cheer and comfort (as I know be you are) and show your selves valiant and courageous, which respects wholly in your selves; and as far as all the rest, time, and our discretion shall right well provide, I doubt not.

The valiant Men and worthy Souldiers, resting upon the assurance of their aged Governor, departed every man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Bassa landed his great Army, and sent Demetrius the traitorous Knight, Melchius his Companion, with certain Troops of Horsemen and some Foot, to view the ground, where he might best encamp with his Army. Demetrius in great pride riding about the City, was known by Anthony Damboyle, the Great Masters Brother, by whose leave he filled out with a Troop of gallant Horsemen, and skirmished with them. But the Turks being more in number, cast about to have inclosed them; which Anthony perceiving, turned upon them that were coming behind him, and that with such force, that he slew or wounded most part of them. In this hot skirmish, Demetrius having his Horse slain under him, and himself overthrowen, was there trodden to death under the Horse's Feet; and an end too good, unadvisedly displacing his dead Body, was by the Turks slain, and his Head presented to the Bassa in stead of Demetrius.

The Bassa approaching the City, at the first coming took a great Orchard, which the Great Master had strongly intrenched, and therein placed certain Companies of Souldiers, with some small Pieces of Ordnance; which place it could have been kept, might fully have forced the Defendants to have at their pleasure fallen out upon the Enemy. But they which were appointed to the keeping thereof, either terrified with the sight of so great an Army, or else doubting to be able to hold it against so great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the City; leaving the great Ordnance behind them for haile. In this place the Bassa by the counsel of George Frapaine (a Christian Esquire, of the Rhodes, and now Master of his Ordnance) began to plant his Battery, and so Nicholas his Tower, distant from the City, three hundred paces. But against this place, Damboyle had so aptly mounted two great Bassilisks, that he made him glad quickly to forsake the same; yet finding no other place more convenient for his purpose, shortly after he near unto the same place planted again his battery, of far greater force and strength. Wherein, beside the great Ordnance of greatest charge, he had three hundred smaller Pieces of Battery; wherewith at the first he did small harm, for that this George Frapaine repenting himself (as was thought) of his foul Treason, bestowed the Shot to snail purpose; for which cause the Bassa began to have him in distrust; which Frapaine perceiving, fled by night again unto the Rhodes, and discovered unto the Great Master all the secrets of the Turks Camp. The Turks continuing the battery, had first flaken the aforesaid Tower called St. Nicholas, and beaten down some part thereof; which the Christians with great industry, speedily repaired in best sort they could; for all that the Turks gave thereunto a fierce Assault, by the space of six hours, forcing themselves to the uttermost to have taken it; but perceiving that it prevailed them nothing, they retired, having lost eight hundred of their men, and six hundred of the Turks, of whom the number was not known; and a thousand others fore wounded.

*Eight hun-

Master disappointed of his former purpose, lent his Artillery against the Walls of the City, and with continual battery had made a fare breach. But Damboyle foreseeing the danger, had with great labour cast up such Rampiers with a Countermure before the breach, that the Bassa durst not in any case adventure to enter the breach he had made. For performance of this so necessary a work, the Captains themselves refused not to put to their helping hands; by whose example, all the rest of the People which were able to do any thing, being moved, willingly employed their labour until the work was fully finished.

Whilst these things were in doing, Caly Bassa the younger (a great Courtier) was sent from Adrianople to live with what success the Siege went forward. Upon whose arrival, it was given out through all the Turks Camp, that Mahomet was in person himself coming to the Siege, with an hundred thousand Men, and an hundred and fifty Pieces of great Ordnance. These News (of purpose devised to the terror of the Defendants) being blown out of the Camp into the City, struck an exceeding great fear into the minds of some of the Defendants, and so discouraged the Spaniards, with their high Neighbours that came from Navan, that they began openly to reason in their Conventicles, that it was not possible for the City to be defended against such a power; and therefore after an insolent manner, desired leave to be gone, to the great discouragement of the rest. The Great Master understanding of their doings, first for these mutinous Spaniards, and after he had sharply reproved them of disorder and cowardice, promised to ship them away forthwith out of the City, saying, That he doubted not, right well to defend the City against the greatest power of the Turk, without the help of such base minded Cowards. In the mean time he commanded them to foreclose from their mutinous talk, threatening otherwise to make them examples to others, what it is so much to forget themselves. But these Spaniards shortly after, better considering of the matter, and when a dishonour it would be both to themselves and their Nation; if they should so dishonourably be sent away; repenting themselves of that they had done; came and craved pardon of the Great Master; and to redeem their former fault, in all furies and services during that Siege, showed themselves most valiant and forward men; for all that, the Great Master would never afterwards trust them in any service alone. The Bassa, attempting much and prevailing little; thought it would much further his designs, if he could by any means take the Great Master out of the way, by whose careful policy he saw all his devices still countermined; wherefore to bring this his purpose to pass, he practised by the means of one Janus a Dalmatian, to poison him. This Janus having conceived this Treason from the Bassa, was received into the City of the Rhodes, as a Christian Fugitive fled from the Turks; where he acquainted himself with one Pythius an Esquire, of great familiarity with Marius Philadelphus (of late Secretary unto Damboyle, but as then out of favour and in disgrace, for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutiny.) Janus by the means of Pythius, whom he had now throughly corrupted, fought after Philadelphus, who then as he right well knew, lived discontented, as a fit instrument whereby to work this Treason; for that he was a man well acquainted with the Cooks and Butlers, and other Servitors in the Great Masters House, and himself (aye) there very convenient also. Pythius perceiving of his old acquaintance and familiarity with Philadelphus, and waiting upon his melancholy humor, began to persuade him to revenge the disgrace he lived in, and whilst to shew him the means how to do it, by poisoning the Great Master; which might (as he said) fall out to his greater good than he was yet aware of. Philadelphus making semblance as if he had not dislike of the motion, was desirous to know of him what farther benefit might thereby arise to him, more than revenge. To whom Pythius forthwith shewed the Bassa's Letters to Janus, whereby he assured him, that whatsoever he should promise unto any man for the furtherance of the practice, he would to the full perform the same. Philadelphus having got full understanding of the Treason, presently discovered the same to Damboyle. By whose commandment, Janus and Pythius were traitrawise apprehended, and being examined, confessed the Treason; for which Janus lost his Head, and Pythius (as he had well deserved) was shamefully hanged. Philadelphus for his Fidelity, was pardoned his former error, and again received into the Great Masters favour.

The Bassa understanding that the Treason was discovered, and the Traitors executed, was much grieved therewith. Nevertheless, he ceased not with continual battery to shake the City, but especially the Tower of St. Nicholas, for the afflicting whereof, he made wonderful preparation. Amongst other things, he had framed a great Bridge, staid with strong Ropes and Cables, over a short fret of the Sea, betwixt the place of his Battery and the same Tower, wherein six men might march abreast; in which device he reposed great hope. But as the Turks were making fast this Bridge, and had (as they thought) brought the work to a good perfection; Geronius Rogers an Englishman of great courage, and very skilful in Sea matters, found means by night to cut and break in sunder all the Ropes and Cables wherewith the Bridge was staid; which now too late, was by the violence of the Sea quickly carried away, and the Turkish shipper of their purpose. For which good service he was by the Great Master honourably rewarded, and of him in public audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious Battery by the Bassa still maintained, and a new Bridge framed upon small Boats and Lighters, fast moored with Cables and Anchors; and divers Pieces of great Ordnance placed in Fuils and Gallies. So that the Tower was at one time battered both by Sea and Land, the Defendants affrighted with small Shot and Arrows innumerable, and the Tower as the same instant desperately sealed. But Damboyle had so placed his great Ordnance, that with the force thereof the Bridge was broken in sunder, for which their great Fuils sunk, with great store both of Men and Ordnance; the Defendants also in the Tower, with Shot, Timber, Stones, and other such like things provided for that purpose, grievously overwhelmed the Turks that were scaling the Walls and beat them down with great slaughter. This hot Assault was desperately maintained by the Turks from three a clock in the morning until ten; when the Baffa feeling no hope to prevail, gave over the Assault, having therein lost above two thousand five hundred men; whose dead bodies shortly after driven on shore, were spoiled by the Christians. The same night two Mercenary Souldiers of Crete, came upon to have fed into the Enemy, were apprehended and put to death. And George Frapane, who in the beginning of the Siege fled from the Turks, now again vehemently suspected of Treason, was executed also.

Thus neither Force nor Treason prevailing, the Baffa because he would leave nothing unproved that might better his cause, sent certain Messengers unto the Great Master, offering to him in the name of the Turkish Emperor, great Rewards, with many honourable Prefereiments, if he would yield up the City, which he could not (as they would have perwaded him) long hold against so mighty an Enemy; wishing him now in his dealing either not to refuse such honourable and princely Offers, for fear he were afterwards constrained to accept of far worse, or else through his desperate wilfulness plunge himself and his People into such extreme peril, as should be impossible for him or them to find any way out of. Whereunto the Great Master in his brief answer, That he would not willingly in his free estate use the counsel of his Enemy; nor in the great and distressful life cheerfully to yield his Life unto Almighty God, to whom he did owe it; and that with far better Will than to yield up the City upon any conditions, bear they never so fair a show of honour or profit. The Messengers perceiving his constant resolution, rather to die than to yield his City, began (according to instructions before given them by the Baffa) to temper with him another way, and to persuade him to yield unto the mighty Emperor some small yearly Tribute or other Homage, as an acknowledgment of his greatness, and so to live as his Friend in Peace. But the Great Master knowing by the woful example of others, that in that small request lay included the beginning of the Turkish Thraldom and Slavery; utterly refused to pay him the least Tribute, or to do him the least homage that could be devised. With which answer the Messengers returned, having obtained nothing of that they were sent for.

The resolute answer of the Great Master, reported by the aforesaid Messengers unto the Baffa, troubled him exceedingly; for though he had small hope by force to win the City, yet he was always in hope until now, at his pleasure, to forsake the Siege, with some such reasonable composition as might stand with his honour. But this nothing remained now, but by plain force to constrain his Enemies, he resolved for the safeguard of his honour, in that extremity to use that extreme remedy; wherefore besides the great Pieces of Battery he had already placed against the Walls, he mounted divers smaller Pieces much higher, thereby the more to annoy the Defendants by beating down of their Churches, and high built Houses. His Ordnance thus placed, he battered the City day and night for the space of four days together without intermission; during which time, the Christians out of the City spared not, liberally to bestow their Shot among their Enemies also; so that the Air seemed to grow thick; and the light of the day to be darkened with the smok of the great Ordnance; and the great Shot came so thick into the City, that the fearful Women and Children were glad to shroud themselves from the danger thereof, in Cellars and Caves under ground. So long continued this great Battery, that at length the strength of the Wall gave place to the fury of the Canon, and a fair breach was laid open for the Enemy to enter; which was no sooner made, but that with the first show thereof the Turks gave thereunto a desperate Assault; and prevailing by reason of their multitude, had upon the suddain recovered the top of the Walls, and there let up some of their Ensigns; but the Christians speedily coming in on every side to the defence of the breach, they were again quickly repulsed and beaten down into the Ditches, out of which most of them never rose more. At which time the Turks in another place by their scaling Ladders had gained the top of the Walls, and there advanced their Ensigns also, and were now five hundred of them entered the City and came into the Street called the Jesus-Street, where they were encountered by the Great Master and his Followers, and all slain that were already entered, and their Ensigns that stood upon the Walls thrown down. The rest yet scaling the Walls, and ignorant of the fortune of their Fellows, were likewise beaten from the Walls, and with wonderful slaughter rejected. So that the Baffa not able any longer to endure the slaughter of his men, being in both places repulsed, caused a Retreat to be founded, and left the Assault; wherein he had lost of his most forward men about five thousand, with small loss of the Christians. In this Assault, the Great Master himself received five wounds, whereof one under his right Pap was thought to have been deadly; which yet afterward was very well cured with the rest.

After that the Baffa had by the space of three months to small purpose spent all his Forces and Devices upon the City, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raise his Siege and depart, or to tarry and expect some better fortune, which in all his former actions had seemed almost to have waited upon him; to forsake the Siege, was dishonourable; and to continue it without hope, presented no less danger. Besides that, in the former Assaults he had already lost nine thousand of his best Souldiers, and all the rest of his Army was filled with heaviness and despair, to hear the woful sighing and groaning of their Fellows of whom fifteen thousand lay dispersed in the Camp fore wounded, and ready many of them to give up the Ghost; and also but even a little before, two great Ships sent from Ferdinand King of Naples with Men and Munition, were in despite of all the Turks Gallies safely arrived at the Rhodes, to the great joy and encouragement of the besieged, and no less discontentment of the Turks. Whilst the Baffa was thus deliberating what course to take, a rumor was raised in the Camp, That the Christian Princes were coming with great power to relieve the Town; with which news the whole Army was exceedingly troubled; whereupon he raised his Siege. Some others say, that Mahomet hearing of the evil success of his Army in the Island of the Rhodes, with the difficulty of the Siege, and now ready to go in person himself against the Sultan of Egypt, sent for the Baffa, and that so the Siege was raised. Howsoever it was, the Baffa before his departure caused all the Vines and Trees growing in that part of the Island, to be cut down and spoiled; and so after he had poured forth his fury fury upon the senseless Creatures, which he could not according to his desire exercise upon the people, again embarked his Army, and with thame departed, the twentieth of August.

At the same time that the Baffa was thus besieged, Mahomet sent his old and most expert Captain Achmetes Baffa, with a great Fleet and a strong Army to make an entrance into Italy (for no Kingdom was so strong, which the ambitious Tyrant in the pride of his heart thought not he might now command) and having long before conquered Constantinople, otherwise called New Rome, was still dreaming (I wot not what) of the conquest of Old Rome also. The malicious Baffa according to his great Masters desires, embarked his Army at Valona (otherwise called Aulena) a Sea Town in the borders of Macedonia; and from thence passing directly over that narrow Sea, which is in breadth about sixty miles, landed his men in that rich and fertile part of this day called Ortranto, (now Puglia) near unto the old and famous City Hydruntum, at this day called Otranto; where as soon as this warlike Baffa had landed his forces, he foraged all that rich Country along the sea coast, and took such infinite spoil as might well have satisfied the greedy desire both of himself and of his hungry Souldiers, all which rich booty he caused to be conveyed into his Gallies. So when he had at his pleasure ranged up and down the Country by the space of fourteen days, and saw that none made head against him, he laid siege to Ortranto, the chief City of that Country, and as it were the Key of that Country; and having with such Ordnance as he took out of his Gallies, made a breach, easily entered the same, and so without any great loss took the City. A thing not greatly to be marvelled at, forasmuch as it was but weakly manned, and more weakly defended, by men altogether living in security in the midst of their Wealth and Pleasure. The Archbishop, who Carlo the Governor, and the chief men of the City, for safeguard of their lives fled into the great Cathedral Church, as into a Sanctuary; where they were all together most miserably slain. The rest of the Citizens, whose hard fortune it was to escape the Sword (as people referred to more misery) were afterwards shipped over into Grecia, and there sold for Slaves. The landing of the Turks in Apulia, with the taking of Ortranto, brought a general fear upon all Italy, inasmuch that Simon Quarini, then great Bishop of Rome, forgetting all things save himself, was about to have forsaken the City for fear. Now after the Turks had at their pleasure ransacked Ortranto, Achmetes caused the same to be strongly fortified (as the free footing of the Turks in Italy) and victualled for eighteen months, and there leaving eight thousand of his best Souldiers in Ortranto, returned himself with the rest to Valona, and so by Land to Constantinople to know his great Masters further pleasure, but purposing with himself, with the first of the next Spring to have returned with greater forces again to Italy for the prosecuting of his former Victory. Which if he had done, it was greatly to have been feared, that all that goodly Country, sometime Mistress of the World, but then and ever since, to be by Land to Constantinople and ambition of the Christian Princes, had in short time become a prey unto the barbarous Turk for ever.

But whilst the great Tyrant (in his life time the great scourge of Christendom) thus proudly plotteth the ruin and destruction of fair Italy, God, in whose hands the hearts of Kings are, put an hook in the great Tyrants Nose, and led him quite another way. For at the same time, the Caramanian King, aided by the Perlian and the Sultan of Egypt, had in a great Battle overthrown Bejaquet (Mahomet eldest Son then living) and slain most part of his Army; in revenge whereof, Mahomet with great expedition raised a great and puissant Army, and taking Achmetes with him as his chief man of War, rejecting the Wars of Italy unto a more convenient time, passed over into Asia; where upon the way about a days journey short of Nicomedia a City of Bithynia, at a place called Gevoijn he fell sick, and there for the space of three days grievously tormented with an extreme pain in his Belly (which some supposed to be the Colick) died; but being indeed, as most men thought, poysoned; when he had lived about years, and thereof reigned 31, in the year of our Lord 1511. His Body was afterwards magnificently buried in a Chapel near unto the great Mahometan Temple, which he himself first built at Constantinople.

The death of this mighty man (who living troubled a great part of the World) was not much more lamented by those that were nearest unto him, (who ever living in fear of his Cruelty, hated him deadly) than by his Enemies, who ever in doubt of his greatness, were glad to hear of his end. He was of stature but low, and nothing answerable to the height of his mind, square fit, and strong limbed, not inferior in strength (when he was young) unto any in his Fathers Court, but to Scanderbeg only; his complexion was Tawarlike, fallow, and melancholy, as were most of his Ancestors the Osman Kings; with his look and countenance firm, with his Eyes piercing, hollow and a little sunk as it were in to his Head, and his Nose so high and crooked, that it almost touched his upper Lip. To be brief, his countenance was altogether fish, as if Nature had with most cunning hand therein depainted and most curiously set forth to view the inward disposition and qualities of his mind, which were on both parts notable: He was of a very sharp and apprehensive Wit, learned, as amongst that Nation, especially in Astronomy, and could speak the Greek, Latine, Arabick, Chaldee and Persian Tongues. He delighted much in regarding of Histories, and the Lives of worthy Men, especially the Lives of Alexander the Great, and of Julius Caesar, whom he propoed to himself as examples to follow. He was of an exceeding courage, and therefore very fortunate; a severe punisher of injustice, in them especially to whom he had committed the administration of Justice. Men that excelled in any quality, he greatly favoured and honourably entertained; as he did Gentil Bellin a Painter of Venice, whom he purposely caused to come from thence, to Constantinople, to draw the lively counterfeits of himself, for which he paid him most honourably rewarded him. He so severely punished theft, as that in his time all the ways were safe, and a Thief scarcely to be heard of. But these good parts were in him obscured with most horrible and notorious Vices; for why, he was altogether irreligious, and of all others most perfidious, ambitious above measure, and in nothing more delighted, than in blood; inasmuch that it is probably gathered, that he was in his time the death of eight hundred thousand men. Crafts, Covetousness, and Diffimulation, were in him accounted for tolerable faults in comparison of his greater Vices. In his love of War was no assurance, and his least displeasure was death; so that he lived feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had issue three Sons, Musapha (dead before him, as is before declared) Bejaquet, and Gosme; or rather Kosme, of some men called called Zizanus, Competitor of the Empire with his eldest Brother; whom he exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his Reign, so that he could not well attend any other thing, but him; which opportunity (by God himself no doubt offered for the safeguard of Italy) Alphonfus Duke of Calabria (King Ferdinand his eldest Son) taking hold upon, with all the power he could make in Italy, besieged the Turks in Otranto; with whom he had many sharp skirmishes, wherein he lost divers of his great Captains and Commanders, as the Count Julio de Aquino, Loy de Capua, and the Count Julio de Bisce, with others and was still by the strong Garrison of the Turks put to the worse; until such time as being strengthened with Aid out of Spain and Portugal, (but especially with certain Companies of most valiant Souldiers sent from Matthias Corvinus out of Hungary, whose Forces the Turks most feared) he began to cut them short, and straitly besieged the City both by Sea and Land; until at length the besieged Turks hearing of the death of their great Emperor, and now hardly pressed with the dangers of a strait Siege, no longer expecting the return of Alphonfus their General, (then ready to have come to their rescue with five and twenty thousand Souldiers) yielded up the City unto the Duke, <sup>Otranto yielded by the Duke upon compo- sition before made. That they might with bag and baggage in safety depart thence; upon which they did, after they had to the great terror of all Italy holden that strong City by the space of a year. And so was that rich Country rather by the mercy of God (in taking away the great Tyrant) preserved, than by the strength or policy of the Inhabitants, which was then in great danger to have for ever given place unto the power of the great Tyrant, had he longer lived; yea and after his death, to the power of Bajazet his Son, had he not by Domestic troubles been enforced to turn himself another way, and as it were to neglect in time to relieve his distressed Garrison in Otranto, as shall hereafter be declared.</sup>

The LIFE of BAJAZET,

OF THE

TURKS.

Diffusion among the Turks in about the Succession.

UPON the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, great Troubles began to arise about the Succession in the Turkish Empire; some of the Baffaes and great Captains seeking to place Bajazet, the eldest Son of Mahomet, in the Empire; and others with no less devotion labouring to prefer Zemus, or Gemes, otherwise called Zizimus, Bajazet his younger Brother. By occasion whereof there arose two great and mighty Factions, which in few days grew to such heat, that many great Tumults and hot Skirmishes were made in the Imperial City, betwix the Favorites of both Factions, and great slaughter committed. In these Broils the proud Janizaries for an old grudge slew Mahomet one of the four great Baffaes, a man by whose grave Council most of the weighty Affairs of the Turkish Empire had been managed during the Reign of the late Emperor; and proceeding further in their accustomed Insolency, spoiled all the Christians and Jews which dwelt amongst them, of all their Wealth and Substance; at which time the rich Merchants and Citizens of Constantinople which were natural Turks themselves, escaped not their ravenous Hands, but became unto them a Prey and Spoil also. The other three Baffaes of the Court, Isaac, Mehmet, and Achmet, (lately returned from the winning of Hydruntum in Italy) although they secretly maligned and envied one at the greatness of another, yet to appease these so dangerous Troubles, and to assure their own Estates, joyned hands together, and by their great Authority, and multitude of Followers and Favorites, found means that Corcutus (one of the younger Sons of Bajazet, a young Prince of eighteen years old) was as it were by general consent of the Nobility and Souldiers, saluted Emperor, and with great Triumph and Solemnity placed in the Imperial Seat. In whose name, the aforesaid Baffaes at their pleasure disposed of all things, little or nothing regarding either Bajazet or Zemus, then both absent, the one at Amasia, and the other at Iconium in Lycania. For the jealous Turkish Kings never suffer their Sons to live in Court near unto them, after they are grown to years of discretion; but send them to Govern their Provinces far off; where they are also under the Command of the Emperors Lieutenants General in Asia or Europe, and may not depart from their Charge without great danger, not so much as to visit their Father without express leave and commandment. So jealous are those Tyrants, yea even of their own Sons.

Bajazet and Zemus hearing of the death of their Father, and of the Troubles in the Imperial City, halted thitherward with all speed, where Bajazet being the nearer, first arrived; but finding the Empire already possessed by Corcutus his younger Son, and himself excluded, he in grief of his heart poured forth most grievous Complaints before God and man, calling Heaven and Earth to witness of the great wrong and injury done unto him by the proud Baffaes. And what by Tears and humble Obsecrations, what by great Gifts and greater Promises, but most of all by the earnest labour and solicitation of Cherlogles Vice-Roy of Græcia, and the Aga or Captain of the Janizaries, both his Sons in law, prevailed so much with the great Baffaes and Souldiers of the Court, that Corcutus being of a mild and courteous disposition, overcome by their intreaty and the reverence of his Father, resigned unto him the Imperial Government, which he presently took upon him with the general good liking of the people, and made Corcutus Governor of Lycia, Caria, and Ionia, with the pleasant and rich Countries thereabouts; allowing him a great yearly Pension for the better maintenance of his Estate, with promise also of the Empire after his decease, and so sent him away to his Charge, where he must pleasantly lived during the Reign of his Father Bajazet, giving himself wholly to the study of Philosophy, which made that he was afterwards less favoured of the Janizaries and other men of War.

Zemes thus prevented by his elder Brother, and understanding by his Friends how all things stood at Constantinople, and that Bajazet was already possessed of the Empire; returning with great speed, raised a puissant Army in the Countreies, which were under his Command, and marching through the heart of Asia the less, by the way as he went, took into his possession such Cities and strong Places as he thought best; and so entering into Bithynia, took the great City of Prusa, the ancient Seat of the Ottoman Kings. Purposing in himself, that as Bajazet had thrust him out of Europe, so he would also in revenge of the Turkish Empire which is beyond Hellespontus in Asia, and to make himself Lord thereof. Wherein Fortune at the first seemed unto him most favourable, all the people wheresoever he came yielding unto him Obedience as unto their Prince and Sovereign; so that in short time he seemed both unto himself and to others, in strong possession of that part of the Empire.

Of these his proceedings Bajazet having Intelligence, and perceiving the greater part of his Empire now in danger to be lost, and doubting further, that Zemes his ambitious Mind would hardly rest therewith long contented; for remedy of so great a Mischiefe levied a strong and puissant Army, wherewith he passed over into Asia, and came to Neapolis, a City of Asiatia, near whereto Zemes lay with his Army, and incamped. As Bajazet was upon the way against his Brother, Achmetes the great Baffa (in the confession of all men the best man of War and most expert Captain amongst the Turks, and of all others most entirely beloved of the Janizaries) came, and unarmed presented himself upon his knees before Bajazet, his Sword hanging at his Saddle-bow; to the admiration of many, who could not but wonder to see him, who was a Christian of so great Place in time of Service, without any apparent cause, in such humble manner to appear before his Sovereign, as if he had had nothing to do with Arms. As he had many years before, in the mortal Wars betwixt Mahomet the late and great Emperor of the Turks, and Assymbeis Ulum-Cassanes the King of Persia, that Bajazet having the leading of the right Wing of his Fathers Army, had not married it in for good order as was to Mahomet his good going; for which cause he commanded this Achmetes to go and fetch that part of the battle in better order. Which his Sovereigns Command whilst he most skillfully performed, Bajazet taking it in evil part, as tending to his own disgrace, in great choler threatened the Baffa, to find a time when he would be revenged upon him. But he being a man of great spirit, and one that durst both do and say much, perceiving his meaning, bid him do what pleased him; and laying his hand upon his Sword, solemnly vowed, That whensoever he came to Command as Emperor, he would never wear Sword in field; the remembrance whereof was the cause that he then came in manner aforesaid, ready to serve if he were thereto commanded, or otherwise to endure what to his Princes Pleasure was. Bajazet perceiving that the unkindness for long before conceived, was not yet digested, in token of Grace stretched out to him his Scepter, and taking him up, commanded him to girt his Sword unto his side, and not to remember that which he had long before both forgiven and forgotten. And knowing right well that he was a most valiant and expert Captain, made him General of his Army, to the great contentment of the Janizaries and the rest of the Army; who so soon as they saw him, gave out divers great shouts for joy, as if Victory had most assuredly attended upon him. Achmetes taking upon him the Charge, came and incamped so near as he could to Zemes, and so lay by the space of ten days; during which time, many sharp skirmishes were made with divers Fortune; sometimes the one side prevailing, and sometimes the other. At length the matter was brought to a general battle; wherein after a long and cruel fight, and great slaughter on both sides, the Fortune of Bajazet, conducted by the policy of Achmetes, prevailed against Zemes. Who seeing his Army overthrow, besook himself to flight, and came to Iconium; in which flight many of Zemes his Followers were taken Prisoners; whom Bajazet would have pardoned and enlarged, but that by the perswasion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terror of others suffered them all to be put to the sword.

Zemes doubting after this Overthrow to fall into his Brothers hands, and finding no means to make head again; when he had staid three days at Iconium, caused his Treasure, Plate, Jewels, and other things of great value and light carriage to be trusted up, and taking with him his Mother and his two young Children, a Son and a Daughter, accompanied with a small Retinue, fled into Syria; then part of the Dominion of Mesopotamia, commonly called the great Sultan of Egypt and Syria. It was not long after the departure of Zemes from Iconium, but that Bajazet came thither with his Army, to have furnished him; but understanding of his flight, he took order for the peaceable Government of that part of his Empire. And so having suppressed that dangerous Rebellion, and again reduced that troubled part of his Empire to his Obedience, returned with Victory to Constantinople. The diffident Prince Zemes travelling through Syria, came at length to Jerusalem; where he stayed a good space, devoutly visiting the Monuments of that most ancient and famous City. From thence he travelled into Egypt; where at his first entrance into the Country, he was met by divers of the greatest Nobility of that Kingdom, sent from the great Sultan, by whom he was honourably conducted to Cairo, and there presented to Caystane, of whom he was graciously welcomed; unto whom after due Reverence done, he declared the cause of his coming, as followeth:

If it were not to me certainly known (most Victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, or Spoken from whence descended, or with what injury employed after long and painful travel I am here arrived; I would much concern me to use another manner of beginning of my Speech, and with greater protestation of words to seek your gracious Favour. But forasmuch as all these things are unto your most Royal Majesty sufficiently known, as I do well perceive in this, that your infinite Clemency hath entertained me with far greater kindness, than I in such my adverse Fortune durst wish for, much less request: Now nothing remains for me to say, more than submit to complain unto your imperial Majesty, of the Wrong and Injury done unto me by Bajazet, whom I may more justly term my cruel Enemy, than kind Brother. For he not contented to have taken, unto himself my Fathers Empire by great tumult and slaughter, hath with all Hostility and Force of Arms persecuted me his Brother, excluded out of the Imperial City, and then living in Bithynia, troublesome neither to him, nor any of his people, and never rested until he had chased me out of the bounds of my Empire.

Empire. Neither hath the jealous desire of Sovereignty (whereof my Father whilst he lived, had him always in distrust) so much moved him unto this so cruel Fate, as a certain unnatural cruelty towards all his Kindred in general, and mortal hatred against his Brother in particular, for he which is already possessed of the Empire, and doth with all Hostility persecute a private person, subject and exposed to his Injury, that man thirsteth not after Sovereignty, but after Blood; neither desireth he to Conquer, but to Kill. And whereas after my Fathers death great Troubles arose in Constantinople, and many bloody skirmishes were fought betwixt the Favorites of both of us, it camea with me to be laid to my charge, as done by mine advice or counsel, I being at the same time so far from thence. Neither am I likely to be blamed, if that after my Fathers departure I put my self upon the way towards Constantinople, especially being sent for thither by many my good Friends, men of great Mark and Quality; but his Fortune prevailing, I gave place, and left my coming to the Imperial City might have been the occasion of new Troubles, I returned aside unto Bithynia, and so to Prusa, with purpose to have resided in quiet, if my Brother would have given me leave. But so far was he from that, to suffer me there to rest, as that I was by him most cruelly assailed as an open Enemy, and had I not by speedy flight withdrawn my self from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my Fathers Kingdom, I must have yielded my self, my blood, and life, as a Sacrifice into his cruel hands. Neither is he to me so mortal an Enemy, or thirsteth after my life so much for fear, as for vexed hatred and malice; for what is there in me to fear? Verily nothing: Constantinople is his, the favour of the great Christians and Men of War is his, the Treasure and Royal Riches are all his; wherefore he hateth his Brother, but feareth him not. He will sway all the Ottoman Army, he will have all that belongs to the Christian Family, and he, as ye none but he, must live alone. Xerxes was a mighty King, any yet in that great and large Kingdom he only preferred his Brethren in safety, but had them also in great Honour and Esteem. What did Alexander the Great? Who not only took pleasure in his Brother, but had him also as a Companion of his most glorious Expedition; and many other famous Kings of foreign Nations; and of our own Family, have ruled both more safely, and better strengthened, with the counsel and aid of their most loving Brethren, rather than with others. But Bajazet is of a far other mind, requiring violence and haughtiness of heart to be his great glory, and just defence; herein his fierce Nature delighted, more than in the lawful course of Nature, Justice, and Equity; he had rather have his Brother his Enemy than his Friend, and to drive him into exile, than to make him partaker of his counsels. But I beseech the most puissant Monarch, the faithful Keeper and Maintainer of our Laws and Religion, by the sacred Reliques of our great Prophet Mahomet, which thou hast at Jerusalem and Mecha, (affer me, a King's Son, to live in banishment and exile, poor and miserable, at the scorn of his Brothers cruelty, far from home, far from his Country and Kingdom) but regarding the Law of the great Prophet, life up the afflicted and oppressed, and by the great authority which you have, bridle Domestical wrongs; or if that will not take place, revenge it with thy Sword, and suffer not our Empire, with so great travail founded, by the cruelty or folly of one wretched man to be overthrown; which should be no more grievous and lamentable to us, than dangerous to your most high Estate, and all other Kings and Princes of our Religion. For you of your self understand right well, what deadly Enemies the Christian Princes are unto the Turks; and do you think, that if any great War (which I wish not) should arise of this our Discord, that they would long rest in quiet, and as idle Beggars stand looking on until it were of it self appeased? Or rather having such an opportunity presented, would not with might and main suddenly invade our Kingdom, before the destruction of the same? Which their desire, if our careful people could bring to pass (which thing Methinks turn upon themselves) my mind abhorreth to Ottoman Family once rooted out, there is none of our Religion (your Majesty only excepted) which is able to withstand their Power, and therefore you must stand by the force of the Christian, you alone must withstand the fury of the Christian, you must maintain that War with much life, and greater charge, and most uncertain success. Wherefore, invincible Monarch, I most humbly beseech thee, that pitying us yet to be had, whilst the matter is yet whole, and remedy is yet to be had, to deal with Bajazet by your Excellency, that though I will not receive me from his Brother as Partner of the Empire, yet at least to admit me into some small part of my Fathers Kingdom: Let him Reign and Rule, let all things be as his Command; let it be lawful for me to go on and to live in rest and quiet somewhere, possessing but so much as may suffice me honestly to lead a private life. Which thing if he shall refuse to grant, although he neither fear the Laws of God or man, yet as I have at Jerusalem, so will I wish shortly at Mecha (if by your leave I may) complain unto the great Prophet, of the Injuries done unto me by my cruel and unnatural Brother; and afterwards make proof of your compassion towards me, all which I hope shall much avail. But if (which I would not) I shall prove all these things in vain, with desperation enforced men to all Extremities, I will go with Fire, Sword, and Slaughter, and hated, with all manner of wrong and unkindness of Mischiefs, by all means possible, until I have made an end of confounding of him. Neither will I receive into some part of the Empire, or of Egypt, until my life leave those desperate and lost things, and I am alone to enjoy. For I deem it much better, quickly to die than with disgrace and infamy to protract a lingering loathed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the diffident Prince, willing him to be of good cheer, and patiently to bear his present hap; forasmuch as it became a man born in so high Fortune, not to be discouraged with any misfortune, or dismay if things fell out otherwise than he looked for; commending him whilst well he had become his better Estate; and what in him lay, to reconcile him to his Brother, and to persuade him that he might be received into some part of the Kingdom, and that purpose shortly after dispatched away an honourable Embassage to Bajazet. Zemes in the mean while, by the same Sultans leave, upon a superstitious devotion travelled into Arabia, to his Sepulchre at Medina. Upon his return to Cairo, the Embassadors before him returned also, but not having obtained any thing they desired, for Bajazet would not give ear to any Agreement, but seemed altogether to contemn and despise his Brother. Wherefore Zemes more upon stomach and desire of Revenge, than for any hope he had of the Empire, determined with himself to make open War upon him; reposing some good hope in his secret Friends, and the revolve of some of the great Captains, who discontented with the Government of Bajazet, secretly wished for his return.

Whilst he was thus plotting these weighty Matters, a Messenger with Letters came fitly from the King of Caramania, offering with all the Power he could make, to join with him, if he would take up Arms against his Brother. This poor titular King then lived in Armenia, and being able by his Friends to make some good force, was in hope by joining with Zemes, to recover some part of the Caramanian Kingdom, from whence his Father was not many years before driven by the force of the late Turkish Emperor Mahomet the Great, Bajazet his Father. It is hard to say, whether of these distressed and exiled Princes gave the greater encouragement to the other, to take this desperate War in hand, being both together far unable by all the Friends they could make, to encounter with the great Power of Bajazet. But what is so dangerous or desperate, which aspiring Minds will not attempt in hope of a Kingdom? whose brightness so dazzleth their eyes, that they can see nothing but it.

Hereupon Zemes having received great Gifts of the Egyptian Sultan, with promise of Aid, departed from Caire (the Sultan earnestly persuading him to the contrary) and as it was before appointed, met with the Caramanian King upon the borders of Asia the lesser; where they concluded to join together such Forces as they had, and to invade Bajazet. Which they accordingly did; for raising all the Power they could, they entered into Cilicia, (now called Caramania) and joining their Armies together, incamped between Isonium and Larenda. Neither did Bajazet in time of so great a danger sit still; nor so much fearing his Brothers Power, as the reviving of his Captains and Souldiers, whom he knew either to love, or at least not to hate the young Prince his Brother. Wherefore he raised a great Army, and sent Acmetes (the great Man of War) before with the one part thereof, himself following after with a far greater strength; for at that time he had under his Arms two hundred thousand men.

As he was marching with this great Army, a rumor was raised in the Camp, That some of his chief Captains had conspired to betray him into the hands of his Brother, and that many of the Souldiers secretly favouring Zemes, would upon the joining of the battel forsake him, and take part with his Brother. Which report so troubled Bajazet, that he stood in doubt what to do, or whom to trust; but knowing that nothing winneth the heart of the common Souldier more, than the Generals bounty, he forthwith caused a wonderful mass of Money to be divided amongst the Captains and Souldiers, loading their minds with ample promises of far greater Rewards, for their fidelity and valour to be shewed in that present Service. Having thus assured himself of the wavering minds of his Souldiers, he began to draw near to Isonium, where his Enemies lay incamped; and by glossing Letters and flattering Messengers made them open, as if he had been very desirous to come to some good Agreement with them, but secretly went about to stop all the straits and passages, in such manner as that it should not be possible for them again to retire back into Syria; for he doubted nothing more, but lest they being few in number, and in strength far unequal unto him, would not upon so great disadvantage hazard the fortune of a battel, but retire themselves into Syria, and so to his exceeding Trouble and infinite Charge protract the War.

seeing no such Revolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by Letters to him been promised; and weighing with reason his own weak Forces, retired in good time unto the straits of the Mountain Amanus, which divideth Cilicia from Syria. Here, despairing of all good success in the Enterprize he had taken in hand, he persuaded the Caramanian King his Confederate to give place unto the time, and to reserve himself unto his better Fortune; and so breaking up his Army, with a few of his Followers came down to the Sea coast of Cilicia; where he hired a tall Ship to attend in readiness, that if any sudden danger should arise, he might go aboard, and to save himself by Sea. In the mean time he sent a Messenger unto Damboy, Great Master of the Rhodes, certifying him, That for as much as he had no place of safety left amongst his own people, wherein he might throw himself from the fury of his Brother, still looking after his life, he would upon his safe Conduct come to him into his Island of the Rhodes. Which his request the Great Master easily granted, deeming the flight of so great a Prince from the Turk, to be a thing much profitable to the Christian Commonwealth; and thereupon he presently sent forth certain Gallies to fetch him from the troublesome coast of Cilicia. But before these Gallies were come, Zemes was informed by the sudden access of his Enemies, for the avoiding of present danger, to go aboard on that Ship which he had providently before prepared to be in readiness for such purpose. And having put a little from the shore, took back again an Arrow with Letters made fast unto it, directed unto his Brother Bajazet, containing as followeth:

Thou knowest (most unkind and cruel Brother) that I fly not unto the Christians, the mortal Enemy of the Ottoman Family, for hatred of thy Religion or Nation; but enforced thereto by thy injurious dealing, and dangerous practices, which thou incessantly attemptest against me, yea even in my extreme misery. But this assured hope I carry with me, that the time will come when as thou the author of so great wrong, or thy Children, shall receive their just guerdon of thy thy present tyranny against thy Brother.

It is reported, that when Bajazet had read these Letters, he was so troubled in mind, that for certain days he gave himself wholly to mourning and heaviness, and would in no wise be comforted; insomuch, that he was brought into the Camp by the Baffaes, as a man half distraught of his wits, flunniing for a season all mens speech and company.

Zemes failing to the Rhodes, was there honourably received of the Great Master, and all the rest of the Knights of the Order; to whom in their publick Assembly three days after, he openly declared the causes of the discord between his Brother and him; alleging for the colour of his Rebellion, That although Bajazet was his elder Brother, yet that he was born whilst his Father yet lived in private Estate, under the subjection and command, long before he did subjection the Kingdom, and so no Kings Son; whereas he himself was the first born of his Father, being an Emperor, and so not Heir of his Fathers private Fortune (as was Bajazet) but of his greatest Honour and Empire; and yet not of such an haughty mind, but that he could have been content to have given place unto his Brother, so that he could have been contented to live of wife to have granted him some small portion of the Empire, wherein he might safely have lived as a poor Prince, and his Brother; but that such was his pride, as that he would not vouchsafe to suffer him to live so much as a poor private life in any corner of so large an Empire, and was therefore by his unnatural and tyrannous dealing, enforced to crave Aid of the Christian Princes. Of whom (forasmuch as he had always heard much honour) he was in good hope to find succour and relief in that his distressed estate; protesting unto God and the World, that if ever it should be his good Fortune by their means and help to obtain the Empire, he would never be unmindful of so great a benefit; but to make with them a perpetual and inviolable Peace, and so to rest their fast Friend for ever. The Great Master on the other side comforting him with cheerful Speeches, promised to keep him in safety from the fury of his Brother, and farther to commend his Cause to the other great Kings and Princes of Christendom.

This exiled Prince Zemes, was about the age of eight and twenty years when he came to the Rhodes of stature tall, somewhat corpulent and well limbed, grey-eyed, but looking something asquint, hook-nosed, and in the middle rising, in such manner as the Perfians commend in their Kings; of color brown, spare of speech, and by nature choleric; a great feeder, so that he seemed rather to devour his meat, than to eat it; much delighted in swimming, and to lie abroad in the night; pensive and melancholy, which men imputed to his great cares; never merry but in the company of the grand Master; a religious observer of the superstition, from which he could never be drawn during the long time he lived in exile; learned as among the Turks, so that he wrote the History of his Fathers life. But leaving him in safe keeping with the grand Master of the Rhodes, let us again return to the course of our History.

Bajazet having now the second time chafed away his Brother, after he had well quitted that part of his troubled Kingdom in Asia, returned again to Constantinople, carefully attending when some new motion should be made by his Brother, to his farther disquiet. But after he understood that he was with the Great Master of the Rhodes, he sent certain of his Baffaes (amongst whom Acmetes the great Souldier is reported to have been one) unto the Great Master, requesting him to deliver up Zemes, offering for him a wonderful sum of money. Which dishonourable request, when it could by no means be obtained, the same Embassadors in the name of their Master, concluded a Peace very commodious for the Rhodesians; wherein amongst other things it was agreed, That the Great Master should keep Zemes in safe custody, so that he should no more trouble the Turkish Empire; in consideration whereof, and for his honourable usage, Bajazet should yearly pay unto the Great Master thirty thousand Ducats the first of August, which was afterward accordingly paid.

It fortuned that whilst Acmetes the great Baffa (employed in matters abroad) was absent from the Court, Bajazet discoursing with the other Baffaes his grave Counsellors, upon his late Expedition into Asia against his Brother, seemed to be highly offended with the untruthfulness and doubtful faith of some of his greatest Captains and Souldiers; yet upon whom he might justly lay the blame, he well knew not, although it seemed by his speech, he should somewhat distrust the great Captain Acmetes. Hereupon Ipsa, the most ancient Baffa of the Court, and of greatest authority next unto Bajazet himself (whose Daughter, a Lady of exceeding beauty, Acmetes had long before married, but doubting that he had yielded her Honour to the wanton lust of Musapha, the eldest Son of Mahomet the late Emperor, had put her from him, and would by no means be reconciled; for which cause there was a secret hatred ever after between those two great Baffaes) perceiving the Emperors discontented and suspicious humour, and desiring nothing more than the destruction of Acmetes, took hold upon this opportunity, and by all means he could devise, increased the suspicion of the Treason, which had already too much possessed the jealous Emperor; sometimes craftily imagining Intelligence to have passed betwixt Zemes and Acmetes; and forthwith amplifying his Power and Authority, which (as he said) was so great with the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court, that they by reason of his often employments, were wholly at his devotion; so that he might at his pleasure do more in Zemes his quarrel, than should stand with the safety of Bajazet; a matter well to be considered of, and also carefully prevented. For remedy of which dangers, it was thought necessary, that Acmetes at his return to Court, should be taken away and slain.

Acmetes fearing nothing less than that which was contrived against him, came after his wonted manner to the Court, and was with the other great Baffaes invited to a solemn Supper which Bajazet had commanded to be prepared, to solace himself after his travels (as it was given out) with his chief Baffaes. To this Royal Supper came Acmetes with the rest of the bidden Guests, mistrusting nothing, and was there sumptuously feasted by Bajazet; who to make his Guests the merrier, drank Wine plentifully himself, causing them also to drink in like manner; so that they were full of Wine; a thing utterly forbidden by their Law; yet daily more and more used, especially by their great Men in their Feasts. Supper now ended, and the night far spent, Bajazet in token that they were welcome, and stood in his good Grace, caused certain rich Robes of pleasing colours to be brought forth, and to be cast upon every of his Guests one, giving beside unto every one of them a fair gilt Bowl full of Gold. But upon Acmetes was cast a Gown of black Velvet, which among the Turks may well be called the Mantle of death, being so sure a Token of the Emperors heavy Indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth, or to intreat for him upon whom it is by the Emperors commandment to cast. Acmetes feeling himself now under the shadow of death, and knowing it but vain to intreat for mercy, as he was a man of great spirit, brake forth and said, Oh woe betide (which is as much as to say, Thou Son of a Whore) sith thou entendest so much cruelty against me, why didst thou not put it in execution before thou hadst informed me to drink this impure and forbidden Wine? and so casting his Eyes upon the ground, fate still. The other Baffaes having leave to depart, giving thanks to the Emperor, and craving pardon for their excess, killed the ground at his Feet and so departed; with whom Acmetes offered to have gone out also, but was forthwith commanded to sit still, for that the Emperor had to talk with him in secret. The Baffaes were no sooner departed, but the terrible Executioners of Bajazet his wrath there in, and laid hands upon Acmetes to have slain him; when one of the Eunuchs in greatest favour with the Tyrant, standing by, advised him not to be too hasty in executing of so great Man, so entirely beloved of his best Souldiers and Men of War, but rather to stay his Execution for a while, to see how the matter would be diffused; and in the mean time by torture to wrest out of him what might be got, to make it in some fort appear, that he died for his due desert. Hereupon Bajazet deferred his Execution to a farther time, and caused him there presently to be stript, and carried away to be tortured.

Amongst other Gallants of the Court which attended the coming out of the great Baffes whom they followed, was one of Achmetes his Sons, a Gentleman of great hope; who mistaking his Father amongst the rest, began presently to mistreat that all went no well; and speedily running from one of the Baffes to another, with much ado learned the hard estate of his Father; whereof he was also at the same instant advertised by a secret Friend near about Bajazet. Hereupon this young Gentleman began forthwith plainly to lament his Fathers misfall, and to censure against the cruelty of Bajazet, who relied on the Janizaries for aid, putting them in remembrance of his Fathers great and manifold Deserts towards them, together with his imminent danger; and so running up and down the City in the dead time of the night, had in short space raised up all the Janizaries in Arms; who understanding of the danger of their ancient Commander, whom they generally loved and honoured as their Father, came running by heaps from all parts of the City unto the Court-Gate, there with terrible Exclamation doubling and redoubling their Bre, Bre, (which barbarous word they commonly use in expressing their greatest discontentment and fury) and did indeed so furiously beat at the Court Gate, that Bajazet fearing lest they should break in by violence, caused the outer Gate to be set open, and throwing himself from above out at an Iron Window, descended upon the cause of that Tumult and Uproar. To whom they insolently answered, That they would by and by reach him as a Drunkard, a Beast, and a Rascal, to use his great Place and Calling with more sobriety and discretion; and among many other opprobrious words wherewith they shamefully loaded him, they called him oftentimes by the name of Bengi, Bengi (that is to say, Bachelor or Scholar) which amongst those Martial Men, Contemners of all Learning, is accounted a word of no small reproach and disgrace. And after they had in most despiteful manner thus reviled him, they proudly commanded him forthwith to deliver Achmetes unto them, or else to take that should ensue thereof. Bajazet terrified with this Insolency of the Janizaries, and fearing some sudden violence to be offered, commanded Achmetes to be without delay delivered unto them; which was done in such haste, that he was brought forth unto them almost naked, bare legged, and bare headed, bearing in his body the manifest marks of his hard usage. The Janizaries receiving him with great rejoicing, supplied his want of Apparel with such habiliments, as they for that purpose upon the sudden took from Bajazet Minions; and so taking him upon their shoulders, with great joy carried him out of the Court, still crying unto him, How he did, and how he felt himself? And so guarded him home, ready no doubt to have slain Bajazet and rited the Court, if he would have but fled the word. But he yet Loyal, laboured with good words to appease that Tumult, and to pacify their fury; excusing that which Bajazet had done against him, to have been done only to rectify him; for that happily he had forgotten some part of Obedience and Duty. Nevertheless, hereupon remained no small heart-burning betwixt Bajazet and the Janizaries for a long time after; yet Bajazet for fear of them reconciled himself to Achmetes and in open favour had him in greater Honour than before, promoting him even unto the highest degrees of Honour, howbeit he inwardly hated him to death. And the more by the continual infatigation of the old Baffa Isaac; by whose perfavation, when it was thought that all had been forgotten, he was by Bajazet Commanded, as he sat at Supper in the Court, thrust through the body and slain. This was the miserable end of Achmetes, the great Champion of the Turks, and one of the greatest Enemies of Christendom that ever lived in the Turkish Court; for by him, Mahomet subdued the Empire of Trapezond, took the great City of Caffa (called in ancient time Theodosia) with all the Country of Taurica Cherfoneus, the impregnable City of Croia, with all the Kingdom of Epirus, the strong City of Scudra, and a great part of Dalmatia, and laid the foundation to the terror of all Italy; by him also, Bajazet vanquished and put to flight his Brother Zemes, as is before declared. In reward of which good Services, he was by the Tyrant (upon a meer supposition) thus cruelly and shamefully murdered. About this time also, Cagubus (Zemes his Son, then but a Child) was by the commandment of Bajazet his Uncle, strangled in the new Tower of Constantinople.

Bajazet now grievously offended with the pride and late Insolency of the Janizaries, caused secret inquiry to be made, of them which were the Authors of those late Sins; and finding them to be the Officers of their Companies, and especially those which had before slain Mahomet Baffa the great Politician, immediately after the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, to which time they had also raised great Tumults, and done much harm in the City; he under colour of Persecution, sent away those Authors of Sedition into divers parts of his Empire, appointing unto them (as unto old Souldiers and Men of good desert) certain Lands and Revenues for their Maintenance and Preferment. But as soon as they were departed, he by secret Letters commanded the Governors and Magistrates of those places wherunto they were sent, suddenly to apprehend them, and as Traitors to put them to death; which was accordingly done. The Janizaries of the Court and about Constantinople, hearing what had happened unto their Fellows, became wonderful discontented, and began to mutine in divers places of the City, uttering Speeches against the Emperor full of Despatch and Revenge. Which thing when Bajazet understood, and had well considered the late danger he was in, together with the intolerable Pride and Insolency of those his masterful Slaves; he secretly purposed in himself for the curing of so dangerous a Disease, to use a most desperate remedy; which was, suddenly to kill and destroy all the Janizaries, especially those which were belonging to the Court, or about Constantinople. This his purpose he imparted to divers of his greatest Baffes, charging them upon pain of his heavy displeasure not to disclose it; and for the execution thereof, had sent for great numbers of those Souldiers which are called Acamzijs, who are amongst the Turks reputed for the best sort of Common Souldiers. Most of all the Baffes to whom he had imparted this his cruel device, much disliked thereof, as too full of peril and danger; yet feeling him fully resolved for the performance thereof, they were not so much as to say anything to the contrary. Only Ali and Isander Baffa (both defended of the Honourable Family of Michael Ogli diffused him from attempting any such thing; alleging first, That the Janizaries were in number many, Souldiers of great courage and experience, resolute men, and such as would sell their lives dear; Then, admitting that he should kill all them about the Court and in Constantinople; yet for as much as all his strong Towns and Castles, especially in the Frontiers and chief places of his Dominions, were possessed and holden by strong Garrisons of other Janizaries, Fellows and Friends of these (who would undoubtedly take up Arms in defence of themselves, and revenge their dead Friends) it was a thing very like to endanger himself together with the whole State of his Empire, beside the great dishonour which would grow unto himself thereby for ever.

This so dangerous an Exploit, wherein the hands of so many were to be used, was not kept so secret, but that the vigilant and wily Janizaries had got an inkling thereof; and thereupon began daily more and more to suspect the matter, both by the often and secret repair of the great Men to the Court, more than they had before seen, and also by the unwonted multitude of those Acamzijs, which were daily brought unto the Imperial City by great Troops. Wherefore fearing to be suddenly surprized, they banded themselves together, and openly stood upon their Guard; and by chance lighting upon Ali Beg as he came from the Court, was indeed their first friend after their barbarous manner, with many opprobrious and contumelious words, demanded of him, if he were not one of them who had conspired their destruction; and without more ado had presently slain him, had he not (as a well spoken man) with great Protestations and Oaths persuaded them, that he never consented to any such thing, or that they needed to fear any such thing from him; and so with much ado rid himself out of their hands.

Bajazet seeing his purpose discovered, and that he could not without great bloodshed, and danger both to his Estate and Person, work his will upon the Janizaries; by the counsel and advice of them that saw further into the matter, to colour his former intention, commanded by open Proclamation, That the Janizaries and other his Men of War (of whom he had a great Power now assembled at Constantinople) to be in readiness against a certain prefixed day, to go with him into Moldavia; as if he had raised that Power for that purpose only. But when the time was come that he should set forward, the Janizaries put themselves in order of battle by themselves, and would in no wise joyn themselves with the rest of the Army, or receive the Emperor into the midst of their ranks, as they had always before accustomed; but furiously flinging their Weapons at him, told him plainly, that he had sought their destruction; and bid him therefore if he thought it so good, to set his Executioners to work upon them, whom he should find both ready and able to defend themselves. To pacify their fury, Bajazet was glad to give them good words, and to use all the means he could (by his great Baffes and other Captains which were able to do any thing with them) to persuade them to be quiet, swearing unto them by the holy Soul of his Father (a solemn Oath amongst the Turks) that he would not harm or wrong the meanest of them. So with much ado they were at length appeased, and received Bajazet unto the midst of them, as their wonted manner was.

This dangerous Tumult so quiesced, Bajazet set forward, and passing over Danubius, entered into Moldavia, where he first laid siege to a strong Town standing upon the Eunice Sea, called of the Turks Kele, but in ancient time Abelille, which was at length delivered unto him by composition. From thence he went to Acgerim, otherwise called Alphacron, which after a months siege was also delivered up by Composition; which two strong places he won, he returned again to Constantinople.

Many great Princes desirous of Zemes, laboured by their Embassadors to have obtained him the Great Master of the Rhodes; first Bajazet his Brother, fearing lest he should at one time or other again break forth upon him, or else set up by the Christian Princes, trouble his Estate, offered great Sums of Money to have had him delivered into his hands; and Charles the French King purposing the Conquest of Naples, (which he in few years after performed) and after that to have invaded Græcia, thought Zemes a most fit Instrument for the furtherance of those his high Designs, and was therefore wonderful desirous to have had him. Martin also King of Hungary (a Fortunate Warrior against the Turk) persuaded that the having of him might be unto him a great furtherance in the course of his Victories, fought by all the means he could to have obtained him. At which time also Innocentius the eighth of that name, Bishop of Rome, no less desirous than the rest, to have in his keeping so great a pledge of Peace and War (the bridle of the Turks fury, together with the large Pension he was fure to receive yearly from Bajazet, by the safe custody of him) so wrought the matter by Lyonel Bishop of Concordia, his cunning Legate, that the Great Master, fearing on the one side to be constrained by the great Power of Bajazet, to grant that he had so often refused, and now so justly solicited on the other side by the Bishop, caused Zemes to be delivered to him at Rome, in the year 1488. for which doing he was by the Bishop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardinal. So Zemes to the great profit of the Bishop (who received from Bajazet a yearly Pension of forty thousand Ducats) remained in safe custody at Rome all the time of Innocentius; and also of Alexander the Sixth his Successor; until that the French King Charles the Eighth, passing through the heart of Italy with a strong Army against Alphonse King of Naples, in the year 1495, and making his way through the City of Rome, so terrified the great Bishop (who altogether favoured and furthered the Title of Alphonse) that he was glad to yield to such Articles and Conditions as pleased the King; and amongst the rest, to give in Hostage unto the King his graceless Son Cesar Borgia Valentinus, and also to deliver unto him Zemes his honourable Prisoner, as shall be afterwards in place convenient at large declared.

In the beginning of Bajazet his Reign, whilst he was busied against his Brother Zemes in Asia, John Castriot the Son of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunately overthrown the Turk in battle near unto Croia, recovered a great part of Epirus out of their possession. At which time also John Chernovich, a Christian Prince of Albania, calling off the Turkish yoke imposed upon him by the late Emperor Mahomet, suddenly took up Arms, and by the help of the Venetians valiantly repulsed the Enemies out of that part of Albania; and so troubled Bajazet, that he was glad to suffer him peaceably to enjoy all that he had by force recovered, and further to content himself with a small Tribute for the rest.

invades Caramania.

Bajazet highly offended with Abraham (whom some call Pyrame) the King of Caramania, for aiding his Brother Zemes against him; in revenge thereof raised a great Army both in Egyre and Asia, and marching along Asia the left, through the Countries of Phrygia, Mysia, Carie, Lydia, and Pamphilia, entered at length into Caramania. But the King of Caramania hearing before of his coming, and knowing himself too weak to meet him in the Field, fortified the strong Cities and Places of his Kingdom, and retired with his Army into the Straits of the Mountain Taurus, where it perchance Cilicia from Syria; whereas he was in more safety than in any of his strongest Holds. Bajazet finding no way to come to him, spent most part of the Summer in spoiling of the open Country; but perceiving his Enemies could not so be drawn into the Field, he laid Siege unto the famous City of Tarsus, being the chief City of the Champaign part of Cilicia (the native place of Saint Paul the Apostle) and in short time so battered the Walls of his City with his great Ordnance, that he had made them assailable. The Citizens considering the danger they were in, offered to deliver up their City, their Liberty, Lives, and Goods reserved. Of which their Offer Bajazet accepted, and most honourably performed his promise for their safety; not permitting any of his Soldiers to enter the City, more than such as must needs for the guard of his Person, and safe keeping of the City. And for as much as Winter began now to grow faint, he dispersed his Soldiers into the Country Villages round about, not suffering the Country people to till or sow their Land, or to do any thing else which might turn to their profit or good; whereby they were enforced to yield themselves wholly to his devotion. The Caramanian King seeing his people daily fall from him, and fearing to be at length forsaken of his Soldiers also; in this his distress obtained Aid both of men and money from Cypriote the great Sultan of Egyre, and so with all the Power he could make, took the field with the first of the next Spring, fully resolved to try the fortune of a battle, although in strength and power he knew himself much inferior to his puissant Enemy.

A long and terrible battle between Bajazet and the King of Caramania.
